An official state document that contradicts the idea that immigrants are a financial burden can carry considerable weight as Democrats take control of Congress, and as potential candidates consider their options in the 2008 presidential election.

Supporters of illegal immigrants embraced the report. John TrasviÃ±a, president of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund, said it "confirms what MALDEF and immigration experts have long known -- we all benefit from the contributions of immigrants."

The Texas study may be the first by a state, but it is hardly the first of its kind. Previous studies on the financial impact of illegal immigrants have been undertaken by a number of groups, including the nonpartisan Urban Institute and the Center for Immigration Studies.

Undocumented workers in the Washington area, according to the Urban Institute, pay a hefty share of taxes, but they contribute less than they should because many are paid off the books and do not file yearly tax forms. A report by the Center for Immigration Studies, which favors reduced immigration, said that illegal-immigrant households imposed $26 billion in costs on the federal government while paying $16 billion in taxes. This week, Immigration and Customs Enforcement authorities raided meatpacking plants in six states in search of illegal immigrants they said were using illegally obtained Social Security numbers.

Early in the year, the House tried to crack down on the immigration problem with a tough proposal that would have turned about 12 million illegal immigrants in the country into instant felons.

Opponents said they went too far, and millions of illegal immigrants and their supporters marched in Dallas, Los Angeles, Chicago, Washington, Phoenix and other cities.

That is the environment that Strayhorn stepped into with her report and its bold introduction: "The Comptroller's report estimates that undocumented immigrants in Texas generate more taxes and other revenue than the state spends on them."

Drawing on estimates from a report by the Pew Hispanic Center in Washington, the report said 1.4 million to 1.6 million illegal immigrants live in Texas, about 14 percent of the U.S. total.

Texas has no state income tax, so immigrants pay sales and property taxes, along with various state fees. "Undocumented immigrants produced $1.58 billion in state revenues, which exceeded the $1.16 billion in state services they received," Strayhorn reported.

Strayhorn, an unsuccessful candidate for governor in the last election, favors a guest-worker program, prompting criticism from opponents who say her report was motivated by politics.

FAIR said the report plays down the impact of illegal immigration by not counting the children of illegal immigrants who had become U.S. citizens. In a previous report, FAIR estimated that Texas schools paid more than $1.7 billion to educate illegal immigrants and the legal children of illegal immigrants in 2003-2004.

"This report is a slap in the face to anyone with common sense," Stein said.

Berman deferred to more conservative reports, such as one from the Lone Star Foundation in Austin. It says illegal immigrants drain $4.5 billion from the Texas economy, mostly in health-care costs.

"Parkland Hospital in Dallas, and the public hospital in Houston, has a 70 percent birth rate from illegal aliens," Berman said.

TrasviÃ±a of MALDEF said he hopes Strayhorn's report will compel other politicians to "reject divisive legislation" by Berman and others "aimed at forcing undocumented immigrants further into the shadows."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Sen. Johnson 'Recovering' After Surgery (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick And Tom Raum

AP, December 15, 2006

Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson remained in critical condition but was described as recovering and holding his wife's hand Thursday after emergency overnight surgery to repair bleeding inside his brain.

His sudden illness had raised questions over whether the Democrats would hold their newly won slim control of the Senate.

The South Dakota lawmaker, 59, was on "an uncomplicated postoperative course," the U.S. Capitol physician said after visiting him Thursday afternoon. Johnson suffered a hemorrhage in his brain caused by a rare and sometimes fatal condition.

"He has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required," said the physician, Adm. John Eisold. He had said earlier, "The senator is recovering without complication."

Johnson was responding to the voice of his wife, Barbara, and following directions after the surgery, the senator's office said in a statement. "He was reaching for and holding her hand."

Johnson was stricken as Democrats prepared to take fragile 51-49 control of the new Senate when it convenes in three weeks. Democrats seized control of both chambers of Congress from Republicans in November midterm elections.

If Johnson were to leave office, a replacement would be named by South Dakota's Republican governor, Mike Rounds. A Republican appointee would create a 50-50 tie and effectively allow the GOP to retain Senate control because of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

Johnson was rushed to the George Washington University Hospital at midday Wednesday after becoming disoriented and stammering during a conference call with reporters.

Eisold, the Capitol physician, said doctors stopped bleeding in Johnson's brain and drained the blood that had accumulated there. "It is premature to determine whether further surgery will be required or to assess any long-term prognosis," Eisold said.

On Thursday afternoon, Johnson underwent an additional procedure to prevent blood clots. The procedure is standard after surgery, said Julianne Fisher, Johnson's spokeswoman. Otherwise, she said, there were no new developments. "No news is good news," she said.

Johnson's condition, also known as AVM, or arteriovenous malformation, causes arteries and veins to grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst. The condition is often present from birth.

Johnson spokesman Noah Pinegar said the senator's diagnosis was a surprise. "No one was aware of it, including Tim," he said.

Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., who is to become majority leader when the new Senate convenes on Jan. 4, said, "We're all praying for a full recovery. We're confident that will be the case."

Reid, who visited Johnson at the hospital Wednesday night and again Thursday morning, told reporters the senator "really looks good." However, Reid declined to provide any details of Johnson's medical condition.

Politically, "there isn't a thing that's changed," he said, adding that he was keeping incoming Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky "totally advised" of developments.

Outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., visited the hospital Thursday afternoon.

Senate historian Donald Ritchie said senators serve out their terms unless they resign or die. He said there was precedent for senators remaining in the Senate even though illness kept them away from the chamber for long periods.

Just this year, Sen. Jay Rockefeller, a West Virginia Democrat, missed three months of votes because of back surgery. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., was away for seven months in 1988 after undergoing surgery for brain aneurysms.

In 1969, another South Dakota senator, Karl Mundt, a Republican, suffered a stroke while in office. Mundt continued to serve until the end of his term in January 1973, although he was unable to attend Senate sessions and was stripped of his committee assignments by fellow Republicans in 1972.

The White House offered best wishes.

"Our prayers are with Senator Johnson," said White House Press Secretary Tony Snow. "Look, he's a great guy, and it's one of these things where everybody's concerned and our thoughts and prayers are with him, his family, his staff, his colleagues."

Johnson, who turns 60 in two weeks, was taken to the hospital by ambulance after experiencing what his office initially said was a possible stroke.

In a conference call with reporters, Johnson at first had answered questions normally but then had begun to stutter. He paused, then continued stammering before appearing to recover and ending the call.

Johnson spokeswoman Fisher said that after making the call from the recording studio in the basement of the Capitol, the senator walked back to his office but appeared to not be feeling well.

The Capitol physician came to his office and examined him, and it was decided he should go to the hospital.

Arteriovenous malformation is believed to affect about 300,000 Americans, according to the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke. The institute's Web site said only about 12 percent of those have any symptoms. The symptoms, which range in severity, can include severe headaches, memory loss and dizziness.

It's common to take several days for someone to wake up after AVM surgery, said Dr. Sean Grady, neurosurgery chairman at the Hospital of the University of Pennsylvania. Someone who is awake and alert and talking in the first day or two typically has a shorter recovery — in the range of 4 to 8 weeks, he said. If it takes longer to wake up, it in turn takes more months to recover.

"We wouldn't make any immediate long-term prognoses for at least one to two days," he cautioned. "There can be a period of time where the brain is still swollen and the patient may have trouble responding."

The senator's wife, Barbara Johnson, said the family "is encouraged and optimistic."

South Dakota's governor, elected to a second four-year term last month, has been widely seen as the Republican candidate with the best chance to challenge Johnson in two years.

Other than Rounds himself, top possibilities if a replacement senator were needed include Lt. Gov. Dennis Daugaard and state Public Utilities Commission Chairman Dusty Johnson, considered a rising star in the Republican Party. Retiring GOP legislative leaders, such as state House Speaker Matthew Michels and Senate Majority Leader Eric Bogue, also might be considered.

Johnson was first elected in 1996 and is up for re-election in 2008.

The last time the Senate convened with a perfect balance of 50 Republicans and 50 Democrats was in January 2001. Then, the two parties struck a power-sharing agreement that gave control of the Senate to Republicans but gave Democrats equal representation on committees.

Johnson, a centrist Democrat, was elected to the Senate after serving 10 years in the House. He narrowly defeated Republican John Thune in his 2002 re-election bid. Thune defeated Sen. Tom Daschle, the former Senate Democratic leader, two years later.

Daschle visited Johnson in the hospital on Thursday along with Reid.

Johnson is in line to become chairman of the Senate Ethics Committee.

He underwent prostate cancer treatment in 2004, and subsequent tests have shown him to be clear of the disease.

Johnson is the second senator to become ill after the Nov. 7 election. Wyoming Sen. Craig Thomas, a Republican, was diagnosed with leukemia on Election Day. He is back at work.

Johnson's Illness Threatens Dems' Power (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

Suddenly, the Democrats' grip on the Senate looks very tenuous indeed. With the party poised to take power with a 51-49 edge in January, Sen. Tim Johnson's unexpected hospitalization ignited the possibility of a 50-50 Senate and a return to the unprecedented power-sharing pact that existed during the first half of 2001.

Johnson's illness alone would not create a vacancy in the Senate. Senators have convalesced for months, even years, and retained their Senate seats. Another South Dakota Senator, Republican Karl Mundt, was incapacitated by a stroke in 1969, but served until the end of his term in 1972.

Only resignation, death or expulsion by two-thirds of the Senate can create a vacancy.

If Johnson's seat would become vacant sometime in the next two years, South Dakota Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican, would select a replacement. A GOP appointment would split the Senate anew, giving Vice President Dick Cheney the tie-breaking role and, thus, the numerical majority in the chamber to the Republicans.

But that doesn't necessarily mean Republicans would be in charge.

On Jan. 4, the first day of the new Congress, the Senate will vote on a resolution that will officially establish Democrats as the party in the majority, give Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada control over the legislative agenda, set the ratios of committee representation and other organizational matters.

That organizing resolution would still govern, even if the membership of the Senate changed. Senate associate historian Don Ritchie said the resolution could include language that spells out what would happen if there is an even split.

"This is really a matter of discussion between the Democratic and Republican leaders," Ritchie said.

But current and former GOP Senate officials said such a step would be highly unlikely. Indeed, such a move would probably paralyze the Senate.

If a 50-50 split occurs before Jan. 4, however, the parties would likely have to negotiate a power sharing agreement similar to the one then-Republican Leader Trent Lott of Mississippi and Democratic Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota negotiated in 2000.

Under that agreement, the parties split their representation on committees evenly. Committee staff positions and funding were also split equally. Republicans chose the committee chairmen and controlled the agenda on the Senate floor. Under the terms of the deal, any party that gained a numerical majority would then have control of the Senate.

By June 2001, Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont switched from being a Republican to an Independent who caucused with Democrats, putting Democrats in charge.

Before that, Ritchie said, "we have not had any formal means of changing party majorities."

If the Senate splits once again, Republicans would insist on drafting a new organizing resolution, prompting the same kind of difficult negotiations that Daschle and Lott had in 2000.

Absent some kind of deal, the Senate could see itself repeating history.

In 1953-54, Republicans kept control of the Senate even though the deaths of several senators gave the numerical plurality to Democrats. The arrangement made the Senate virtually ungovernable for the GOP.

"I have the responsibilities of being the majority leader in this body without having a majority," Republican Leader William Knowland of California complained at the time.

To which then-Democratic Leader Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas replied: "If anyone has more problems than a majority leader with a minority, it is a minority leader with a majority."

Sen. Johnson Recovering From Surgery Amid Tide Of Sympathy And Well Wishes (AL)

By Peter Harriman

Argus Leader, December 15, 2006

The tide of concern, sympathy and good wishes that has been rising across South Dakota since Sen. Tim Johnson was stricken by bleeding in his brain Wednesday was surmounted by a little whitecap of optimism today.

Following surgery Wednesday night to drain the bleeding and repair the circulatory defect that caused it, Johnson began to regain consciousness today.

"Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch," announced Admiral John Eisold, attending physician of the U.S. Capitol.

Johnson's wife, Barbara, cast that dry report in more human, hopeful terms. The senator was responding to her voice and following directions after surgery, she said.

By this morning he was reaching for and holding her hand.

"I would like to thank the people of South Dakota for their love and support as Tim has met this unexpected challenge. Our family is very pleased with his progress and the excellent care he is receiving at George Washington University Hospital. We ask for your continued prayers as Tim continues through the recovery process," she said.

Julianne Fisher, Johnson's spokesman, said there is not yet a reliable forecast on how long it will take Johnson to recover.

Speculation throughout much of the day as South Dakota waited for reports on Johnson's condition swirled around whether Johnson would recover fully or would be left with permanent brain injuries.

Would he be able to continue to serve out the Senate term to which he was elected in 2002 or would be replaced by Gov. Mike Rounds?

Also, would a lengthy recuperation imperil any time-sensitive legislation Johnson hoped to shepherd through the new Congress next year?

Incoming Sen. Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., maintained a hopeful demeanor even as speculation was at its darkest Thursday morning before news that Johnson was regaining consciousness was widely distributed.

Reid said he had visited Johnson in the hospital before and after surgery. “To me, he looked good,” Reid said in a press conference and predicted a full recovery for Johnson.

Sympathy came from both sides of the political aisle, even as Democrats hold onto a narrow advantage in the Senate.

“My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back,” said Sen. Trent Lott of Mississippi, who will serve as the deputy Republican leader of the Senate next year.

“I’d like to be in the majority, but I don’t want to do it that way.”

Before he became ill Johnson had planned to be back in South Dakota today for the start of the holiday season, doing the array of serious and sociable things a Senator does in the home state. He had a meeting scheduled with the Lewis Clark Rural Water System board of directors next week, and he and his wife were planning to make an appearance at the Children’s Inn celebrity gift wrapping center at the Empire Mall and wrap Christmas presents.

Johnson’s sudden brain injury changed all that. In his Sioux Falls field office today, a new artificial Christmas tree remained in a long cardboard carton unopened. The six staff members carried out accustomed duties. But eyes continually drifted to Blackberry and computer screens and ears listened for phones for updates on the Senator’s condition.

Floral arrangements and get well cards were on display. Benjamin Ready, Sen. John Thune’s field representative, stopped by in mid afternoon to deliver one such card.

“They’ve been wonderful,” Johnson’s South Dakota Field Representative Sharon Boysen said of Thune’s staff.

In addition, Rep. Stephanie Herseth “and her staff brought us lunch today,” Boysen said. “There were Crispy Cremes here this morning. There’s a steady stream of people coming by to give us their support.

“The outpouring from South Dakotans has been amazing,” she said. “There have been hundreds of e-mails and phone calls from South Dakotans giving us their support and their best wishes to Barb and Tim.”

Sioux Falls Mayor Dave Munson observed “that pretty much sums up how people feel about Tim Johnson in South Dakota.”

As the state waited for news and wondered about Johnson’s future, it also had an opportunity to contemplate its two-term Senator with the understated style and the reputation for penetrating policy analysis, perseverance, meticulous cultivation of consensus, attention to state interests and honesty.

“One of the things I’ve always admired about Tim is he usually levels with me, even when I have to hear something I don’t want to hear,” Pierre broadcaster, writer and conservationist Tony Dean mused.

“He is one of our key Native American supporters,” said Craig Dillon, a member of the Oglala Sioux tribal council.

Johnson apparently suffered the brain injury at the conclusion of a telephone news conference Wednesday morning, when he had difficulty articulating an answer to a question.

He was able to walk back to his office from the studio where the interview was conducted, but by the time he arrived he had difficulty speaking and was unable to open the office door. The physician attending the Senate was immediately summoned and Johnson was sent to the George Washington University Medical Center by ambulance. He had surgery Wednesday night.

Johnson’s immediate family was with him today. Jean Beddow, the mother-in-law of Johnson’s son Brendan, said from her home in Sioux Falls “the surgery went as well as expected. ...We don’t know anything more than that. It’s wait-and-see.”

She added she is regularly apprised of Johnson’s situation, and “I can tell you that what you are hearing on the news is very accurate from what I know.”

Since late Wednesday, the tape recording of Johnson’s stumbling speech as the injury apparently afflicted him has been widely broadcast.

That infuriates Beddow. “It’s one of the most grandiose miscarriages of justice in the world that they are playing that,” she said.

But the sound of the Senator struggling to speak also suggested the seriousness of his injury, and it seemed to sharpen concern for him. Munson spoke to that.

“It’s kind of a tense time for all of us in South Dakota,” the mayor said today afternoon.

“We’re all just sitting, waiting for any news.

“There are a powerful lot of people cheering for him.”

Late today, it seemed, they might have had a bit of good news to cheer about.

Sen. Johnson Recovering From Surgery For Bleeding In Brain (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely
USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson was "responsive to both word and touch" Thursday evening following emergency brain surgery but the uncertainty of his long-term prognosis casts doubt on the nation's political landscape.

Adm. John Eisold, attending physician of the U.S. Capitol, said in a statement the two-term senator has not required further surgery since doctors at George Washington University overnight stopped bleeding. The condition, caused by a malformation of blood vessels, is congenital. It was undiagnosed in Johnson, who turns 60 on Dec. 28.

ON DEADLINE: More details

Johnson was stricken Wednesday afternoon, as he had trouble talking to reporters in a conference call. His illness comes as Democrats prepare to take control of the Senate on Jan. 4 with 51 votes, including those of two independents.

If Johnson is unable to complete the remaining two years of his term, it would be up to South Dakota's Republican Gov. Mike Rounds to appoint a replacement, presumably from his party.

That would shift the balance of power in the Senate to the GOP because Vice President Cheney, a Republican, would cast the vote to break a 50-50 tie.

Republicans at the Capitol showed no signs that they will press for Johnson to resign. Johnson, first elected in 1996, is up for re-election in 2008.

"My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back," Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who will serve as his party's deputy leader next year, said on Fox News. "I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want it to be that way."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he is continuing to organize for a Senate run by his party. "There isn't a thing that has changed," said Reid, after visiting Johnson at the hospital. "To me, he looked very good."

Wishes for Johnson's recovery came from lawmakers in both parties and President Bush.

"Our prayers are with Sen. Johnson," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "He's a great guy."

Eisold on Thursday morning called it "premature" to forecast the senator's long-term prognosis, or whether he will need more surgery. Patients with Johnson's condition frequently require a second operation to remove the problem blood vessels, according Sean Grady, chief of neurosurgery at the University of Pennsylvania.

Grady said such operations "can pose a very high risk" depending on where the damaged blood vessels are in the brain.

What The Fate Of Johnson's Seat May Portend (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Sarah Lueck
The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- "There isn't a thing that's changed," Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid said yesterday after visiting his stricken colleague, South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson, at the hospital. But Democrats were trying to shake off the nightmare of possibly losing power so quickly after November's elections.

The soft-spoken 59-year-old senator was listed in critical condition after surgery to address bleeding in the brain. Mr. Johnson's family was hopeful for his recovery from what doctors called an arteriovenous malformation, a tangle of blood vessels, usually present from birth, that caused bleeding in his brain. The next 48 hours could tell a lot after surgery to remove the blood and help stabilize the malformation.

But rarely has a senator been stricken in office with more potential impact politically. Since sweeping the midterm elections last month, Senate Democrats have been celebrating the 51 votes they will claim in January. But that power and the accompanying committee chairmanships would slip away if Mr. Johnson doesn't recover and is succeeded by an appointed Republican.

The House will remain Democratic, and incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California already is moving ahead with her own agenda of ethics overhaul, tighter intelligence oversight and other initiatives separate from the Senate. But she and other top House Democrats have close ties with Senate Democratic leaders, many of whom, like Mr. Reid, began their careers in the House. Loss of the Senate would be deeply felt and make it easier for President Bush to try to stare down Congress and isolate the House.

The extent of any lasting brain damage Mr. Johnson may have suffered was unclear. In general, recovery time for such an ailment can range from four to six weeks to as much as six months or a year if the damage is more severe, said M. Sean Grady, chairman of the neurosurgery department at the University of Pennsylvania Health System in Philadelphia.

If Mr. Johnson is recovering but still hospitalized when the new Congress convenes in January, Democrats would retain a 50-49 majority and be able to organize under Mr. Reid. But dates here mean less since, unlike the House, Senate rules permit that body to reorganize at a later date in the new Congress if the balance of power changes.

Under South Dakota law, if a senator dies or resigns, a successor will be named by the sitting governor to serve until the next general election. South Dakota's governor is Michael Rounds, a Republican. Even before Mr. Johnson's cerebral hemorrhage this week, Mr. Rounds was a recruitment target for national Republicans wanting him to challenge the senator in 2008. These ambitions could shape Mr. Rounds's decision, but he must be sensitive to South Dakota's sentiments if he is to run for the seat in two years.

Less clear is what happens if Mr. Johnson is left incapacitated and pressure builds for him to resign. "There are only two things I'm aware of that would create a vacancy at that level ... death or resignation," said Chris Nelson, South Dakota's secretary of state.

Senate history is peppered with examples of senators staying away for months because of illness or surgery. Republican Sen. Karl Mundt, also of South Dakota, stopped appearing in the Senate after being disabled by a stroke in 1969, but he remained in office until his term expired in 1972.

Mr. Mundt's chief of staff, Robert McCaughey, ran the office, and recalled in an interview yesterday that he couldn't vote or speak for Mr. Mundt at committee meetings. But he briefed Mr. Mundt nearly every day as the senator sat in an easy chair in his home two blocks from the office. Mr. Mundt could speak haltingly and followed Senate business, but didn't always understand conversation, Mr. McCaughey said.

He said he wanted Mr. Mundt, a longtime friend and employer, to resign his seat, but faced opposition from Mrs. Mundt. "He wasn't able to carry out his duties," said Mr. McCaughey. "I felt he was taking a voice from the people of South Dakota." At one point, South Dakota's Republican governor -- fearing a loss of the governorship to a Democrat in 1970 -- pleaded personally with Mr. Mundt to resign. "He didn't seem to understand that he should resign," Mr. McCaughey said.

If Mr. Johnson is succeeded by a Republican, the Senate would be split 50-50, much as it was after the 2000 elections when the two parties had to work out a historic power-sharing relationship. With Vice President Dick Cheney available to break any tie, Republicans retained the majority and chairmanships. But many of the committees were split evenly and special deference was given to the Democratic leadership to make a motion to call up legislation.

Among individual committees, a shift in chairmanships can be significant. Sen. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) the new Armed Services Committee chairman, wants the U.S. to begin to withdraw from Iraq, for example; Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), who would succeed him, wants more troops sent.

Sens. Barbara Boxer (D., Calif.) and James Inhofe (R., Okla.), who would trade places at the Environment and Public Works Committee, are at opposite ends of the spectrum on issues like global warming. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) is much more a friend of labor than Sen. Michael Enzi (R., Wyo.), who would reclaim the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. And with a new farm bill in the offing, cotton and peanut interests would be delighted to have Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R., Ga.) take back the Senate Agriculture Committee from Sen. Tom Harkin (D., Iowa.)

But lost in such speculation is the fact that whoever is chairman, nothing gets done in the Senate unless there is some larger consensus on the floor. As well as consigning them to the minority, November's elections left their mark on the mind-set of surviving Republicans as well.

When Sen. Joseph Biden (D., Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, announced January hearings on the administration's Iraq policy, for example, former Chairman Richard Lugar (R., Ind.) was supportive. And in the closing days of the 109th Congress last week, individual Republicans were showing more independence on budget and other issues from the White House, which can't expect the same level of support as in the past, whoever is in charge.

As A Senator Is Felled, A January Vote Looms Big (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, December 15, 2006

The incapacitation of South Dakota Senator Tim Johnson has put all eyes in Washington on what is normally a little-noticed Senate vote now scheduled for Jan. 4. It is called the "organizing resolution," and is the bit of internal housekeeping that determines how committee memberships will be allotted between the two parties, as well as who will get to serve as chairman and ranking members of each of the panels. These resolutions traditionally stand until the next Congress, even if the makeup of the chamber shifts to put the other party in the majority, which is why precedent would seem to dictate that the Chamber would stay in Democratic hands, even if Johnson is replaced by a Republican.

But don't count on it this time. Even if Johnson ultimately recovers from the congenital blood disorder known as arteriovenous malformation, which required emergency surgery Wednesday night, it now looks highly unlikely that he will healthy enough to vote on Jan. 4. With Johnson unable to vote, Democrats still have enough votes to win, with 50 votes (including the two independent Senators, Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont) to 49 for the Republicans. But Democrats now fear the real possibility that Republicans will filibuster that resolution. They could insist — just as the Democrats did after the 2000 election that left the chamber evenly split, with Vice President Dick Cheney as the tie-breaker and one Republican Senator seriously ill — on an "out clause" that stipulates that control of the chamber goes to them if they somehow manage to achieve a majority during the course of the session. As both sides remember, that clause came in handy for the Democrats a few months later, when Vermont's Jim Jeffords abruptly declared himself an independent and gave the Democrats a one-vote majority. And the same thing could happen again, if Johnson or any other Democrat is replaced by a Republican ovr the course of the session.

If the Republicans filibuster, and the question drags on into January or even beyond, it presents another truly extraordinary possibility: a chamber with a new Democratic leader, but the existing set of Republican committee chairmen. That is because, until an organizing resolution is passed, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid would have no control over the committees.

Ill Senator Is Called Responsive (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — Senator Tim Johnson, Democrat of South Dakota, was said to be in critical condition but "responsive" Thursday after an operation to stop bleeding in his brain, and Democrats declared that his condition would not imperil the narrow majority they will carry into the Senate next month.

The attending physician of the Capitol, Adm. John F. Eisold, who examined Mr. Johnson before he was sent to the hospital Wednesday, said the bleeding was caused by a rare tangling of the blood vessels in the brain, known as a congenital arteriovenous malformation, that physicians say often goes undetected. The operation successfully drained the blood and stabilized the problem, Admiral Eisold said in a statement released by Mr. Johnson's office.

"He has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch," Admiral Eisold said. "No further surgical intervention has been required."

For a second day, Washington and the political world were riveted by Mr. Johnson's condition and the possibility that it could undo the result of last month's Senate elections, which gave control of the chamber to the Democrats. While emphasizing that they were concerned only for Mr. Johnson and his family, members of both parties could not escape the dramatic if hypothetical implications should he die or be unable to continue in office: that South Dakota's Republican governor would name a replacement for the next two years and, assuming that replacement was a Republican, shift control of the Senate back to President Bush's party.

Mr. Johnson, who had attracted little attention outside of agriculture circles in his 10 years in the Senate and decade in the House, was suddenly in the spotlight, with cable news channels breaking in with every update on his progress.

Late in the afternoon, Mr. Johnson's wife, Barbara, said in a statement that he was responding to her voice and following directions after the operation, which began late Wednesday, and that he was reaching for her hand and holding it by Thursday morning.

A spokesman for Mr. Johnson said his doctors were watching to see whether bleeding recurred in the next 48 to 72 hours.

Doctors who specialize in the condition said that in the overwhelming majority of cases the bleeding does not cause long-term damage, particularly for someone who showed the symptoms Mr. Johnson did. But they said the outcome might not be known for weeks or months.

According to precedent, Mr. Johnson, who will turn 60 on Dec. 28, would lose his seat only if he died or resigned. In that case, Gov. Mike Rounds would choose a replacement to fill the vacancy until a special election in November 2008.

Even if Mr. Johnson is unable to vote in January, the Democrats would have a 50-49 majority in the Senate, which would allow them to pass a series of resolutions awarding them chairmanships and majority membership of committees.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, appeared before reporters and cameras on Thursday morning and said that he had just visited Mr. Johnson in his room and that "he looked great."

Mr. Reid declined to say whether he believed Mr. Johnson looked well enough to be able to return to the Senate, saying that anything he said would only raise more questions among reporters. "To me," he said, "he looked very good."

Mr. Reid, who spent much of Wednesday at the hospital, also said that he had spoken to Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the incoming Republican leader, and that both sides in the Senate were proceeding as they were before Mr. Johnson's illness, with the Democrats expecting to assume their 51-49 majority.

"There isn't a thing that changes," Mr. Reid said, adding that the Republicans selected names for their smaller memberships of committees on Wednesday.

Mr. Johnson's illness highlighted the fragility of the Democrats' new majority. The Senate press gallery handed out copies of the relevant provisions of South Dakota election law, as well a special organizing resolution passed in 2001, when the Senate was split 50-50, that outlined how the two parties shared power.

In the South Dakota capital, Mr. Rounds appealed for prayers for the senator — not speculation about what would happen if he died.

Even some Republican lawmakers and aides criticized news coverage of Mr. Johnson's illness as ghoulish, saying it put too much emphasis on who would control the Senate and not enough on his health. Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, who is to become the No. 2 Republican in the Senate in January, brushed off questions about procedures if the membership split 50-50. "We don't even want to talk about that," he told Fox News, adding, "I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want to do it that way."

Mr. McConnell issued a statement titled "The recovery of Senator Tim Johnson" — emphasis on recovery. "I know all my Senate colleagues join me in praying for Senator Johnson's full and speedy recovery," he said. "Our thoughts are with his wife, Barbara, and his family during this time."

Mr. Reid said Mr. McConnell was "thoughtful" in a telephone conversation Wednesday. And Democratic aides said they had not received any Republican requests to discuss any power-sharing rules.

An estimated 300,000 Americans have arteriovenous malformations, said Dr. Jay P. Mohr, the principal investigator in a National Institutes of Health study of the condition and the director of the stroke center at Columbia University Medical Center. Most cases go undetected, Dr. Mohr said, and there is bleeding in only about 30,000. Of the patients with bleeding, Dr. Mohr said, only about 10 percent to 20 percent suffer damage severe enough that they can no longer function as they did before. About half are left with such minor problems, he said, that "they aren't sure they had a stroke."

Noah Pinegar, a spokesman for Mr. Johnson, said the senator began to stutter midday Wednesday during his weekly conference call with reporters from the Senate recording studio in the Capitol, then recovered and ended the call. He then walked back to his office across the street. Aides said that he seemed weak, but that he did not collapse as a Senate official had said earlier, and they summoned Admiral Eisold. The doctor sent Mr. Johnson by ambulance to George Washington University Hospital, where he underwent tests before the operation.

Specialists in the condition, while emphasizing that they did not know the specifics of Mr. Johnson's case, varied in their assessment of the likely damage. Dr. Mohr said that what had been reported — that Mr. Johnson could still hold the phone and walk — "suggests to me that the brain was not totally destroyed." Very likely, he said, doctors discovered blood that had leaked in the ventricles, which could be removed "with very little damage to the adjacent brain."

"He was able to get up and walk around and report to a local hospital," Dr. Mohr said. "These are the things that could make for a favorable result."

Good Wishes Pour In For Sen. Johnson (USAT)

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — The new, artificial Christmas tree for Sen. Tim Johnson's office here remained unopened in a long cardboard box. Instead, Johnson's office was filled Thursday with flowers and cards brought by a steady stream of well-wishers rooting for the senator's recovery from brain surgery.

One card was delivered by Benjamin Ready, a field representative for Republican Sen. John Thune. Johnson, a Democrat, beat Thune by 524 votes in the closest Senate race of 2002. When Thune was elected to the Senate two years later, the home-state colleagues vowed to make their Senate relationship work.

That bipartisan cooperation was evident after Johnson's surgery.

"They've been wonderful," Johnson's field representative Sharon Boysen said of Thune's staff.

Rep. Stephanie Herseth, a Democrat and the state's lone member of the House of Representatives, and her staff "brought us lunch today," Boysen said. "There were Krispy Kremes here this morning." Boysen called the outpouring from the state "amazing."

Johnson's willingness to build a relationship with former rival Thune has become a model in the Senate. As South Dakota's senior senator lay in critical condition at George Washington University Hospital in the nation's capital, Johnson's Senate colleagues were following a page from his playbook.

"I know all my Senate colleagues join me in praying for Senator Johnson's full and speedy recovery," incoming Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said in a statement.

Last month's election gave the Republicans 49 votes in the Senate and the Democrats 51, including Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and Bernie Sanders of Vermont, elected as independents. Sanders and Lieberman voted for Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., as their leader and have said they will align and vote with the Democratic caucus next term.

If Johnson cannot finish his term and GOP Gov. Mike Rounds appoints someone from his own party as a replacement, power will shift to Republicans because in a 50-50 Senate, Vice President Cheney would break a tie.

No member of Congress has ever been forced out of office for reasons of physical infirmity, according to John Fortier of the American Enterprise Institute.

Fortier studied the history of congressional succession as executive director of the Continuity of Government Commission, a group formed after the 9/11 attacks to determine how Congress could continue if many members became incapacitated. During the 1940s, he said, the Virginia Legislature tried to remove Carter Glass, a Senate Democrat who missed nearly four years of votes before dying in office at the age of 84. That move, Fortier said, "didn't get very far."

South Dakota Sen. Karl Mundt, a Republican, offered to resign after being paralyzed by a stroke in 1969 but only on the condition that his wife be appointed in his place, said Donald Ritchie of the Senate Historical Office. Mundt's request was denied by South Dakota's governor, and the senator remained in office for more than three years, until his term expired. Ritchie said senators have not pressured ailing colleagues to leave.

"The Senate has never vacated a seat," he said. "It has always left that decision to the senator, the family or the voters."

Peter Harriman writes daily for the Argus Leader in Sioux Falls, S.D. Kiely reported from Washington.

Johnson 'Critical' After Surgery (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson remained in critical condition last night from surgery to relieve bleeding inside his brain and untangle a malformation of arteries, although doctors and aides said his recovery from the major surgery was going on "without complication."

The South Dakota Democrat, who turns 60 this month, "was found to have had an intracerebral bleed caused by a congenital arteriovenous malformation," said Adm. John Eisold, the attending physician of the U.S. Capitol. "He underwent successful surgery to evacuate the blood and stabilize the malformation."

During a brief press conference yesterday morning, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid, who had spent much of the previous 24 hours at George Washington University Hospital with Mr. Johnson, said the senator "looks great." He declined to answer any specific medical questions.

Late yesterday afternoon, Dr. Eisold issued another statement saying that Mr. Johnson, "has continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course. Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch."

It is premature, he said, "to determine whether further surgery will be required or to assess any long-term prognosis."

The senator also underwent an additional procedure to prevent blood clots, which Johnson spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said was standard after the surgery. His office also said Mr. Johnson was responsive to his wife's voice.

It is also premature, aides on Capitol Hill said, to determine what affect Mr. Johnson's ailment might have on the Senate, where Democrats will enjoy a 51-49 caucus advantage over Republicans when the next session of Congress begins next month.

If Mr. Johnson becomes unable to continue serving as the senior senator from South Dakota, a replacement would be named by the state's Republican governor, Michael Rounds. If Mr. Rounds were to choose a Republican as a replacement, it would give the party -- with Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote -- a one-seat advantage.

Well before Mr. Johnson's illness surfaced Wednesday during a telephone interview with reporters, Senate Republicans had been negotiating with Democrats about the exact wording of the organizing resolution that is the first vote by the Senate and establishes ground rules for how the Senate operates.

Normally, there is no provision to allow control to change hands in mid-Congress -- even if the party that controls the chamber, for some reason, loses its majority.

In 2001, the last time the Senate teetered on such a narrow margin, Republicans allowed a clause to be included in the organizing resolution that would change control of the chamber if they lost their slim majority. A few months later, when Sen. James M. Jeffords of Vermont quit the Republican Party and caucused with Democrats, that clause gave Democrats control of the chamber.

Senate Republicans have argued to include the same clause in the upcoming organizing resolution but dropped any public reference to it since Mr. Johnson became ill. Yesterday, they were steering reporters' questions away from any calculations about any change in power.

Incoming Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, issued a statement "on the recovery of" Mr. Johnson.

"I know all my Senate colleagues join me in praying for Senator Johnson's full and speedy recovery," he said. "Our thoughts are with his wife, Barbara, and his family during this time."

Democratic Senator Survives Brain Surgery (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - Democrats said Thursday that they expect to take control of the Senate next month as planned, after Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota survived emergency brain surgery hours earlier.

The Capitol's physician, Adm. John Eisold, said an operation to drain blood from Johnson's brain had been successful and that he was "recovering without complication." Nevertheless, the 59-year-old Democrat remained in critical condition.

Aides and lawmakers wouldn't say whether Johnson would be able to return to work when the Senate convenes on Jan. 4, 2007 - or even if Johnson was conscious after surgery.

What mattered from a political perspective was that he was alive. A senator can be incapacitated or indefinitely absent without relinquishing his or her seat. If Johnson remains in office, Democrats will run the Senate with a 51-49 majority. (Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut won re-election as an Independent, but has vowed to join the Democrats for organizing purposes. So has Independent Bernie Sanders of Vermont.) Democrats also won a 31-seat majority - 233-202- in the House of Representatives in November's elections.

However, If Johnson were to vacate his Senate seat, South Dakota's Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, would name a replacement to serve the final two years of Johnson's term.

If Rounds appointed a Republican, that would lead to a 50-50 partisan split in the Senate, with Vice President Dick Cheney, a Republican, having the power to cast tie-breaking votes - including on top leadership posts and how committees are organized, said Senate historian Richard Baker. In that scenario, the Democrats' dramatic victory in November's mid-term Senate elections could be lost before they ever take power.

But that seemed increasingly unlikely Thursday.

"There isn't a thing that's changed," Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the next majority leader, said in a midday update after briefing Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., the next minority leader. "The Republicans selected their committees yesterday. We've completed ours. . . .

"We're all praying for a full recovery," Reid said. "We're confident that will be the case."

Reid spent much of the previous night at the George Washington University Hospital. Johnson was rushed there Wednesday afternoon from Capitol Hill after becoming disoriented and suffering other stroke-like symptoms. Other lawmakers and friends stopped by the hospital throughout the day Thursday.

Doctors ruled out a stroke or heart attack. Instead, they determined that Johnson has a congenital malformation that causes blood vessels in the brain to tangle and burst.

Eisold said Thursday morning that it was too soon to know Johnson's long-term prognosis or whether he would need another operation.

At 5 p.m., Johnson's office issued a second statement from Eisold, saying that Johnson "has continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course. Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required."

Johnson's staff seemed upbeat. Around noon, several of his staff members gathered privately for pizza. One told a visitor, "He's going to be fine."

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who'll be the second-ranking Republican in the next Senate, told Fox News: "My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back and we'll go to work. You know, I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want to do it that way."

In the 20th century, several senators took extended absences for illness without resigning, historian Baker said.

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., missed seven months after surgery for a brain aneurysm in 1988. He's now incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Karl Mundt, a South Dakota Republican, had a debilitating stroke in 1969 but refused to leave until his term was up in January 1973.

Clair Engle, a California Democrat, could not talk or walk after brain cancer surgeries, but was brought into the chamber for a key vote on the Civil Rights Act of 1964 the month before he died.

Senator Tim Johnson Has Brain Surgery, Doctor Says (Update6) (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- Senator Tim Johnson underwent surgery to relieve bleeding in his brain and treat a congenital malformation of his arteries, his doctor said. Control of the new U.S. Senate may depend on Johnson's health.

Johnson, 59, is having an "uncomplicated" recovery, is responsive to word and touch and has not needed further surgery, Admiral John Eisold, the attending physician of the U.S. Capitol, said in a statement this afternoon.

Eisold said earlier today that Johnson "was found to have had an intracerebral bleed caused by a congenital arteriovenous malformation." He underwent "successful surgery to evacuate the blood and stabilize the malformation."

Johnson's wife Barbara said in a statement that after the surgery, Johnson was responding to her voice, following instructions, and reaching for and holding her hand.

He is in critical condition, said an aide to Johnson who asked to remain anonymous.

Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat, was taken by ambulance to George Washington University Hospital in Washington yesterday afternoon after becoming disoriented during a conference call with reporters.

Democrats would have a 51-49 majority in the next session of Congress that begins Jan. 4 if Johnson retains his seat. If his seat were to become vacant, South Dakota Governor Mike Rounds, a Republican, may appoint a Republican replacement, shifting the partisan balance to 50-50 and giving Republicans control through the tie-breaking vote of Vice President Dick Cheney.

Split

The Senate had a 50-50 split between Democrats and Republicans following the 2000 election. The parties negotiated a power-sharing arrangement under which Republican senators chaired committees that had equal numbers of Democrats and Republicans. Leaders of both parties shared control of legislation reaching the Senate floor.

Democrats took the majority back five months later when Senator James Jeffords of Vermont quit the Republican Party and became an independent who voted with the Democrats.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who recovered from a mild stroke last year, said Johnson looked good during a visit at the hospital and is confident he will have a full recovery.

"There isn't a thing that has changed," regarding Democratic control of the Senate in the next Congress, Reid said.

Confident

Johnson is one of 26 Democratic senators whose death or resignation would jeopardize Democrats' control of the chamber because their successor would be appointed by a Republican governor. That number will fall to 18 in January when the governorships of Arkansas, Colorado, Maryland, Massachusetts and New York switch to Democratic from Republican control.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said at a press conference today that Johnson "is recovering and we are hopefully going to get some good news." She refused to address how his illness might determine control of the Senate.

First lady Laura Bush said she and President George W. Bush learned of Johnson's condition this morning.

"We're praying, like I know all the people of South Dakota are, for his very, very speedy recovery," she said in an interview on CBS's "Early Show."

Vacancies

DOJ_NMG_0106919

While vacancies aren't uncommon in the Senate, they can only occur "by death or resignation," said Richard Baker, the Senate historian.

"There either has to be a death certificate or there has to be a letter of resignation," he said. "Nobody has the power to determine a vacancy for a person who is still living."

Some lawmakers in the past have kept their seats in spite of long illnesses.

In 1969, South Dakota Senator Karl Mundt, a Republican, suffered a stroke that prevented him from voting, according to Slate, an Internet-based daily magazine. He kept his seat for three more years after South Dakota's governor refused his request to appoint Mundt's wife to replace him, Slate reported.

In the 1940s, Senator Carter Glass of Virginia, an 87-year- old Democrat, failed to vote for two years of votes due to illness while refusing calls to retire, Slate reported.

Johnson became disoriented while on a conference call with South Dakota and regional reporters at about 11:45 a.m. Washington time yesterday, according to Noah Pinegar, an aide to the senator.

Stutter

Johnson appeared to stutter in response to a question, then seemed to recover, asking if there were any additional questions before signing off, the Associated Press reported.

Johnson later walked with aides from the Capitol back to his office in the Hart Senate Office Building, a distance of about two city blocks, Pinegar said. Aides called the Capitol's attending physician, and Johnson was later taken by ambulance to the hospital. Johnson was conscious and talking throughout, Pinegar said.

Johnson went into brain surgery at approximately 7 p.m. Washington time last night and emerged at 12:30 a.m. today, according to Julianne Fisher, Johnson's spokeswoman.

"He came through the surgery and is doing well," she said.

The extent of impairment to Johnson's motor and cognitive functions is likely to become clear over the next two to three days, Fisher said.

"After having a surgery like this, the thing to do is wait," Fisher said.

Larry B. Goldstein, a Duke University neurologist, said it appears that Johnson was born with a malformation of brain blood vessels that burst, causing a type of stroke.

'No Symptoms'

"They can cause absolutely no symptoms for a lifetime or they can cause bleeding without warning," Goldstein, a spokesman for the American Stroke Association, said in a telephone interview today.

Johnson's surgeons would have performed an operation to remove the blood clot and seal off the weakened vessels using one of several approaches, Goldstein said. Strokes can alter speech, memory, personality, vision, gait, and the ability to move one's arms and legs.

"There could be no consequences or, if it's an important area of the brain and it's a large area, they could be severe," Goldstein said.

Johnson, an advocate for U.S. farmers and agricultural commodity producers, is in his second term in the Senate. He was re-elected in 2002 by just 528 votes out of more than 334,000 cast. An attorney, he had served five terms in the House of Representatives from 1986 to 1996 before winning his Senate seat. He is up for re-election in 2008.

Control Of Senate At Issue As Sen. Johnson Undergoes Brain Surgery (CQ)

By Martin Kady II

Congressional Quarterly, December 15, 2006

UPDATE (5 p.m.) — Johnson's office has released the following statement: "Admiral John Eisold, Attending Physician of the United States Capitol said, 'Senator Tim Johnson has continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course. Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required.'"

Written by Martin Kady II and Martha Angle.

Sen. Tim Johnson remained in critical condition in George Washington University Hospital on Thursday following surgery for bleeding in the brain, as Capitol Hill swirled with speculation about the impact of his condition on control of the Senate in the 110th Congress.

Admiral John Eisold, attending physician of the U.S. Capitol, said in a statement Thursday morning, "Subsequent to his admission to George Washington University Hospital yesterday, Senator Tim Johnson was found to have had an intracerebral bleed caused by a congenital arteriovenous malformation. He underwent successful surgery to evacuate the blood and stabilize the malformation."

The statement said Johnson was "recovering without complication in the critical care unit," but cautioned it was "premature to determine whether further surgery will be required or to assess any long-term prognosis."

Johnson's condition immediately raised questions about control of the Senate in the 110th Congress, which convenes Jan. 4. Democrats won a 51-49 edge in the November elections, but the Senate cannot function without the adoption of an organizing resolution.

That resolution is subject to filibuster, and if Republicans refused to adopt it on grounds that Johnson is incapacitated and incompetent to fulfill his duties, the chamber would be at a standstill. At the same time, only Johnson himself — or his family, acting under a power of attorney — could resign his seat, creating a vacancy that South Dakota's Republican governor would fill. A Republican successor would create a 50-50 tie, giving the GOP operational control as a result of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

If Johnson survives, the Democrats would still be in control by 50-49 until and unless he resigned.

The South Dakota Democrat was admitted to the hospital at midday Wednesday after being examined at his Capitol Hill office by a Senate physician. Johnson, who will turn 60 in two weeks, realized something was wrong when he stuttered inexplicably during a conference call interview with reporters earlier in the day.

If Johnson dies or resigns before the end of his term, which runs through 2008, an interim replacement would be appointed by South Dakota Republican Gov. Mike Rounds to serve the remainder of his term. The seat would be filled permanently in the regular 2008 November general election.

Such a scenario would create a 50-50 Senate tie in the 110th Congress, with Cheney giving the GOP control. That was the situation that prevailed at the start of the 107th Congress, when the 2000 elections resulted in a 50-50 tie. Democrats held up adoption of an organizing resolution for months while they negotiated equal representation on all Senate committees and an even division of staff and budgets. But all chairmanships and control of the Senate floor remained with Republicans.

In June 2001, Republican James M. Jeffords of Vermont left the GOP and became an independent aligned with Democrats, shifting control of the Senate to them for the remainder of that Congress. Reid at Johnson's Bedside

Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada, who is in line to become the new Senate majority leader next month, rushed to the hospital on Wednesday after Johnson was transported there and returned to his colleague's bedside again Thursday morning. He was joined by former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota, who is a close friend of Johnson's.

Reid told reporters Thursday that Johnson "really looks good." But he refused to answer questions about whether the senator was conscious and did not answer directly when asked whether Johnson would be able to serve in the new Congress.

"We all pray for a full recovery and believe that will be the case," Reid said.

Asked about the impact on control of the Senate, Reid said, "There isn't a thing that has changed."

He said he had talked with Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., who will be the top GOP leader in the new Congress, but their conversation focused on Johnson's health, not the impact of his condition on organizing the Senate.

Democrats were proceeding with their preparations for the new Congress on the assumption that they will be in control.

Johnson, who was expected to chair the Ethics Committee, was first elected to the Senate in 1996 after serving five terms in the House. He won re-election in 2002, narrowly defeating Republican John Thune, who went on to oust Daschle from the Senate in 2004 and his now Johnson's colleague.

Johnson is a cancer survivor, having undergone successful surgery for prostate cancer in 2004. No Exact Precedent

Never in Senate history has a death or vacancy switched the balance of power in the way it would if Johnson died or resigned, according to the Senate Historian Don Ritchie. In the House, however, the balance of power switched in 1930 between the November election and the start of the new Congress. Back then, a new Congress was sworn in the March after the election. A total of 14 members died and a variety of special elections switched control of the House from Republicans to Democrats by the time the Congress was actually seated in December 1931, Ritchie said.

In the Senate, no such power shift has ever taken place. During the 83rd Congress, in 1953-1954, Republicans started with a small majority, but nine members died throughout that Congress, giving Democrats the voting majority. However, Republicans maintained formal control of the chamber because the organizing resolution had already been adopted and Republicans could have filibustered any new one that switched control to the Democrats.

Johnson's situation is unique because there is no Congress in session, and his long- term prognosis is uncertain. His family, through its power of attorney, does have the power to resign on his behalf if necessary.

That occurred in Maryland's 5th District a quarter-century ago. Rep. Gladys Noon Spellman, D-Md., suffered a massive heart attack in 1980 but won re-election. She never recovered, however, and her family said she could not serve. Democrat Steny H. Hoyer, who will serve as the House majority leader in the 110th Congress, was elected to succeed her in a special election.

Johnson does not need to be sworn in at the beginning of the 110th Congress because he is in the middle of his term.

DOJ_NMG_0106921

Even if Johnson remains unable to attend to his regular Senate duties for a long period, he can still remain in office, according to Senate historian Richard Baker. There is no constitutional provision for the removal of incapacitated senators.

On the contrary, there is ample precedent for senators being absent for long periods due to health issues, including a former senator from South Dakota, who suffered a stroke in 1969. Republican Sen. Karl Earl Mundt (1948-1973) remained technically in office through the final years of his last term because he refused to resign.

In 1964, California Democrat Clair Engle (1959-1964), who had been absent from the Senate for months due to a brain tumor that had paralyzed him, was wheeled into the Senate on a gurney during the roll call vote on the landmark 1964 Civil Rights Act. Unable to speak, when his name was called, he lifted his arm and pointed to his eye, indicating an "aye" vote. He died in office.

More recently, in 1988, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., took a seven-month leave of absence to recover from brain surgery.

Baker said, given the history and tradition of the Senate, a senator remains a senator "as long as he's alive and breathing."

I think that whatever happens with the technicalities, the Congress should respect the wishes of the voters, who clearly stated their desire for who should lead our country. To swoop in and wrest control seems despicable and opportunistic.

If it comes down to an appointment, wouldn't it be something if Gov. Rounds appointed a Dem. After all, the people of SD elected a Dem. It would be an approriate honoring to Sen Johnson and his family. Might even tend to unite our country.

It is unthinkable that the whim of a governor could change the balance of power in the congress as decided by the electorate.

As part of my exercising my obligations as a citizen, I have written to Senator Johnson at least once a month since the aftermath of Nov 2004 selection.

I follow his voting record and query him on it. I've urged him to initiate or participate in actions that would bring great changes to this status quo.

Senator Johnson has answered every letter, explaining his position both ideologically and politically in lengthy, literate and clear replies obviously written to me, in no way formated.

While he is not a grand-stander, his ego takes a back seat to getting things done for SD in a manner of bipartisanship that he must have had long before we lost Senator Daschle.

Finding info about him on the net under his hospital was difficult since most references were to meetings, speeches, agreements he was working with them for easing the burdens of seniors v Medicare. Behind the scenes yet in the top third of senatorial power brokers.

Why will the Senate have only 99 members "unless and until Johnson resigns"? That can happen only if Johnson doesn't vote. If you know that he can't vote in January, please cite your sources. In any case please explain why a 50-49 majority could result in a filibuster. Is it any less a majority than 51-49, or do you have information that a two vote margin would result in a filibuster?

Senator Recovering From Brain Surgery (CHIT)

By Christi Parsons And Jeremy Manier

Chicago Tribune, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Colleagues kept a close watch Thursday on Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) as he recovered from brain surgery in a local hospital, offering hopeful reports about his condition while also quietly calculating its potential to determine control of the Senate for the next two years.

Democrats emerged from Johnson's hospital room saying he was doing well in the day following his surgery, although neither prospective Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid nor former Sen. Tom Daschle of South Dakota gave details about Johnson's health. Adm. John Eisold, the Capitol physician, said Johnson had been "responsive to both word and touch" and that he didn't immediately need any more surgery.

Johnson was responding to the voice of his wife, Barbara, and following directions after the surgery, the senator's office said in a statement, adding, "He was reaching for and holding her hand."

While friends adopted a positive tone about Johnson's state of health, staffers and elected officials were analyzing every conceivable version of political events to come over the next few weeks, during which time Democrats have been expecting to assume control of the Senate. If Johnson, 59, were to resign, Republican Gov. Mike Rounds of South Dakota could appoint any replacement he wished.

Reid (D-Nev.) said there is no reason to think Democrats would not take the reins when the new Congress takes office. Johnson "really looks good" and friends are "confident" of his full recovery, he said after visiting the ailing two-term senator on Thursday.

"There isn't a thing that's changed," Reid said. "I have a very busy schedule today, going ahead and getting ready for the next year."

As long as a senator is alive, there is no way to legally remove him or her from office for health reasons, experts said. The Democrats are set to have a 51-49 majority in January. If Johnson were unable to attend the organizational Senate session and cast a vote, the Democrats and one independent could still vote 50-49 to install Reid and other Democrats in positions of leadership for the next two years.

But Johnson's resignation or death would most likely mean a Republican replacement and therefore a 50-50 split, with Republican Vice President Dick Cheney, who serves as president of the Senate, holding the tie-breaking vote.

Eisold said that Johnson had sustained an intracerebral bleed caused by a malformation of arteries, and that he underwent surgery to evacuate the blood. He said Johnson's surgery was successful and that, as of late Thursday, he had "continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course." Specialists say it can take days to wake up after the kind of emergency surgery Johnson underwent late Wednesday.

More than 90 percent of patients who suffer a brain hemorrhage like Johnson's make a good recovery, though it is common for that process to take several months, experts said. Key points to watch will be whether the senator can hold a conversation, make normal movements and avoid a potentially fatal recurrence of bleeding.

"This condition has a better prognosis than most serious illnesses," said Dr. Matthew Fink, chief of stroke and critical care neurology at the New York-Presbyterian Hospital/Weill Cornell Medical Center.

Although Johnson's office said Wednesday that he did not have a stroke, medical experts said that is the correct term whenever a patient experiences bleeding in the brain, as Johnson did. In his case, the stroke stemmed from a rare condition in which some major arteries and veins in the brain are connected directly, rather than through a series of smaller blood vessels.

That direct connection produces strain akin to plugging a home appliance into a main power generator, said Dr. Mark Alberts, head of the stroke program at Northwestern University. Over time the strain can weaken veins in the brain and cause them to rupture.

Assuming Johnson's medical team caught his hemorrhage at an early stage, Johnson stands a good chance of recovering in a period of weeks to months, doctors said.

"It sounds like he's stable, which is good," Alberts said.

Once Johnson's doctors are sure they have treated the immediate problem of bleeding, they will need to fix, possibly through more surgery, his underlying disorder, whose technical name is arteriovenous malformation, or AVM. Only thorough treatment of the disorder can ensure that a patient will not experience bleeding again.

Although it is rare for patients to come through a serious stroke with no long-term effects, experts said Johnson's problem is somewhat less likely to produce long-term problems than a stroke caused by blockage of a major artery.

Just weeks after the fall elections spelled a dramatic turnaround of the House and Senate from Republican to Democratic control, Johnson's health scare could possibly mean a surprising reversal for the upper chamber.

But senators have held on to their seats despite serious health problems. One former South Dakota senator, Republican Karl Mundt, had a stroke in 1969 and then refused to resign until January 1973, said Senate historian Richard Baker.

More recently, Sen. David Pryor (D-Ark.) suffered a heart attack in 1991 and was out from April until September of that year. Sen. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.) was out for several months in 1988 as a result of a brain aneurysm, Baker said.

And in 1964 Sen. Clair Engle (D-Calif.)—unable to speak because of a brain tumor—cast a critical "aye" vote for the Civil Rights Act by solemnly lifting his hand and pointing to his eye to signal affirmation.

Nothing in the Constitution, in law or in Senate rules provides for the ouster of a member for health reasons, Baker said.

"The Constitution has specific requirements for a senator, such as age, citizenship and residency, but not robust health," he said. "The idea was to give the Senate and its members independence."

Only once in history has control of the chamber changed in the middle of a session. In 2001, Sen. James Jeffords of Vermont, elected as a Republican, announced he would instead caucus with Democrats as an independent, giving Democrats a one-vote majority. And because of the narrowness of the majority prior to that, Democratic leaders had negotiated a deal at the beginning of that Congress that they would change party control if the majority shifted during the term, according to Baker.

In this case, Republicans may still try to negotiate such a deal before the new Congress is sworn in.

Senate Is Loath To Remove Disabled Members (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Carter Glass was the dean of the U.S. Senate and chairman of the Appropriations Committee when he became incapacitated with heart trouble in the 1940s. The enfeebled octogenarian was absent from the Capitol for four full years, unable to answer a roll call on the Senate floor, cut off from all visitors by his wife.

Local newspapers began to clamor for his resignation, but the Virginia Democrat refused. His Senate colleagues allowed Glass to keep his seat, and even his powerful chairmanship.

That was more than a half-century ago, but it illustrates an enduring tradition in one of the world's most exclusive clubs: Never has the Senate forced its members out of office because they have become physically or mentally incapable of serving.

That hands-off protocol could be a big boon to Democrats today, as they ponder the possibility that Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., could be incapacitated for months or longer following emergency surgery to treat bleeding in his brain. If Johnson dies or leaves office before the new Congress convenes next month, it will erase Democrats' fragile 51-49 majority and return control of the Senate to Republicans.

But if he survives and history is any guide, the only force that will drive Johnson from office before his term expires in 2008 is a decision by the senator himself or his family. The Senate -- not state governors or voters -- has the constitutional power to force a member out, but has been loathe to use it.

"No one in the Senate wants to have that kind of responsibility for judging whether another member is capable or not," said Don Ritchie, associate Senate historian. "The Senate is a family, as well as a club. There's a real sense of sticking together."

There have been a couple of examples of House seats being declared vacant because of inability to serve, but they involved cases where lawmakers were elected while incapacitated and were unable to take their seats. Most recently, Gladys Noon Spellman, a longtime House member from Maryland, suffered a heart attack and went into a coma shortly before election day in 1980, but her name remained on the ballot and she was re-elected. Because she was still in a coma when the new Congress convened, she was unable to be sworn in, and her family eventually asked that her seat be declared vacant.

Aging and infirm politicians are able to linger in the halls of Congress in part because they are surrounded by armies of aides who can obscure a distressing reality, both to the public and the politician.

Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who turned 100 while still in office, was so frail at the end of his career that he could hardly walk onto the Senate floor without gripping the arms of staff members.

"They made sure he showed up to vote, and that's what counted," said Ritchie.

But history is replete with examples of other infirm lawmakers who could not even show up to vote, talk or maintain consciousness -- and yet were allowed to keep their seats.

In the mid-19th century, Sen. Charles Sumner of Massachusetts was absent from the Senate for more than three years after being beaten with a cane on the Senate floor by Rep. Preston Brooks of South Carolina in a dispute over slavery. Despite Sumner's incapacity, the Massachusetts legislature re-elected him.

In 1964, a California Democrat voted in the Senate even when he could not speak. Clair Engle, partially paralyzed by repeated operations for brain cancer, was carried onto the Senate floor to cast a key vote on the Civil Rights Act. Voiceless, he pointed to his eye to signify an "aye" vote.

A previous occupant of Johnson's South Dakota Senate seat, Karl E. Mundt, suffered a debilitating stroke in 1969 and was in a coma for a long period of time. He refused to resign, even under pressure from fellow Republicans who feared the GOP would lose the governorship in 1970, and remained formally in his seat until his term expired in 1973.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., was away from the Senate for seven months in 1988 for brain surgery. While recovering at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, he shared a suite for three months with another incapacitated senator, John Stennis, D-Miss., who continued as chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee even after the loss of a leg to cancer slowed him considerably.

When Stennis' predecessor as Appropriations chairman, Glass, refused to quit, Virginia newspapers were near unanimous in calling for his retirement. The Staunton News Leader led the call with a mid-1945 editorial: "It is plainly the duty of Mrs. Carter Glass to make it clear to her husband that his age and physical condition disbar him from further duty in the Senate and to prevail on him to tender his resignation."

But Glass hung on, even though he was away from the Senate from June 1942 until his death in May 1946. It probably helped that he remained nominally in charge of the committee that holds Congress' purse strings.

"He was a powerful, influential senator, and no one wanted to remove him," said Ritchie.

Democratic Sen. Johnson In Stable Condition After Brain Surgery (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) was in stable condition yesterday after emergency brain surgery, prompting optimism among family and friends and at least temporarily stanching speculation that the Democrats' narrow control of the next Senate might be in jeopardy.

But Capitol aides predicted tough negotiations between the two parties early next month over the rules for organizing the new Senate, particularly those that would address the possibility that a Democratic seat could be vacated because of illness or death.

Even if Johnson recuperates fully, aides and advisers said, Democrats will be painfully aware that they remain one fatal illness -- or one party switch -- away from a Republican claim on their majority, which has stood at 51 to 49 since the Nov. 7 elections. The two parties may clash in particular over an agreement made in 2001 that enabled Democrats to seize the majority after one Republican senator switched parties. Republicans are likely to try to revive the precedent, according to the congressional aides, and Democrats are likely to fight it.

Johnson, 59, was rushed from his Senate office to George Washington University Hospital on Wednesday, suffering from bleeding in the brain caused by a congenital tangle of blood vessels, the U.S. Capitol physician said yesterday.

"He underwent successful surgery to evacuate the blood and stabilize the malformation," said the physician, Adm. John Eisold. He later said that Johnson "has continued to have an uncomplicated post-operative course. Specifically, he has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required."

Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and former party leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) visited Johnson at the hospital Wednesday and yesterday. Reid later told reporters at the Capitol that Johnson "really looks good" and was receiving "the best care." He declined to say whether Johnson was conscious during his visits.

The Constitution provides for governors to fill U.S. Senate vacancies, whereas House vacancies must be filled through elections. Johnson can remain in the Senate through the end of his term, regardless of his medical condition. In recent decades, senators have missed up to four years of votes because of illness or old age without giving up their seats.

Should Johnson's seat become vacant before Jan. 4, South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds, a Republican, could replace him with a Republican, resulting in a 50-50 Senate when Congress opens. Vice President Cheney, as Senate president, would break tie votes in the Republicans' favor, giving them the majority.

If Johnson's or any other Democrat's seat switches to the GOP after the new Senate is underway, however, even Cheney's tie-breaking powers could leave Republicans facing a difficult-to-impossible battle to seize control. Barring an agreement to the contrary, Democrats could filibuster efforts to reorganize the chamber and proceed to assume committee chairmanships.

"There isn't a thing that's changed," Reid said of his party's 51 to 49 edge. Both parties have made their committee assignments, he said, and he is "getting ready for the next year."

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) told Fox News: "My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back and we'll go to work. You know, I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want to do it that way."

Although Johnson's illness was the talk of Washington yesterday, politicians in both parties refrained from publicly discussing how the two-term senator's illness might affect the incoming 110th Congress. A few Democratic lobbyists and their spouses were dining Wednesday night at Sesto Senso, an Italian restaurant near Dupont Circle. As they discussed Johnson's condition, they folded their hands as if praying for him, a gesture that appeared tinged with political as well as heartfelt sentiments.

Daschle said in an interview: "I am encouraged. He is doing reasonably well. . . . There was progress today."

Reid would not entertain the possibility that Johnson's illness could conceivably cost his party the Senate majority before the 110th Congress convenes in three weeks.

Senate seats can become vacant between elections only by death or resignation. "There is no mechanism" to remove even a severely incapacitated senator against his or her will, said the associate Senate historian, Donald A. Ritchie. In the 1940s, he said, then-Sen. Carter Glass of Virginia missed four years of votes and other Senate activities yet held his seat.

In 1964, Ritchie said, then-Sen. Clair Engle of California was wheeled into the chamber despite suffering from a brain tumor. "He pointed to his eye" to indicate his "aye" vote for an important measure, Ritchie said.

If Johnson's recovery should leave him unable to attend the new Congress's opening, Democrats would still hold a 50 to 49 voting edge and the majority.

DOJ_NMG_0106925

Republicans have health concerns of their own. Sen. Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) won election to a third six-year term on Nov. 7 and began treatment for leukemia two days later. A Senate vacancy in Wyoming would be filled by Gov. Dave Freudenthal, a Democrat.

In 2001, Republicans controlled a 50-50 Senate, thanks to Cheney's tie-breaking authority. The chamber suddenly shifted to Democratic control when Sen. James M. Jeffords (Vt.) left the GOP and caucused with Democrats.

Republicans might have managed to thwart the power shift had they not agreed earlier to an organizing resolution granting majority privileges to Democrats if they achieved a numerical advantage. Without that agreement, Republicans might have been able to filibuster or otherwise block Democrats' efforts to reorganize the chamber in their favor.

Daschle negotiated the 2001 deal for his party. Asked if GOP leaders are likely to seek similar language in the next Senate's organizing resolution, Daschle said via e-mail that "it is reasonable to expect that the precedents we set in '00 and '01 will serve as a guide in '07."

Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) declined to comment on such matters yesterday, saying only that he wished Johnson a full and speedy recovery.

Reid's and McConnell's efforts to negotiate the next Senate's organizing rules could prove challenging, because both parties are in a position to block the rules' adoption through unlimited debate. Republicans might cite the 2001 language as a precedent, said Reid spokesman Jim Manley, but Democrats will note that the rules for the subsequent Senate -- which Republicans controlled 51 to 49 -- contained no such provisions.

Congressional aides said the 51 to 49 Democratic edge could play into the hands of senators such as Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.). Elected last month as an independent after losing the Democratic primary, he is the subject of frequent speculation that he might emulate Jeffords by joining the GOP if his Democratic colleagues displease him.

Senators may rush to support Lieberman's bills, one GOP aide said yesterday, "and if he holds a fundraiser, everybody will be there."

Experts Optimistic About Senator's Recovery (WP)

By David Brown

The experience of other people who have suffered bleeding from arteriovenous malformations inside the brain suggests that Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), who underwent emergency surgery for that condition Wednesday night, has at least a 50-50 chance of full recovery.

The 59-year-old senator may need another operation or other procedure to completely defuse the abnormal tangle of blood vessels inside his head that he was born with. But statistics suggest that his chance of suffering another bleeding episode in the near future is less than 10 percent and that his brain function is likely to improve from now on.

"I think his prognosis for recovery is very good," said Laligam Sekhar, a neurosurgeon at Harborview Medical Center in Seattle and former chairman of neurosurgery at George Washington Medical Center, where Johnson was treated. "Any disability now is going to depend on where the malformation was and what his condition was going into surgery."

Johnson's physicians provided no details on his condition. But the senator's office said he responded to his wife's voice and held her hand, and the Capitol physician, John Eisold, said he is "appropriately responsive to both word and touch" -- suggesting that he is conscious and may be able to communicate.

Many people harbor arteriovenous malformations (AVMs) unknowingly for decades. When they bleed, 10 to 15 percent of patients die within hours, 35 percent suffer permanent disability and about 50 percent recover more or less completely. The prevalence of AVMs is not known with precision, though one estimate is that about one-half of 1 percent of people have them.

They are often described as looking like "a bag of worms." They can be different sizes and may grow over time, though most apparently arise from a defect present at birth.

As their name implies, arteriovenous malformations are abnormal growths in which arteries feed directly into veins. Blood in the arteries is under high pressure, and the veins are not built to handle the pressure. Over time, the stress can cause them to leak -- or burst.

Johnson's first reported symptom was a sudden loss of coherent speech while he was on a telephone call with reporters. That suggests he may have had a small bleed near the brain's speech center, which in 90 percent of people is on the left.

Outside its normal channels, blood is highly irritating and can cause small arteries to clamp shut and temporarily starve local areas of oxygen and nutrients. A less likely explanation is that irritation by the AVM itself caused a localized seizure. In either case, a small part of the brain could be stunned and its functions temporarily lost.

Johnson did not immediately undergo surgery, which suggests that his symptoms diminished after he went to the hospital. Details of his treatment were not released, but he almost certainly had brain scans that revealed both the bleeding and the presence of the malformation.

Later, however, he was taken to the operating room. That suggests something happened -- probably a new hemorrhage and new symptoms.

"With an AVM, you are not rushed to emergency surgery unless you either rebleed or the consequences of the hemorrhage force you to operate because the pressure inside the brain is too high," said Robert Spetzler, head of the Barrow Neurological Institute at St. Joseph's Hospital in Phoenix and a leading authority on treating the condition.

The purpose of the operation would have been to reduce the pressure by taking out the clotted blood and to stop the bleeding. Some or all of the AVM might also have been removed, though that is often hard to do.

The surgery is difficult and dangerous. If the bleeding is coming from a weakened vein "downstream" of the defect, the surgeon cannot simply tie off that area. High-pressure blood will continue to flow in and will have an even smaller route out -- raising the pressure in the malformation even higher.

"If he ligates the vein first, it just basically explodes in his face," said William O. Bank, chief of neuro-interventional radiology at Washington Hospital Center.

Instead, the surgeon must cut off the flow in the arteries feeding the malformation. There may be many; if the bleeding is extensive, they may be hard to find; and getting to them may require touching the already highly unstable defect.

"It becomes very technically difficult," Bank said.

If the bleeding can be stopped, most surgeons will leave definitive treatment of the AVM for another day, once the patient has recovered. A neuroradiologist will thread a catheter from an artery in the thigh into the brain and release a dye that will fill the AVM and outline its structure.

The radiologist can then inject a gluelike substance that shuts down blood flow in the arteries to the AVM. Alternatively, a surgeon can cut the malformation out. AVMs can also be cauterized from outside the skull by crossing beams of gamma radiation and causing pinpoint burns in the blood vessels, which then form scar tissue and close off.

An AVM has about a 10 percent chance of bleeding a second time in the six months after a first hemorrhage. After that, the risk falls to what it is before the first bleed -- about 3 to 4 percent a year.

Senator's Chances Are Mixed For Recovery From Rare Disorder (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The blood-vessel abnormality that put South Dakota Sen. Tim Johnson in the hospital is relatively rare. Patients who suffer from it may have a good shot at recovery, depending on how much bleeding they have suffered.

Arteriovenous malformations, or AVMs, are tangles of blood vessels that disrupt the flow of blood and are believed in most cases to be present from birth. An estimated 300,000 Americans have AVMs of the brain or spinal cord, but only about 36,000 show symptoms, according to the National Library of Medicine, a part of the National Institutes of Health. In the case of brain AVMs, patients might experience symptoms such as headaches, seizures and visual disturbances.

One of the biggest dangers of AVMs is bleeding in the brain, as Mr. Johnson had. An estimated 5% to 10% of people with AVM ruptures die, said M. Sean Grady, chairman of the neurosurgery department at the University of Pennsylvania Health System in Philadelphia. That is much better than the 50% survival rate associated with aneurysms, he added. And when ruptures are caught early, as appears to have been the case with Mr. Johnson, quick action to repair the bleeding can improve chances for survival and recovery.

Mr. Johnson underwent a five-hour surgery to remove the blood and stabilize the AVM. A statement from Capitol physician John Eisold released late yesterday afternoon said the lawmaker had been "appropriately responsive to both word and touch."

In the coming days, doctors will begin to ascertain whether Mr. Johnson may have sustained permanent damage, how much if so, and how long he might take to recover. If he regains function quickly after surgery, recovery might take only a month or so. If he doesn't bounce back quickly, prospects for recovery are more variable and uncertain, but can take six months to a year.

"You can be hopeful about having a very good outcome," said Daniel Hanley, a professor of neurology and head of brain-injury outcomes at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. "We do know surgery can be successful; we also know it's not always successful."

Little is known about the details of Mr. Johnson's situation. And in terms of how he might have been affected long term, much depends on the extent of the bleeding he suffered and the size and location of the AVM.

Judging by the speech difficulty Mr. Johnson experienced before he was stricken, the malformation probably was on the left side of his brain, which controls speech, Dr. Grady said. Patients with damage in this area may have difficulty generating speech or may have paralysis on the right side of their bodies, he added.

Physicians can find AVMs using imaging technologies. Removal of the AVM, through surgery or other means, may be considered, but this is a matter of some debate in the medical community. Decisions have to be made on a case-by-case basis, because the surgery carries risks. The National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke, part of the NIH, is working with Columbia University to learn more about AVMs with a long-term study.

Malformation Caused Johnson's Bleeding (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson was "responsive to both word and touch" Thursday evening following emergency brain surgery but the uncertainty of his long-term prognosis casts doubt on the nation's political landscape.

Adm. John Eisold, attending physician of the U.S. Capitol, said in a statement the two-term senator has not required further surgery since doctors at George Washington University overnight stopped bleeding. The condition, caused by a malformation of blood vessels, is congenital. It was undiagnosed in Johnson, who turns 60 on Dec. 28.

Johnson was stricken Wednesday afternoon, as he had trouble talking to reporters in a conference call. His illness comes as Democrats prepare to take control of the Senate on Jan. 4 with 51 votes, including those of two independents.

If Johnson is unable to complete the remaining two years of his term, it would be up to South Dakota's Republican Gov. Mike Rounds to appoint a replacement, presumably from his party.

That would shift the balance of power in the Senate to the GOP because Vice President Cheney, a Republican, would cast the vote to break a 50-50 tie.

Republicans at the Capitol showed no signs that they will press for Johnson to resign. Johnson, first elected in 1996, is up for re-election in 2008.

"My expectation and hope is that Tim will recover fully and come back," Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., who will serve as his party's deputy leader next year, said on Fox News. "I'd like to be in the majority, but I don't want it to be that way."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he is continuing to organize for a Senate run by his party. "There isn't a thing that has changed," said Reid, after visiting Johnson at the hospital. "To me, he looked very good."

Wishes for Johnson's recovery came from lawmakers in both parties and President Bush.

"Our prayers are with Sen. Johnson," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "He's a great guy."

Eisold on Thursday morning called it "premature" to forecast the senator's long-term prognosis, or whether he will need more surgery. Patients with Johnson's condition frequently require a second operation to remove the problem blood vessels, according Sean Grady, chief of neurosurgery at the University of Pennsylvania.

Grady said such operations "can pose a very high risk" depending on where the damaged blood vessels are in the brain.

In a statement issued by Johnson's office, the senator's wife, Barbara, said her family is "encouraged and optimistic."

Birth Defect Led To Stroke In Senator, Doctors Say (NYT)

By Lawrence K. Altman

Senator Tim Johnson suffered an unusual form of stroke, one due to bleeding into his brain from an abnormality present from birth, according to a statement from Adm. John F. Eisold, the attending physician of the Capitol, and interviews with neurological experts.

Mr. Johnson, 59, is in an intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital after undergoing emergency surgery for the stroke late Wednesday. He is being heavily sedated to rest his brain, a standard treatment after such surgery.

Mr. Johnson, a Democrat from South Dakota, is expected to be in intensive care for several days — also standard — while doctors determine if any brain damage occurred that would affect movement or intellectual ability. Admiral Eisold and experts not involved in Mr. Johnson's case said it was too early to tell how well he might recover.

Admiral Eisold and Mr. Johnson's family have not said where in the brain the bleeding occurred or how large the hemorrhage was, and they have not disclosed other factors that could be important in determining the seriousness of his illness. For example, it is not known whether doctors had previously detected the malformation in Mr. Johnson's brain.

One expert, Dr. David J. Langer of Manhattan, said that the type of stroke and the speed with which the doctors operated offered a guarded prognosis.

"The fact that he had emergency surgery after an event during the day suggests that he had bleeding that was life-threatening," said Dr. Langer, who directs cerebro-vascular neurosurgery at St. Luke's-Roosevelt, Beth Israel and Long Island College Hospital. "You don't just take the blood out to take it out, you only take it out when a life is threatened," he said, "and that means he was deteriorating in his level of consciousness. There would be no other reason for an emergency operation."

Dr. Langer said that if Mr. Johnson's condition was deteriorating rapidly, doctors most likely did not have time to obtain critical details from a magnetic resonance imaging scan and probably operated after performing a CT X-ray scan. In general, malformations of the sort that caused Mr. Johnson's stroke are best detected on M.R.I.'s.

In such circumstances, Dr. Langer said, neurosurgeons often cannot determine the cause of the bleeding until they operate.

Dr. David S. Liebeskind, associate director of the University of California, Los Angeles, Stroke Center said that surgery for arteriovenous malformations can be as complex as any involving the brain.

In Mr. Johnson's favor, said Dr. Liebeskind, is that "it sounds like they caught this problem fairly early" and "could intervene before further damage occurred."

But he and other experts said that Mr. Johnson's prognosis would depend in part on what doctors observe as they monitor and test him over the next few days.

Standard care would involve seeking evidence of swelling of his brain and signs of further bleeding as well as preventing seizures. The doctors will monitor Mr. Johnson's heart function in part because such strokes can put great stress on the body.

The doctors are expected to lighten the sedation after a few days to look for damage.

Dr. Lee H. Schwamm, director of acute stroke care at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston, said that initial findings may not reflect a patient's long-term outcome.

Patients with mild neurological disabilities usually recover well. But patients with serious disabilities do not necessarily have a bad outcome and can recover significantly.

Studies have shown that fewer than 0.5 percent of people have arteriovenous malformations and that some forms of them are hereditary.

The malformations are characterized by a direct connection between arteries and veins. Normally, blood vessels known as capillaries serve as the connections.

Although the malformations are present from birth, it often takes years for the pressure to build to the point of rupturing.

Doctors have been detecting arteriovenous malformations more frequently since the introduction of CT and M.R.I. scans beginning in the mid-1970's. Before then, doctors had no way to detect such malformations until they bled.

The malformations are sometimes found on scans among patients who receive them after complaining of headaches and nonspecific symptoms. But many such incidentally detected malformations are small, leaving doctors uncertain whether and how to treat them. This is among the reasons that Dr. Jay P. Mohr at Columbia University is leading a federally sponsored study to determine among other things whether it is better to operate early or to watch and wait.

What Is Arteriovenous Malformation, Or AVM? (LAT)

By Thomas H. Maugh Ii

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

An arteriovenous malformation, or AVM, such as that suffered by Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) is like the four-level interchange writ large — a complicated, tangled mass of blood vessels that connect arteries to veins but serve no useful purpose.

Present at birth, the tangles lie hidden and symptom-less in the brain for decades. But eventually, the constant pressure produced when the muscular arteries pump blood directly into the weaker, more fragile veins causes the veins to spring small leaks.

Often the bleeding stops spontaneously and the victim is not aware of anything other than perhaps a headache. Occasionally, the bleeding is more severe and the patient, like Johnson, suffers a full-fledged stroke.

The chances for survival and recovery depend on how soon the stroke is detected and treated and where in the brain the AVM is located.

Johnson's stroke was detected quickly when he suffered aphasia — a difficulty understanding or expressing language and completing sentences — during a telephone conference call and surgery was performed within hours.

His surgeons have not revealed where the AVM was located, so forecasting his recovery is difficult.

"We need to know where it was located, how big the blood clot was and what it was pressing on," said Dr. John Frazee, a neurosurgeon at UCLA's Geffen School of Medicine. "If it destroyed important tissue because it was deep in the brain, it could have a serious effect. If it was located peripherally, it might not do much damage at all."

The fact that Johnson is healthy, is not overweight and apparently does not suffer from hypertension increases his odds of recovery, Frazee said.

AVMs affect an estimated 300,000 Americans, according to the National Institutes of Health. Each year, about 12% of them suffer symptoms severe enough to be noticeable, and 1% die from bleeding into the brain.

Typically, the stroke produced by an AVM is less severe than that produced by an aneurysm, according to Dr. Keith Siller, medical director of the Comprehensive Stroke Care Center at NYU Medical Center in New York.

An aneurysm occurs in an artery, where the blood is under higher pressure, and a rupture can be devastating. "An AVM is more of a lower level lesion because a vein is bleeding and it is under lower pressure. Usually the prognosis is better and the disability is less than it is with an aneurysm."

There are several ways to attack an AVM, depending on where it is and the urgency of the situation. Often, interventional radiologists will begin by threading a thin catheter through an artery to the site of the AVM, where they will use beads, glue or coils to block the artery, preventing blood from reaching the weakened or bleeding area.

Often that is sufficient to cure the problem. Sometimes, it is necessary to surgically remove the mass of tangled vessels to prevent more problems.

When the tangle is actively bleeding, the first recourse is to seal it surgically, remove clotted blood and ease pressure at the same time. But that is tricky, Siller said, because of the risk of damaging healthy brain tissue during the procedure.

Because there are no specific events that trigger bleeding in an AVM, Frazee tells surviving patients that there is no reason to change their lifestyle. He does recommend against the use of aspirin, ibuprofen and similar drugs because, if bleeding does recur, they could make it worse.

Senator's Improvement Connected To Control Of Chamber (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

WASHINGTON — With control of the Senate potentially hanging in the balance, Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson showed signs of recovering Thursday from emergency surgery to relieve bleeding in his brain.

Johnson, 59, remained in critical condition. But Adm. John Eisold, the Capitol physician, said the South Dakotan was making an "uncomplicated" recovery and did not appear to require more surgery a day after being rushed from his office to George Washington University Hospital.

As Johnson lay in the critical care unit less than three miles from Capitol Hill, senior lawmakers sought to downplay talk of a possible shift in power in the Senate. Still, Johnson's health underscored the Democrats' tenuous hold on the chamber in the two-year congressional session that begins in early January.

If Johnson dies or resigns, South Dakota's Republican governor has the power to appoint a replacement that could wipe out the 51-49 majority the Democrats won in November's election.

Because a 50-50 tie would be broken by Vice President Dick Cheney, control of the Senate would revert to Republican hands.

Speculation about such a shift coursed through the Capitol after Johnson was taken to the hospital Wednesday afternoon after he became disoriented during a conference call with reporters.

Subsequent testing found internal bleeding in his head linked to a condition known as arteriovenous malformation, a congenital defect that produces a tangle of arteries and veins. In rare cases, the condition can prove fatal.

Emergency surgery Wednesday night relieved the bleeding, according to Eisold.

In a statement released by Johnson's office, Eisold said that in the wake of the surgery, the senator "has been appropriately responsive to both word and touch. No further surgical intervention has been required."

Johnson's wife, Barbara, said in a statement that the family was "encouraged and optimistic" about her husband's recovery prospects.

Because the senator made it through the operation without incident, his odds of survival are high, experts said. However, it is unclear whether or to what extent he might be afflicted with permanent impairment.

Those with arteriovenous malformation in the brain can suffer physical weakness, speech problems or paralysis, depending on where in the brain the malformation is located.

Even if Johnson is permanently incapacitated, history suggests there is little chance he would have to relinquish his seat. The Senate never has forced a member out of office for health reasons, even when senators spent years unable to make it to the floor to cast a vote.

The political consequences if Johnson's seat were to become vacant fueled a scramble for constant updates on his health and a rush to analyze any arcane Senate rule or South Dakota law that could come into play in replacing him.

If a Republican took over the seat, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., presumably would become majority leader and the GOP would continue to determine the issues considered by the chamber. Democrats still would control the House, which the party won in November's vote, but Democratic hopes of a Congress united in challenging President Bush's policies -- especially concerning the war in Iraq -- would be dashed.

Sen. Harry Reid, the Nevada Democrat slated to become majority leader when the next Congress convenes, traveled to the hospital Wednesday night shortly after word surfaced of Johnson's health problem. Thursday morning, Reid declined to give a prognosis. "Whatever I say about his medical condition would not be enough for you," he said. He added, "He looked very good."

Elsewhere on Capitol Hill, Senate librarians were sent digging into the congressional record for information on how the chamber operated when it was split 50-50 after the 2000 elections

At that time, Republicans assumed control of the chamber and its committees because Cheney was the incoming vice president. But as the Senate convened in January 2001, leaders from both parties struck an agreement in which representation on committees and staffing for those panels were split evenly.

That accord ended five months later, when Republican Sen. James M. Jeffords of Vermont decided to become an independent who caucused with Democrats. That gave Democrats control of the chamber.

Republicans won back the majority in the 2002 election and held it in the 2004 vote.

The election code in South Dakota gives the governor the power to fill a vacant Senate seat, said Chris Nelson, the secretary of state. An election for the seat would occur in November 2008.

Johnson's term is due to expire then anyway, and GOP Gov. Mike Rounds has been mentioned as a strong potential candidate against him.

Johnson held South Dakota's lone House seat before winning election to the Senate in 1996. He barely won re-election in 2002, defeating Republican John Thune by less than 550 votes. Thune then beat Democrat Tom Daschle, the Senate minority leader, in a highly contentious battle in 2004.

Johnson's close call has made him a top target for GOP strategists eyeing the 2008 campaign.

A centrist who has largely has avoided the spotlight, Johnson gained some attention in 2002 when he voted for the invasion of Iraq at the same time his son was in theArmy. Johnson's son went on to serve in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Sen. Johnson Seldom In The Spotlight (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, December 15, 2006

Tim Johnson is a rare senator who almost never has sought the spotlight. Asked by a local columnist if he ever tires of being described as boring, Johnson replied: Not at all.

"He's not one of the flashy stars that's always looking for the camera in D.C.," said Bill Richardson, head of the political science department at Johnson's alma mater, the University of South Dakota.

But long before the two-term senator's medical crisis this week, Johnson won national attention by keeping Democrats guessing about whether they could count on his vote.

He bucked his party by being only one of three Democrats to vote to confirm Justice Samuel Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court. He voted to ban late-term abortions. He said yes to a constitutional amendment to ban flag burning, anathema to most in his party.

And then there was perhaps the defining vote of Johnson's career: whether to authorize the use of military force in Iraq. Johnson voted yes, though he had a very personal reason to vote no: his oldest son, Brooks.

Then 32 and a staff sergeant with the Army's 101st Airborne Division, Brooks would be among the first sent to the region, Johnson knew.

"I talked to Brooks prior to this vote and his response was, 'Dad, you do what is right for the country and I'll do what is right as a soldier,'" Johnson recalled. "I said on the (Senate) floor that it's very likely I would be sending my own son into combat."

Brooks has since returned safely and had a son, one of Johnson's three young grandchildren, according to the senator's Web site.

Johnson acknowledged that some view him "as this sort of dour Scandinavian."

"But I think that we Scandinavians have a sense of humor, too," he said in a 2002 interview with The Associated Press. His wit is described by many as self-deprecating.

Political drama was nowhere to be found in Johnson's childhood. So low-key was his family that Johnson didn't know his parents' political affiliation until he went to college (they were Democrats).

The political bug bit Tim Johnson at 17, when he attended the 1964 Republican National Convention in San Francisco. After law school, he went on to serve in the state House and Senate.

In 1986, Johnson was narrowly elected to the U.S. House seat vacated by Tom Daschle, who had been elected to the Senate.

A decade later, Johnson defeated Sen. Larry Pressler, then the chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee. Johnson was barely re-elected to a second term, beating Republican John Thune by only 524 votes.

He has suffered serious illness before, battling prostate cancer in 2004. His wife, Barbara, has twice faced breast cancer. They have three children.

Columnist David Kranz of the Sioux Falls, S.D., Argus Leader — the one who asked Johnson about being considered dull — wrote that all the fuss over his medical condition "would be appalling" to the steady, unassuming senator.

An Unfamiliar Spotlight For An Unassuming Senator (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D., Dec. 14 — Thanks to an intersection of misfortune and simple arithmetic, the illness of Senator Tim Johnson, a no-frills, no-fanfare Democrat and a fourth-generation South Dakotan, swiftly turned into a topic for speculation across the country.

But the last place Mr. Johnson, 59, would ever want to find himself, people in his state say, is smack in the center of the national spotlight, and especially over the partisan split in the Senate. And the same holds true for many ordinary South Dakotans.

Here in a state of about 770,000, people said they were reeling on Thursday from the prospect of being thrust into a national political scramble, repulsed by all the talk in Washington of possible succession, and, most of all, waiting anxiously for news about the health of the senator many residents simply call Tim.

"He works quietly — silently," said Jan Nicolay, a former Republican legislator who served in the statehouse in Pierre when Mr. Johnson was a lawmaker there. "He doesn't do grandstanding and he never looks for publicity. He's a quiet, behind-the-scenes worker who doesn't play party politics and who wouldn't like all this attention one bit."

In Pierre, Sioux Falls and Vermillion, Mr. Johnson's hometown, political leaders from both parties refused to speculate about what could happen if he were not to return to the Senate.

John Thune, the state's other senator and a Republican, issued a brief statement encouraging South Dakotans to keep Mr. Johnson in their prayers. Russ Levsen, a spokesman for Representative Stephanie Herseth, a Democrat and the state's only member of the House, said she had issued a similar plea, as did Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican.

But beyond the prayers, most political leaders said little, or nothing — at least not publicly.

"South Dakotans find all this talk of succession to be completely unnecessary and distasteful at this point," Mr. Levsen said.

In the case of a vacancy in the Senate, state law calls for Mr. Rounds to appoint a replacement for the remainder of the term.

Some historians here pointed to another health crisis, in which the provision was never used: In 1969, Senator Karl Mundt, Republican of South Dakota, suffered a debilitating stroke, but remained in office for four more years.

In South Dakota, Republicans control both the House and the Senate, and the state has generally voted Republican for president, most recently giving President Bush nearly 60 percent of the vote in 2004.

But it is also a state where Democrats, like former Senator Tom Daschle, Ms. Herseth and Mr. Johnson have thrived — mostly, people here say, on their individual appeal.

"The truth is, if you asked most people here what party Tim Johnson belongs to, they would tell you they don't know," said David Kranz, the longtime political columnist for The Argus Leader of Sioux Falls. "When people say 'Why has he done so well?' the answer is that he really has never done anything that made people mad. And he isn't real loud and noisy about it, but he doesn't always vote with his party."

Mr. Johnson, who earlier served in the State Legislature and the United States House, has cast votes, Mr. Kranz said, that may not have played well within his party nationally but that South Dakotans largely supported. He voted to confirm Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court and for President Bush's tax cuts.

Here, Mr. Johnson is the guy who will sit for hours to talk, not run off when the cameras turn off; the great-grandson of a South Dakotan who homesteaded near Centerville; the man whose family has "already taken its share" (cancer both for him and his wife, Barbara, and deployments for their military son, Brooks, to places including Iraq).

Never flashy, never loud, maybe even a tad dull.

DOJ_NMG_0106932

"He's a fine young man," said Donna Schafer, a Republican state legislator who, like so many other people here, has a personal link to Mr. Johnson's family. (She taught one of his sons in school years ago.) "I was out with a group last night — Republicans and Democrats — and everyone of them was just struck at how tragic this is."

House Considers Independent Ethics Panel (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, December 15, 2006

House leaders are creating a bipartisan task force on whether to establish an independent ethics panel to police the House, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi said Thursday.

Pelosi, D-Calif., said Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio has agreed to the idea. The task force has not been set up yet, but it will be expected to report back in March, she said.

Pelosi offered no details on what the outside ethics group might look like, saying that would be up to the task force.

"There is no question that the ethics process in the last couple of years has lost the confidence of the American people," Pelosi told a news conference. "I'm hopeful that it's possible that we can have an outside entity that will restore that confidence."

Congress has been hit by a series of ethical black eyes, including the page scandal, the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, and the bribery scandal that sent former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham to prison.

The House ethics committee has been largely inactive throughout. It concluded last week that Republican lawmakers and aides failed for a decade to protect male pages from sexual come-ons by former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., but that no rules were broken and no one should be punished.

Establishment of a permanent outside enforcement entity has been a priority of ethics reformers, but such proposals have failed to become law in the past. In March, the Senate voted 67-30 to reject creation of an Office of Public Integrity to oversee ethics violations by lawmakers.

Among the no votes were incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who will head the Senate Rules Committee, which has jurisdiction over ethics and lobbying.

Feinstein is concerned that an outside panel could be abused by people aiming to publicize grudges, spokesman Howard Gantman said. She will not include the proposal in ethics legislation she is introducing next month but is considering holding a hearing on such ideas.

Members of the Senate ethics committee have objected to an outside panel, saying they could investigate wrongdoing themselves. Some lawmakers also believe the Constitution gives members of Congress the responsibility to police themselves, not give the job to outsiders.

Some senators plan to revive the public integrity office idea next year, including Republican Susan Collins of Maine and Democrats Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin.

Democrats have complained about a "Republican culture of corruption," a theme of November's elections in which they wrested control of Congress from the GOP. They promised to vigorously pursue an ethics overhaul; Pelosi pledged to enact lobbying changes as part of her agenda for Congress' first 100 legislative hours.

Proposals include banning lobbyist-paid meals and gifts and privately funded travel, forcing lobbyists to disclose more of their activities and requiring lawmakers and senior staff to wait two years instead of one to lobby their former colleagues after leaving Capitol Hill.

Democrats also want to make lawmakers disclose authorship of "earmarks," the home state spending projects often slipped into bills with little disclosure. Lawmakers would have to disclose any post-employment job negotiations.

Bills that would put in place some of these changes passed the House and Senate this year, but negotiators could not reach agreement on final legislation. The efforts were criticized as too weak by watchdog groups.

Fred Wertheimer, president of the ethics watchdog group Democracy 21, welcomed Pelosi's proposal. "Unless we replace the current failed enforcement process with a new one, we face the same problem of ethics rules being ignored that we've seen in the past," he said.

For at least one of Pelosi's House Democrats, her plan did not go far enough.

"I would conclude that the study process is unnecessary," said Rep. Mike Castle, D-Del., contending an outside enforcement entity should be offered as part of Pelosi's first 100 hours. "My goal is to make this ethics process as strong as possible, and that doesn't include studies — it only includes action."

First Steps Toward Ethics Reform In Congress (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON

Even as Democrats vowed this week to tackle ethics reform head on when they take up the gavels on Capitol Hill in January, they are already wary of land mines that could shatter their bid to rebuild Congress's image.

Citing the mandate from voters in the midterm elections to clean up a culture of corruption, incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi promised a sweeping reform agenda Thursday, including a first-ever "outside enforcement mechanism" for congressional ethics.

"The ethics process over the last few years has lost the confidence of the American people," she said in a briefing with reporters, where she predicted the "most honest and open Congress in history."

Other elements unveiled this week include a ban on "earmarks" or member projects for fiscal year 2007, a five-day congressional workweek to better process "the people's business," and a new oversight panel on intelligence along the lines proposed by the 9/11 Commission back in 2004.

But even as House Democrats try to burnish their image on ethics, they are being forced to work around the legal woes of their own members, including two in key positions.

The reelection of Rep. William Jefferson (D) of Louisiana in a runoff, despite the $90,000 in possible payoffs that federal investigators found stashed in his home freezer, stunned many of his colleagues, who had expected the eight-term lawmaker to lose the contest. To defuse criticism, Ms. Pelosi and the Democratic Steering Committee denied Mr. Jefferson his request to keep a seat on the powerful Ways and Means Committee, pending the outcome of a federal investigation.

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D) of West Virginia is facing a federal investigation over earmarks he sponsored and profitable real estate deals. He is in line to chair the subcommittee that oversees the budget of the agency that is investigating him - a decision now pending in the House Appropriations Committee. Some members of the Congressional Black Caucus say that Democrats are holding Mr. Jefferson, who is black, to a higher standard than they are Mr. Mollohan. Republicans say both cases signal that Democrats face their own culture-of-corruption issues.

Other potential pitfalls for ethics reform are the unfinished spending bills, including the thousands of earmarks attached to them.

Democrats could have just slogged through the bills, as Republicans did with leftover spending legislation when the GOP took back control of the Senate in 2003. Instead, Democrats last week opted to pass a joint resolution that is expected to keep spending for FY 2007 at the level of FY 2006 - with some adjustments - and put a hold on earmarks until FY 2008.

"It is not a perfect solution, but it is the best available given the fiscal mess the 109th Congress has left behind," said Pelosi and incoming Senate majority leader Harry Reid in a joint statement.

Fiscal watchdog groups praised the decision to eliminate earmarks for this fiscal year, but say Democrats will need to be more explicit about reforms than they have been to date if they are to clean up the corruption and appearance of wrongdoing associated with the earmark process.

"There is a serious intent to make some dramatic changes in how Congress operates, but whether here is the political will to enact proposals that will actually do that remains to be seen," says Ellen Miller of the Sunlight Foundation, a new coalition to promote transparency and accountability in government.

Others are waiting to see the details. "Democrats need to do more than disclose the sponsor and recipient of an earmark. They must also limit the number and amount that can be spent on earmarks, prohibit earmarks not subject to a committee hearing...," says Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste. Only two Democrats voted last week to require the Pentagon to evaluate the effectiveness of earmarks, he adds.

In the Senate, meanwhile, Democrats are still working on a comprehensive ethics package. "Ethics, lobby, and earmark reform will be the first bill we'll do," says Democratic leadership spokesman Jim Manley.

But this week, they are also concerned about whether they will lose control of the chamber. Sen. Tim Johnson (D) of South Dakota was rushed to the hospital for emergency surgery Wednesday. If he is unable to serve, the Republican governor of South Dakota, Mike Rounds, would appoint his replacement. Should he choose a member of his own party, the new Senate, which is divided 51-49, would become 50-50. Because Vice President Dick Cheney would cast any tying vote, the Senate would revert to Republican control. In the past, however, senators have served despite being incapacitated.

"No one has ever been removed from the Senate on the grounds of physical or mental incapacity. It's only been on the grounds of treason," says Senate historian Richard Baker. The Senate expelled 14 senators for treason during the Civil War - the last time a senator has been removed. Over the years, senators have been absent for months at a time when coping with disability. "The Constitution is specific on qualifications to be a senator, and one of them is not robust good health," Mr. Baker adds.

By Ken Thomas
AP, December 15, 2006

The incoming chairman of the congressional Page Board said Thursday he hopes the panel will meet monthly and expand its membership to help prevent another scandal.

Rep. Dale Kildee, D-Mich., who will become the panel's chairman when Democrats take control of the House next year, said the board should meet regularly with directors of the program's school and dormitory and those who supervise the students during their work in Congress.

"I think it's a very, very good program and the problem with the program was not the pages — it was a member and those who should have been more vigilant when this thing broke," Kildee said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Kildee said he supports incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's call reform of the program. Pelosi said Monday she intends to introduce legislation early in the new Congress to increase oversight of the page program, require regular board meetings and add a parent of a current and a former page to the board.

An ethics committee report last week on former Rep. Mark Foley's improper sexual advances toward male pages found no evidence that lawmakers or aides violated any rules. But it noted a pattern of conduct among many people involved "to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences" of Foley's conduct.

Foley, R-Fla., abruptly resigned his seat Sept. 29 after sexually explicit computer messages sent to teenage pages were disclosed in media reports.

Kildee, a former high school Latin teacher and board member since 1985, said the panel had "gone six or seven months without meeting" before the public learned of Foley's salacious messages and "a lot of members weren't even aware that there even was a page board."

"Hopefully, though, the whole Congress will learn from this and recognize what our responsibility is," Kildee said. He said Congress has "an obligation" to approve reforms to the program shortly after it convenes in January.

After Foley's resignation, Kildee criticized the Page Board chairman, Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., for not informing other board members about over-friendly e-mails from Foley to a page.

According to the report, Shimkus and the House clerk met with Foley in the fall of 2005 about e-mails sent to one page, but Foley assured them he was only acting as a mentor to the boy. After Foley resigned, Shimkus told the other Republican member of the Page Board — Rep. Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia — why he never informed Kildee.

Shimkus said, "Dale's a nice guy, but he's a Democrat, and I was afraid it would be blown out of proportion," the report said.

Kildee said he would "have called for a page board meeting. When you have a 52-year-old person writing even what they thought at the time were overfriendly text messages to 16-, 17-year-olds, that should raise some alarm bells."

The Page Board consists of three lawmakers, the House clerk and the sergeant at arms. The board does not run the program day-to-day but watches over it. Teenagers from around the country, sponsored by lawmakers, attend a congressional school and perform messenger jobs.

Pelosi: GOP To Get 1 Chance To Amend Top Democratic Bills (WSJ/DJ)

By John Godfrey
Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones)--House Republicans will be given only one chance to amend or debate a plan to curb oil and gas subsidies and other Democratic priorities, incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Thursday.

Pelosi is to become Speaker of the House when Democrats take majority control of the House in January. Legislation cutting subsidies to oil and gas producers is one of Democrats' top six priorities for their first 100 hours in power.

Pelosi said Thursday that the oil and gas legislation along with bills cutting student loan interest rates and requiring the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for Medicare would not go through the normal legislative process.

Normally, legislation is subjected to hearings and then considered by the committees of jurisdiction before being brought to the House floor. Pelosi said Thursday that because the measures are well known and have been voted upon in the past, the bills would be brought directly to the House floor for a vote.

And Republicans would be given only one chance to amend the bill through a procedural maneuver known as a motion to recommit, Pelosi said.

"They would have the motion to recommit," Pelosi said.

"These are not new to the Congress," Pelosi said at a press conference Thursday morning.

"All of these have been vetted through the committee process, some of them have even passed on the floor," Pelosi said.

DOJ_NMG_0106935

For example, legislation requiring oil companies to pay royalties on federal leases when the price of oil surpasses $40 per barrel has "passed the House not once, but twice."

Likewise, the House has voted in various forms to dapprove an increase in the federal minimum wage and to increase funding for stem cell research, Pelosi said.

But because the details of their plans have not been made public, it is unclear whether portions of those plans won't have been vetted.

For example, Democrats have promised to offset the cost of cutting student loan interest rates.

The most likely target will be student loan subsidies paid by the federal government to lenders. While Congress pared back those subsidies in a budget bill this year, Congress has not debated in the past the estimated $12 billion in further cuts that would be required.

GOP Misses Chance To Reshape Environmental Laws (LAT)

By Bettina Boxall

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

If ever there was a Congress in which Republicans were positioned to remake the nation's environmental laws, it was the 109th. But by the time the session ended last week, the GOP's environmental agenda had been largely thwarted.

Whether it was rewriting the Endangered Species Act, opening up most of the nation's coastline to oil and gas drilling, or selling off public lands in the West, Republicans failed to enact a range of ambitious proposals.

"It was the best chance for Republican-shaped initiatives for as long we can remember," said Daniel Kemmis, senior fellow at the Center for the Rocky Mountain West at the University of Montana.

Republicans began the session with majorities in both chambers, a sympathetic president, and a tough-talking property rights champion in charge of a key environmental committee.

That they went home empty-handed, Kemmis and others say, is testament to a changing, greening West; the pitfalls of overreaching; and an emerging alliance between environmentalists and a traditional GOP base, hunters and anglers.

"The so-called hook-and-bullet constituency has become more concerned about protecting public lands, protecting open space in general. I don't think that's going to change," he said.

Though Republicans came close to opening up Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, the goal eluded them.

Ben Lieberman of the conservative Heritage Foundation called it "quite striking" that the legislation died despite $3-a-gallon gasoline, an oilman in the White House and growing public support. The GOP expanded oil drilling in the Gulf of Mexico but did not muster enough votes to lift a long-standing federal ban on new oil and gas drilling off much of the nation's coastline.

"I just don't think the Republicans made the case that these changes could be made in an environmentally friendly way and in a way that would make a real difference at the pump or in terms of electricity prices," Lieberman said.

A proposal by House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Tracy) to slash royalty payments on oil shale production on federal land died. So too did a House-passed bill that would have restricted environmental reviews of salvage logging to remove dead or dying trees in national forests.

Legislation tying the designation of new federal wilderness areas in Utah and Idaho to the sale of public lands for development never reached Bush's desk. The administration proposal to raise money for a rural schools program by selling off national forest parcels was scrapped in the face of congressional opposition.

And Pombo's legislation to overhaul the Endangered Species Act, requiring the government to pay property owners if the law restricted their land use, was blocked in the Senate by moderate Republican Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island.

Neither Pombo nor Chafee will return to the Capitol to continue their duel, as both were defeated in the midterm election.

As House resources chairman, Pombo, a passionate foe of the Endangered Species Act and a defender of property rights, was in a key position to advance his agenda. But his reputation for anti-environmental rhetoric made the seven-term incumbent a polarizing figure.

"I think anything Pombo did would have been perceived as overreaching because people expected his committee to gut the ESA. But I really don't see his bill as overreaching," said Terry Anderson, a senior fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution. "I think it was in large part a dose of what conservative conservation would be about."

Pombo also talked of revamping another pillar of environmental law, the National Environmental Policy Act. That effort never made it out of committee.

"It's really hard to get controversial bills passed; it takes a long time," mused Myron Ebell, an energy expert with the Competitive Enterprise Institute, a pro-market group.

Wilderness Society Executive Vice President Don Barry, an Interior Department official under the Clinton administration, said the GOP had its own boldness to blame for the string of defeats.

He cited the Bush administration's proposal to auction national forest parcels. The idea inflamed sportsmen groups concerned about losing access to public land and was eventually disowned by even conservative Republican senators in the West.

"I think it was a huge miscalculation," Barry said. "They found the hunting and fishing community just totally in revolt. It blew up in their faces, and the next thing you know, you have people like [Montana GOP Sen.] Conrad Burns denouncing it."

The GOP won passage of forest thinning legislation in 2003, and made a variety of other gains, though most of them resulted from the Bush administration's use of executive power.

The administration revoked a ban on snowmobiles in Yellowstone National Park; expedited oil and gas drilling on western federal lands, including areas nominated for wilderness protection; and rewrote air pollution regulations at the oil industry's request. It also dropped a Clinton-era road-building ban in national forest backcountry, although that move was recently overturned by a federal judge.

The interior West has traditionally been a stronghold of anti-government sentiment favoring development of public lands. But the political landscape is shifting as newcomers migrate from the coasts, more Democrats get elected, and local economies diversify beyond ranching, mining and logging.

"There's been a maturing of political perspective in this part of the world," Kemmis said. "Some of it comes from new people moving in. But a lot of it just has to do with an awareness that the economy has changed. And if you're going to protect the economic viability of your community, you've got to be looking at protecting open spaces and protecting ecosystems. I think that is the deeper transformation."

Such thinking helped win last-minute passage of measures stopping new energy leasing on more than 400,000 acres on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains in Montana, as well as barring oil drilling and mining in northern New Mexico's Valle Vidal, an area popular among hunters and anglers.

If the Republicans hurt their interests by pushing for too much in the last session, therein lies a lesson for the Democrats, said Richard M. Frank, executive director of the California Center for Environmental Law & Policy at UC Berkeley.

"It is the middle on which either end of the political spectrum has to focus in actually getting any legislation of this type done," Frank said. "Only the future will tell if they'll be any more successful in developing that kind of consensus."

Fitzgerald Mum On Cheney In Leak Case (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 15, 2006

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said Thursday that he does not expect any government officials to refuse to testify in the CIA leak trial, but he did not specifically say whether Vice President Dick Cheney or other top White House officials were on his witness list.

Attorneys for Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, meanwhile, told a judge that two unidentified reporters may resist testifying on Libby's behalf in the case. The attorneys predicted the issue would be resolved before trial, however.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding former CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame's identity was leaked to reporters around the time that her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Cheney has said he may be called as a witness. If so, prosecutors could ask how the White House responded to those criticisms. Cheney was upset by Wilson's comments, Fitzgerald has said, and told Libby that Plame worked for the CIA.

That conversation is a key to Fitzgerald's perjury case. Libby testified that he learned about Plame's job from a reporter.

Cheney could also help prosecutors undermine Libby's defense that he was so preoccupied with national security matters, he forgot details about the less-important Plame issue. Prosecutors argue that Plame was a key concern of the vice president, and thus would have been important to Libby.

Sitting presidents, including Clinton and Ford, have testified in criminal cases but presidential historians and separation-of-powers experts said they knew of no vice president who has done so. The first President Bush was subpoenaed to testify in the Iran-Contra trial of Oliver North. At the time, Bush was Reagan's vice president, but Bush was president by the time a judge ruled he did not need to testify.

Government officials and journalists will be the key witnesses in the trial, which is scheduled to begin next month. Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller and NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert are expected to be prosecution witnesses and Libby's lawyers said in court papers Thursday that several reporters will testify on Libby's behalf.

Attorneys also said they'd subpoenaed for the tape of Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward's interview with former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage. Armitage has admitted he discussed Plame's job with Woodward in 2003 but said it was a passing, inadvertent comment.

Woodward's tape has been turned over to prosecutors and Libby's attorneys said they expect no objection to their subpoena.

Cheney would be the most anticipated witness of the trial. He and Libby got to know each other when Cheney was defense secretary under the first President Bush. Libby has been extremely loyal to Cheney and, in return, had the vice president's unwavering trust.

By 2000, Libby was working as a top adviser to Cheney in the presidential campaign and then followed him to the White House. In the White House, he was known as "Cheney's Cheney" for being as trusted a problem solver for the vice president as Cheney was for Bush.

Even after Libby's indictment, Cheney called him "one of the finest men I've ever known."

Last-Minute Inserts Offer Benefits In Medicare Bill (NYT)

By Robert Pear

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — By slipping four sentences into a big bill passed last week, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert secured a major change in Medicare policy avidly sought by a few health insurers, in particular a multinational company with headquarters in his home state, Illinois.

In the final hours of the 109th Congress, the Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, also got special treatment for a hospice in his state. The bill did not name the hospice, but specified the Medicare provider number for the intended beneficiary, the Nathan Adelson Hospice in rural Pahrump, Nev.

Representative Bill Thomas, Republican of California, inserted a provision earmarking $40 million for a valley fever vaccine sought by his constituents, while the Senate Republican leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee, obtained tens of millions of dollars for hospitals in his state.

These examples illustrate how power is exercised in the final, chaotic hours before Congress adjourns. Obscure provisions of interest to just a few lawmakers were quietly stuffed into a grab bag of legislation, with no indication of their parentage or purpose.

The White House has indicated that President Bush will sign the bill, which deals not only with health care but also with a variety of tax and trade issues. The bill, for example, creates a special tax depreciation allowance for property used to produce ethanol from corn stalks, regulates the use of wine names like Champagne and Chablis, and suspends the tariff on imported rayon fibers used in making certain tampons.

Mr. Hastert's provision showed up mysteriously after House and Senate negotiators had finished writing the bill. The provision was added by the House Rules Committee, just a few hours before the bill went to the House floor last week.

Congressional aides, Medicare officials and insurance lobbyists said the main proponent of the measure was the Aon Corporation and its subsidiary, Sterling Life Insurance Company. Aon, a Fortune 500 company, is based in Chicago and does business in more than 120 countries.

Under current law, Medicare beneficiaries can sign up for a prescription drug plan or a private Medicare Advantage plan from Nov. 15 to Dec. 31 each year. They have a limited ability to make changes through March 31 and are generally locked in for the remainder of the year.

Mr. Hastert's amendment permits certain Medicare Advantage plans, like Aon's, to enroll people throughout the year. Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Mr. Hastert, said the purpose was "to get more people enrolled in Medicare Advantage plans." Al Orendorff, a spokesman for Aon, said, "We are not going to comment."

The provision could benefit several other insurers, but Larry Oday, a lawyer and lobbyist for Aon, said the company was "actively involved in consideration of this piece of legislation" and had led opposition to the lock-in requirement.

The addition of the provision infuriated Senate negotiators from both parties.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said the provision did not go through the regular legislative process.

"It disturbs me that this major policy change — one that treats some plans unfairly — was included at the last minute by the House Rules Committee," Mr. Grassley said.

The senior Democrat on the Finance Committee, Senator Max Baucus of Montana, said: "I soundly rejected this proposal during negotiations with our House colleagues. They were clearly informed of my position. Our final agreement did not include this provision."

Mr. Reid's amendment provided $3.8 million in relief to the Nathan Adelson Hospice. Medicare officials said they had overpaid the hospice and were trying to recover that amount.

Mr. Reid said the legislation would overturn "a flawed administrative ruling" by the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. The legislation retroactively designates the Adelson hospice in Pahrump as a branch of one in Las Vegas, making more money available.

Hospice trustees used their influence with the state's Congressional delegation, and the hospice retained a Washington law firm, Hogan & Hartson. But Carole A. Fisher, president of the hospice, said Mr. Reid and Nevada's Republican senator, John Ensign, "were the real champions of our cause, who ensured that we got relief from our Medicare debt."

In Tennessee, hospitals estimate that they will get at least $131 million because of the provision added by Mr. Frist, who is retiring from the Senate next month. The money will go to about 90 hospitals serving disproportionate numbers of low-income Medicaid patients and people without insurance.

Craig A. Becker, president of the Tennessee Hospital Association, said his organization had received help from an influential Washington lobbyist: Thomas A. Scully, former administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, who is now a lawyer at Alston & Bird.

The same section of the bill provides $10 million for hospitals in Hawaii. That state's senators, Daniel K. Akaka and Daniel K. Inouye, both Democrats, have been trying to get such an allotment for years.

Hawaii, like Tennessee, is exempted from many requirements of the federal Medicaid law because of a waiver granted by federal officials. The waivers give the states a great deal of freedom in setting eligibility and benefits, but do not provide the extra money available to other states for hospitals serving large numbers of poor people.

In seeking money for a vaccine against valley fever, Mr. Thomas said he was addressing a serious health problem caused by inhalation of a soil-borne fungus in southwestern states.

"The disease is especially prevalent in Kern County, Calif., which I represent," Mr. Thomas said. "Unfortunately, there is no vaccine for valley fever, and there is no private industry interest in making the investment, estimated at $40 million, needed for development of the vaccine."

Among those seeking the legislation was Sandra P. Larson, executive director of the Valley Fever Americas Foundation in Bakersfield, Calif. "Thomas is the guy who got this done for us," Ms. Larson said. "We are so appreciative."

Minority Hiring On Hill Pushed (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

The Congressional Black Caucus has asked Democratic leaders to hire more minorities to work for House committees and on lawmakers' staffs, saying the dearth of diversity on Capitol Hill is a problem.

In a letter to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi and the leaders of the Democratic Steering Committee, the CBC said the party must increase the number of minorities working for committees and subcommittees, which will be controlled by Democrats.

The hiring of black, Hispanic, Asian and other minority staffers has "been a major problem" for years, said outgoing CBC Chairman Melvin Watt, North Carolina Democrat.

"All you have to do is look at the composition of committees, subcommittees and leadership staffs," Mr. Watt said, adding that the lack of diversity extends to legislators' staffs.

Although Mr. Watt did not provide numbers, committee staffers who spoke with The Washington Times on the condition of anonymity said that fewer than 50 minorities are among the hundreds of committee staffers.

That number does not include staff members of the black, Hispanic or Asian and Pacific Islander caucuses.

Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, has promised to make minority hiring a priority for incoming committee chairman and has met with incoming CBC chairman, Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, Michigan Democrat.

"This is the right time to address this, and we will be working with the speaker to increase those numbers," Mrs. Kilpatrick said.

Despite the Democratic Party's historical ties to minorities, Capitol Hill Republicans are said to have a better reputation for hiring minorities.

According to a running joke one House staffer shared with The Times, "the only people who hire blacks and Hispanics around here are blacks, Hispanics and Republicans."

Rep. Gregory W. Meeks, New York Democrat and a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, did not dispute the charge.

"I've heard it, and I've looked around and found myself scratching my head," he said. "That has been said and it is a challenge for us to make sure our numbers are better."

The mission starts with interviewing and accepting the recommendations of minority members and current staffers to build a larger pool of talent, Mr. Meeks said.

Congressional jobs, he said, are often won on the strength of who you know as opposed to what you know.

Mr. Watt said he does not think that Republicans have a more diverse staff than Democrats do, but cautioned that, "there should be no question about it" if his party is going to stand on a platform built on diversity.

Rep. Rosa DeLauro, Connecticut Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Steering Committee, said there's nothing to fix.

"I don't believe there is a problem," she said, adding that minority hiring always has been and will continue to be a priority among Democrats.

"Our speaker-designate has always said that our membership on committees and our committee staffs should reflect the diversity of the country, so that has been, I think, an ongoing process and it will continue to be," she said.

A study by DiversityInc. magazine in June showed that 7.6 percent of a 1,000 Senate staff positions were held by blacks, Hispanics or Asians. No other studies have been conducted in recent years, but the diversity ratios in the House are not much better in either party, say staffers.

Chertoff Says FEMA Still Has Work To Do (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff delivered a backhanded slap Thursday at one of his agencies, saying it should not allow red tape to interfere with helping disaster victims.

Chertoff, who listed the Hurricane Katrina response as one of the "transformative experiences" for the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said there is "a lot more work to do" even though FEMA has been "retooled."

The secretary noted there still are "tens of thousands of people who suffer the lingering effects" of last year's hurricane.

"We have to make sure that FEMA does not become so enmeshed in its own bureaucratic processes sometimes that they lose sight of the need to have simple commonsense and humanity in dealing with the public," he said.

On Wednesday, a federal judge in Washington said the Bush administration's handling of a post-Katrina housing program was "a legal disaster." Two weeks ago, U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon ruled that FEMA mishandled the program and violated the constitutional rights of as many as 5,500 storm victims.

A statement from FEMA following Chertoff's comments said that in providing housing for Katrina victims, FEMA had done "something it has never done before. ... Our efforts were not perfect. ... We used the authorities, programs and policies that we had to work with and we did the right thing."

Chertoff, in remarks at George Washington University's Homeland Security Policy Institute, said he wanted to sum up lessons learned and to look forward to the next two years.

Chertoff listed his broad goals and priorities for the coming year as protecting the country against threats; making sure critical infrastructure is "sufficiently hardened" to reduce vulnerability; building 21st-century response capabilities; and unifying his department "into a seamless whole."

Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi has promised that Democrats will take even stronger steps on homeland security.

Pelosi pledged that the Democrats would enact all the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission. In addition, she said, "We'll go them (the commission) one better on port security, where we have even tougher proposals to screen 100 percent of the containers long before they reach U.S. shores."

Dow Sets Another Record Close On Strong Corporate Profits (WP/AP)

NEW YORK, Dec. 14 -- Wall Street resumed its fourth-quarter rally Thursday, pushing the Dow Jones industrial average to its first close above 12,400 after a series of strong company earnings reports and a drop in unemployment claims revived investors' confidence in the economy.

The Dow rose 99.26, or 0.81 percent, to a new closing record of 12,416.76, after hitting a new trading high of 12,431.26 during the session. The Dow, which last hit a record close of 12,342.56 on Nov. 17, is up 16 percent this year. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index climbed 12.28, or 0.87 percent, to a six-year record of 1425.49, after reaching a six-year trading high of 1427.23. The Nasdaq Stock Market rose 21.44, or 0.88 percent, to 2453.85.

Wall Street, which stalled this week on interest rate and economic concerns, was reinvigorated by robust quarterly profits from Bear Stearns, Lehman Brothers and Costco, as well as healthy outlooks from Citigroup and Honeywell International.

Investors were also encouraged by the Labor Department's report that the number of Americans filing for unemployment benefits fell for a second straight week. The data suggested that the economy isn't cooling as quickly as some investors feared.

Airline stocks fell because of oil prices, which rose after the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries said it was keeping its production target for now but making cuts in February. Higher energy prices were a boon to oil companies' stocks.

Bear Stearns climbed $4.07, to $159.96.

Lehman Brothers slipped 29 cents, to $76.08, as investors were disappointed it didn't produce record fourth-quarter profit.

Citigroup gained 79 cents, to $53.11.

Honeywell rose 83 cents, to $42.69.

Continental Airlines gave up 42 cents, to $44.34.

Markets Go On Record-breaking Binge (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

Name just about any major stock market index and odds are it hit a record high this week.

Everything from the Dow Jones industrials, Dow utilities, small-stock Russell 2000 and NYSE composite closed at or briefly topped high-water marks Thursday as investors celebrated signs the economy is gently slowing down but not falling off a cliff.

The Dow industrials, the commonly followed market benchmark, jumped 99.26 points to 12,416.76, beating its previous high of 12,342.55 on Nov. 17 and notching its first close above 12,400.

"Holy cow, Dow," says Michael Farr, president of investment company Farr Miller & Washington. "When people go home and check their portfolios, they're going to see more money."

At the same time, though, some investors may feel they're missing out on the new-high party. It's probably not surprising the Nasdaq composite index is still more than 50% from its high, given the overheated mania for dot-coms and tech that drove it earlier in the decade. But arguably the most popular index of them all for actual investments, the Standard & Poor's 500, is still 6.7% below the high it notched in 2000.

The reasons a new high is elusive to the S&P 500, however, are the same reasons explaining why many of the other indexes are doing so well, including:

·Mathematical illusions. The Dow doesn't contain small-company stocks, either. But it is getting a lift from the way it is calculated: Stocks with the highest share prices get the greatest influence on the average's value. If the Dow were calculated by giving companies with the greatest market value the greatest weight, as is the norm for most indexes, including the S&P 500, it would be 13% below its high in 2000, S&P says.

·A resurging IPO market. Initial public offerings have turned in giant returns this year, gaining 9.4% on their first days and 19.0% this year, Dealogic says.

Newly public companies can't be included in the S&P 500 until they've reported quarterly results for at least a year. And most IPOs are too small to qualify anyway, so this contribution is missing. The Russell 2000 includes IPOs, and it is adding 29 more today.

S&P 500 investors will get their turn, says Jack Ablin of Harris Private Bank. "The small-cap advantage is beginning to roll over," he says. "Quality is on sale."

Dow Hits Record Over 12400 Mark Despite Oil Rise (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to another record finish, its first in nearly a month, as robust economic and profit reports sent investors scurrying to pump more money into stocks.

The Dow jumped 99.26 points, or 0.81%, to 12416.76, easily surpassing the record 12342.56 set Nov. 17. The Dow is up 15.9% so far this year, at its 19th record finish since October began. Some investors who had been betting that the Nov. 17 record would prove to be the year's high were forced to jump back in, to avoid being left behind.

The gains came despite a $1.14 jump in oil futures to $62.51 a barrel, as the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries announced plans to cut oil output in February. The price jump ordinarily would have provoked worries about the impact of rebounding energy prices on consumer spending.

It was a day of stock records around the world; highs were also hit yesterday in China, Canada, Brazil and elsewhere. (See article on page C12.)

Investors now will be biting their nails as they await this morning's release of November consumer-price data, which have the potential to stifle the euphoria. Given recent economic signals that prices are under control and that economic growth is moderating, investors are betting that consumer prices will show more signs of restraint. Any suggestion to the contrary could damage the stock rally.

There was little apparent concern about that yesterday, as the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index also accelerated, recording another six-year closing high. It rose 0.87%, or 12.28 points, to 1425.49, its highest finish since autumn 2000. It is up 14.2% this year, but still isn't near its record of 1527.46, set in March 2000.

"The market clearly has a very positive momentum that is going to take quite a bit to shake off," said John Caldwell, chief investment strategist at McDonald Investments, a brokerage and money-management arm of KeyCorp in Cleveland. He said that money managers are continuing to put aside doubts and jump in, fearing the market will get ahead of them.

Stocks also may have been helped by "quadruple witching," the quarterly expiration of futures and options contracts on stocks and stock indexes, which occurs at the end of this week. To balance their options exposure, traders sometimes must buy or sell stocks and stock indexes, which can exaggerate market moves and inflate trading volume.

The biggest gains came shortly after trading began, on the back of strong profit reports from brokerage firms Bear Stearns and Lehman Brothers. Honeywell International, one of the 30 stocks in the Dow industrials, forecast strong yearly profit. Networking-equipment developer Ciena posted its first quarterly profit in five years, exceeding analysts' expectations. Costco Wholesale also beat analysts' quarterly profit expectations, helping calm concerns about consumer spending.

Contributing to the momentum, a monthly report on regional manufacturing activity from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York leaked out a day early and then was officially released. It showed manufacturing growth slipping a bit, but holding up better than economists had expected.

A weekly report showed new jobless claims at a surprisingly low level last week, reinforcing Wednesday's strong report on November retail sales and suggesting the housing slowdown isn't hurting consumers as much as feared.

The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.88%, or 21.44 points, to 2453.85, approaching a new multiyear high. It is far from its own record close of 5048.62, which also dates from March 2000. It is up 11.3% for 2006. The Russell 2000 small-stock index rose 0.69% to 794.22, just 3.20 points short of its record close on Dec. 5.

Bond prices fell and yields rose again, as the strong economic and profit news further stifled hopes that the Federal Reserve will decide to cut its target interest rate early next year.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks advanced1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.72 billion shares, as 2,128 stocks rose and 1,206 fell.

Bonds fell2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 6/32, or $1.88 for each $1,000 invested, pushing up the yield to 4.601%. The 30-year bond fell 17/32 to yield 4.719%.

The dollar strengthened3, to 117.83 yen, from 117.51, as the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3149 from $1.3213.

Import Prices Climb 0.2% After Two-Month Decline (WSJ)

By Jeff Bater

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

U.S. import prices rose for the first time in three months in November despite a drop in petroleum costs.

Prices for imported goods rose 0.2%, after falling 2.3% in October and 2.2% in September, the Labor Department said Thursday. Economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires had expected November import prices would slip by 0.1%.

In annual terms, import prices increased 1.2% from November 2005, compared with the 6.4% a year earlier.

Petroleum import prices tumbled by 1.6% last month compared to October, and rose 1.5% on the year. Excluding petroleum, import prices were up 0.7% in November versus October and 1.3% on the year.

The Federal Reserve decided this week to hold the federal-funds rate at 5.25% a fourth straight time, judging the economy will expand modestly going forward and inflation pressures will likely moderate over time.

The Labor Department's report showed that prices for imported capital goods were unchanged last month, as were consumer goods import prices.

Prices for nonpetroleum industrial supplies and materials imports rose 2.9%. Natural-gas prices surged 30.3%, the largest increase since 39.5% in November 2004. Foods, feeds, and beverages prices increased 0.4%.

Import prices were unchanged on the month for goods from the European Union. Prices increased 1.7% for goods from Canada and were down 0.2% for products from Mexico. Prices from China were unchanged. Import prices from Japan decreased 0.1%.

Overall U.S. export prices rose 0.4% last month. Export prices grew 3.9% in the 12 months since November 2005. Prices of agricultural exports increased 4.4%, and prices of non-agricultural exports rose 0.1%.

Jobless Claims Drop by 20,000

A separate report from the Labor Department showed that the number of idled workers filing new claims for unemployment benefits fell last week to its lowest level in two months.

New claims for unemployment insurance decreased by 20,000 to a seasonally adjusted 304,000 in the week ended Dec. 9 from an unrevised 324,000, the Labor Department said Thursday. The level was the lowest since new claims dropped to 300,000 the week ending Oct. 14. The four-week moving average for jobless claims fell by 1,500 to 327,250.

Opec Flexes Its Muscles By Agreeing To Cut Production (FT)

By Ed Crooks And Dino Mahtani And Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, December 15, 2006

The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries yesterday moved to reassert its power over oil prices by agreeing to cut production early next year in spite of rising concerns over tightening world crude markets.

Opec ministers meeting in Abuja agreed to cut output by 500,000 barrels a day from February 1. The move came after a 1.2m b/d cut announced in October, and sent prices higher.

Crude prices rose, with January West Texas Intermediary crude rising $1.15 to end at $62.52 in New York trading. The WTI benchmark price has risen 10 per cent in the past month.

Opec also broadened its reach by adding Angola as a member - boosting its share of world production from 40 to 43 per cent - while also calling a rare heads of state summit next year inSaudi Arabia.

Opec last met in the kingdom in 1980. In its 46-year history, Opec has held only two summits of heads of state, with the most recent one in 2000 in Caracas.

Analysts saw the move as highlighting Saudi Arabia's increasing assertiveness within the cartel, which comes as Riyadh is also stepping up its political activity in the Middle East, even at the risk of angering the US, its major western ally.

Adam Sieminski, chief energy economist at Deutsche Bank, said: "In addition to flexing its muscles externally, Saudi Arabia, with the heads of state meeting, wants to make sure that the group keeps working together for the long term."

Saudi Arabia has played a pivotal role in Opec, in which it is the biggest producer.

But, in the past, the kingdom has sought to keep a low profile within the cartel to avoid straining its relationship with the US and Europe.

In a statement, Opec said the cut was justified on the basis that there was "more than ample crude supply, high stocks levels and increasing spare capacity" in the market.

The cartel estimates that non-Opec oil production will rise by 1.8m b/d next year, its fastest rate since 1984, and that global economic growth will slow.

However, the cut was criticised by the International Energy Agency, the industrialised countries' energy watchdog, which had warned that world oil markets were tightening.

Lawrence Eagles, of the IEA, said: "The announcement of further cuts is unwelcome, particularly in the light of existing high prices, elevated supply risks and the onset of the peak winter heating season."

The IEA estimated that Opec production actually fell by only half the 1.2m b/d target last month. Opec itself believes compliance has been better, although still short of the target.

OPEC Sets Reduction In Output (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

New York Times, December 15, 2006

The OPEC oil cartel said yesterday that it planned to reduce its output by nearly 2 percent in February, the group's second production cut in two months and its strongest indication yet that it would seek to keep oil prices above $60 a barrel next year.

Representatives from OPEC nations agreed to pare their production to 25.8 million barrels a day, from 26.3 million barrels, starting on Feb. 1. The group had already agreed to a 4 percent production cut in October to prop up prices.

"I hope the market appreciates we are working so diligently to bring supply and demand in balance, to have inventories at a reasonable level so that we do not have gyrations," Ali al-Naimi, the Saudi oil minister, told reporters at the meeting in Abuja, Nigeria.

The Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, which accounts for 40 percent of the world's oil exports, also said Angola would join the group next year, becoming its first new member since 1975.

Angola, Africa's fastest-growing oil exporter, is a powerful addition to OPEC, which has 11 members. Foreign oil companies have invested heavily in Angola in recent years and expect its production to grow sharply in the coming decade. Angola pumps 1.4 million barrels a day, ranking it above Qatar and Indonesia within OPEC.

Some OPEC producers have expressed concern that shrinking demand next year might cause prices to fall if production were left unchecked. But with oil prices still hovering around $60 a barrel and commercial inventories down substantially over the last months, analysts were surprised by OPEC's decision.

"This makes an incredibly tight market even tighter," said Edward Morse, the chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers in New York. "It's a very aggressive, assertive move. Clearly, some OPEC members want to keep a $60 floor."

Oil futures on the New York Mercantile Exchange rose after the announcement by OPEC. Crude oil for January delivery rose $1.14, to $62.51 a barrel yesterday. Prices had lost more than $20 a barrel since hitting a record close of $77.03 this summer. That fall prompted OPEC to abandon its two-year- old policy of keeping its taps open to keep markets well supplied.

After touching a low for the year of $55 in November, prices have since rebounded, mostly as OPEC has curbed supplies.

"They are jawboning the market and trying to show they are being aggressive," said Roger Diwan, a managing director at PFC Energy, a consultant in Washington. "The question is, Are they being too aggressive?"

In a statement released at the end of the one-day meeting, OPEC said that "market fundamentals clearly indicate that there is more than ample crude supply, high stock levels and increasing spare capacity."

Saudi Arabia, the main power broker within OPEC and the world's biggest oil exporter, has taken the lead in reducing its own output and is behind the cartel's recent shift to curb supplies. Though some critics have been skeptical about past compliance, the Saudi minister estimated that OPEC members have adhered to about 80 percent of the cuts agreed upon at the last emergency meeting, held in Doha, Qatar, on Oct. 19.

But since OPEC does not publish production figures, there is very little reliable data for oil markets. Mr. Morse of Lehman estimates that OPEC countries have actually pared production by only 700,000 barrels a day, instead of 1.2 million barrels, since the October meeting. He expects OPEC will cut only another 300,000 barrels, starting in February, instead of 500,000 barrels as agreed to yesterday.

According to the latest report from the International Energy Agency, OPEC production fell by 550,000 barrels a day in November, to 28.9 million. That figure includes the production of Iraq, which does not have an OPEC quota.

Analysts at the energy agency, which represents consumers, have warned OPEC not to cut its production further as higher energy prices could erode economic growth. The agency trimmed its forecast for Chinese demand growth to 5.6 percent in 2006, from a previous estimate of 6.2 percent.

OPEC said yesterday in a statement that it expected global oil demand to grow by 1.3 million barrels a day in 2007. But it expects new supplies from non-OPEC producers to grow by 1.8 million barrels a day. This would be the largest one-year rise in non-OPEC supplies since 1984, according to OPEC.

In the lead-up to the meeting, Edmund Daukoru, Nigeria's oil minister and OPEC president for this year, said there was a general support for a production cut. The representatives of Algeria, Venezuela, Iran and Indonesia all agreed about a need to trim production. In recent weeks oil inventories held by consuming nations fell sharply. In the United States, the world's biggest market, oil product stocks have fallen by 54 million barrels since October, a drop of nearly a million barrels a day.

Lawrence J. Goldstein, the president of the Petroleum Industry Research Foundation in New York, said OPEC ministers should be careful how they manage the market in coming months.

He suggested that high energy costs could reduce consumption.

"That's a trend OPEC and the Saudis should not be ignoring," he said, "because at the end of the day they want to sell, and if you want to sell, you need a vibrant economy, particularly in the United States."

OPEC's Cut Aims To Prop Up Prices (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

ABUJA, Nigeria -- OPEC, in announcing it plans to slice its output by an additional 1.9% starting Feb. 1, is sending a strong signal that it will try to prevent oil prices from sliding further.

The real impact of the cartel's latest output move on oil markets remains unclear. The big unknown is whether members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will actually implement the decision, which calls for a collective cut of 500,000 barrels a day. Some OPEC officials say that will depend on demand in the next two months, the level of prices and the amount of oil held in inventories in major consumer countries. (See related article on page C2.)

OPEC's decision to cut oil production2 reflects its view that prices of $60 a barrel aren't hurting the global economy, says Oppenheimer energy analyst Fadel Gheit. He speaks with WSJ commodities reporter Peter McKay.

But the announcement signals OPEC's intention to keep oil supply tight to shore up prices and trim global oil inventories, whose buildup this year was threatening the cartel's power. OPEC's move comes even as prices have stabilized in the wake of a much larger 4% cut in October. A week ago, OPEC had been leaning against a second cut. But in recent days, a chorus of fears arose about a possible softening of oil demand early next year.

Crude prices swooned to $56 a barrel in November after peaking at a nominal high of $77.03 July 14. Oil prices rose yesterday, with light, sweet crude for January delivery up $1.14, or 1.9%, to $62.51 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. January Brent on London's ICE futures exchange rose 79 cents to $62.12 a barrel.

One factor making it difficult to parse the impact of yesterday's decision is that, so far, OPEC members haven't fully complied with the prior round of reductions. That move called for an output cut of 1.2 million barrels a day, or about 4%, to 26.3 million barrels a day, effective Nov. 1. Independent estimates of OPEC's compliance generally put the actual reductions at about 600,000 barrels a day. Saudi oil minister Ali Naimi, the effective leader of OPEC, said yesterday that compliance was nearly 80%, meaning that supply had been cut by almost one million barrels a day.

Even modest compliance with the new cut could spell pain for oil consumers, however. In February 2004, OPEC announced production cuts just as world oil demand began soaring. OPEC reversed course and began pumping flat-out to sate demand instead, but prices jumped anyway.

In a brief interview after yesterday's meeting, Mr. Naimi said OPEC won't deny the market extra barrels of oil if they are really needed. "What did we do before?" he asked rhetorically, alluding to the move to ramp up output in 2004 after the aborted cut. "People don't know the trouble we go to, to balance the market," Mr. Naimi said. "Without us, the oil market would be chaotic."

A senior OPEC official said the cut was a pre-emptive measure meant to ensure the cartel has a mechanism in place to reduce supply immediately if needed. But if buyers demand more oil than the cartel is forecasting, he said, OPEC will deliver it. "We need an agreement to cut [supply]," this official said. "We don't need an agreement to supply more oil if customers really want it."

Indeed, some analysts view yesterday's decision as an insurance policy to be used should prices weaken next year, when some estimates show that the rise in output from non-OPEC producers will exceed anticipated growth in world demand for petroleum.

"This is an option on a second cut," said Roger Diwan, an analyst at PFC Energy in Washington "They want to signal an aggressive oil-market-management strategy, but the decision also allows them to retract it if the market overtightens," Mr. Diwan said.

The entry of Angola on Jan. 1 should strengthen the cartel by bringing into OPEC's fold a country whose oil output is soaring. OPEC accepted Angola as its 12th member -- the first entrant since 1973. Angola estimates that its production will rise to about two million barrels a day by the second half of 2007 from about 1.4 million barrels a day currently.

Angola won't participate in the February cuts. But Qatar's oil minister, Abdullah bin Hamad Al Attiyah, said Angola would be party to OPEC's output decisions from March onward.

OPEC Plans Another Cutback In Oil Production (BLOOM)

By Andy Critchlow And Fred Pals

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

OPEC, whose member nations produce 40 percent of the world's oil, said yesterday it would cut output by 1.9 percent in February. OPEC also accepted Angola as a member to gain greater control over global crude supplies.

Production will be pared by 500,000 barrels a day as of Feb. 1, OPEC President Edmund Daukoru told journalists in Abuja, the Nigerian capital. The cut is in addition to the 1.2 million barrel-a-day reduction agreed upon by the OPEC at its previous meeting on Oct. 20 in Doha, Qatar.

The 11-member group, known formally as the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, is attempting to revive prices that have slid about 21 percent from a July record of $78.40 a barrel in New York. The cuts take effect about seven weeks before the end of the Northern Hemisphere winter, when demand for heating fuels typically starts to decline.

"OPEC is sending a message that it is trying to control supply and keep a floor under the price," said Mike Wittner, the London-based head of energy market research at Calyon, a unit of Credit Agricole SA. "It's a compromise between the countries that wanted a cut and those that wanted a rollover."

Oil rose yesterday on speculation that OPEC's meeting would result in lower supplies, jumping $1.14, or 1.9 percent, to $62.51 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"The decision is short-term bullish but it won't push prices up by several dollars," Wittner said.

Angola's membership will be effective Jan. 1, said Daukoru, who is also Nigeria's oil minister. Angola won't be bound by the new agreement until March 1, he said.

Angola will be the first country to join OPEC since Gabon, which became a member in 1975 only to exit in 1994. Nigeria, the group's fifth-largest producer and a member since 1971, was the last existing member to join, according to the group's Web site.

Americans Open To New Kinds Of Candidates (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

AMERICANS ASSERT their readiness for new kinds of presidential wannabes.

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, eight in 10 Americans would be "comfortable" or "enthusiastic" about an African-American or woman running for president. That apparent openness -- reflected across race, region and age groups -- is encouraging news for leading 2008 Democrats Clinton and Obama.

Though just 19% would have "some reservations" or be "very uncomfortable" about a Jewish candidate, 53% would about a Mormon seeking the White House. Misgivings are higher among conservatives and evangelicals, underscoring need for Massachusetts Gov. Romney to address the issue the way JFK defused concerns about Catholicism in 1960.

More Americans express doubts about a candidate who served in Bush's cabinet (59%) than one who is gay or lesbian (53%).

DEMOCRATS BENEFIT from post-election good feeling.

Some 46% of Americans give Democrats a positive rating, up from 36% in January. Just 29% rate the party negatively, down from 35% in January. A 46%-33% plurality rates Republicans negatively.

Americans remain "grouchy" toward Republicans, says Republican pollster Bill McInturff, who conducts the poll with Democratic counterpart Peter Hart. The strongest sign: though Americans identified themselves with the two parties in equal proportions on Election Day 2004, Democrats now boast a robust 44%-31% edge. Next six months will be critical, McInturff says, in determining whether that edge persists into 2008.

AUTO MAKERS FACE heat from public and lawmakers for higher fuel efficiency.

Fully 87% of Democrats, 76% of independents and 74% of Republicans back requirements for more fuel efficiency even if that raises auto prices. That complicates auto makers' ability to mount filibuster against bipartisan Senate bill, sponsored by Democrat Obama and Republican Lugar, to raise CAFE standards.

Industry may have better luck in the House, where Democratic powers Dingell and Hoyer call CAFE outmoded; they back tax incentives for auto makers and buyers as an alternative. Though Americans overall split on expanding nuclear power in new energy strategy, liberals remain opposed by 59%-35%.

Rollback of oil company tax breaks, blocked by lame-duck Republican Congress, is favored by 48% plurality of Bush 2004 voters.

HEAR ME? Only one in four Americans says Bush got their message from midterm elections and is making needed adjustments. But 41% say the president heard but isn't adjusting; 18% assert he hasn't gotten the message. Seven in 10 expect little change.

LOW EXPECTATIONS: Only a third of Americans expect a new Congress more ethical than the old one; just one-fourth envision one that is less partisan. Incoming Speaker Pelosi's image moves into the black, barely: 25% positive, 23% negative.

HISPANICS STRONGLY support Bush's temporary-worker program for illegal immigrants. But 52% of whites and 59% of blacks express opposition.

IN WHOSE NAME? By 53%-39%, public says the U.S. doesn't owe it to killed or wounded American soldiers to stay in Iraq "until the mission is completed." But Americans split on whether the U.S. owes it to Iraqis to stay until their country is stabilized; 46% say yes, 47% no.

DEFICIT RATES scant public attention, but agencies fear budget cuts.

Just 5% of Americans identify red ink as top priority for Washington. But Bush, seeking high ground on an issue mavericks in both parties have targeted, plans in Saturday radio address to challenge congressional Democrats to move aggressively against special-project "earmarks."

Democrats' decision to shelve leftover spending bills in favor of continued stop-gap funding heightens bureaucratic anxiety. Administrative office of U.S. courts warns safety could be endangered by staff shortfall in probation offices, since "felons released from prison ... would not receive" adequate supervision.

Concern is highest at agencies such as SEC and State that had been slated for 2007 increases.

MINOR MEMOS: An independent Bloomberg presidential bid, scoring among upscale independents, gives Clinton a 40%-39% edge over McCain in three-way 2008 race. ... Kerry draws positive ratings from just 48% of those who voted for him two years ago.

Whichever Way The Wind Blows (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

New York Times, December 15, 2006

Midland, Tex.

Time for another news quiz: Which American state produces more wind-generated electricity than any other? Answer: Texas. Next question — this one you'll never get: Which politician launched the Texas wind industry? Answer: Former Gov., now President, George W. Bush.

Yes, there are many things that baffle me about President Bush, but none more than how the same man who initiated one of the most effective renewable energy programs in America, has presided over an administration that for six years has dragged its feet on alternative energy, used its regulatory powers to weaken efficiency standards for major appliances and stuck its head in the sand on global warming.

I'll wait for historians to sort that out. But here is some immediate advice I can give the president: If you want to salvage any positive legacy, it will not come from Iraq. There are only tears left there. No, the only way for you, Mr. President, to salvage any legacy is to get back in touch with your green Texas roots and devote the rest of your term to REALLY ending America's oil addiction, liberating us from dependence on petro-authoritarian regimes and making America the leader in renewable energies that combat climate change.

If this isn't the core of Mr. Bush's next State of the Union, he might as well go back to Crawford now. At least there he might be able to contemplate what went wrong with his presidency under lights powered by clean, wind-generated electricity that he promoted.

I came down to West Texas, the Saudi Arabia of wind, to find out how it all happened. Pat Wood, a friend of the president, was chairman of Texas's Public Utility Commission when the push for wind energy started.

"At the end of a meeting on transmission policy in mid-1996," he recalled, "I was on my way out the door of the governor's office, when Governor Bush said to me, 'Pat, we like wind.' He was at his desk. I said, 'We what?' He said: 'You heard me. Go get smart on wind.' "

Mr. Wood, his fellow commissioners and the Texas utilities did just that. They conducted polls and were stunned by the results: Texas electricity customers were ready to pay a little extra to get more clean renewable energy. So Mr. Bush instructed Mr. Wood to work on wind with the utilities and the environmentalists. Together, they created the Texas Renewable Portfolio Mandate, which Mr. Bush got passed by the Texas Legislature in 1999, as part of a power competition bill. The mandate stipulated that Texas power companies had to produce 2,000 new megawatts of electricity from renewables, mostly wind, by 2009.

What happened? A dozen new companies jumped into the Texas market and built wind turbines to meet the mandate — so many that the 2,000-megawatt goal was reached in 2005. So now the Texas Legislature has upped the mandate to 5,000 megawatts by 2015. Everyone knows they'll beat that, too, because all this investment has driven down the costs and made wind power in Texas competitive with clean coal, nuclear and natural gas, even without the temporary tax break. Mr. Wood says he thinks Texas could be producing 15 percent of all its energy from renewables by 2015.

An energy wiz, Mr. Wood now advises Airtricity, an Irish wind-power company that also entered the Texas market. He and I toured its new wind farm near Midland, which will provide enough wind electricity — 125 megawatts — to power 40,000 homes in Dallas, replacing gas, nuclear and coal. The farm consists of giant turbines that sprout like Star Wars machine-monsters from the hardscrabble plains around Midland — amid the mesquite, rattlesnakes and oil-pumping jacks.

When Mr. Bush ran for governor, his motto was: "What Texans can dream, Texans can do." Just substitute "Americans" for "Texans," and he's already got the last line of his next State of the Union. What would the substance be? First, let's set a Texas-like renewable energy mandate for every state. Second, let's forge a national electricity transmission grid from the Dakotas to

Texas to take wind electricity from where it is best produced to the big cities where it is most needed. Finally, let's create a long-term tax subsidy for building and buying plug-in hybrid cars. Wind energy is produced abundantly at night, when demand is lowest. Electric hybrids would be charged at night. That would mean hybrid electric cars, which emit virtually no carbon, could be powered by wind, which produces no carbon. If that scaled, it could be better than Kyoto.

You got something better to do, Mr. President?

Trade Ruling On Steel May Boost Auto Industry (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt, Paul Glader And Mike Spector

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Decisions that signal the end of many U.S. steel tariffs promise struggling auto makers a boost, and reflect a shift in the political and economic fortunes of these two pillars of the U.S. economy.

Heavy-equipment makers will also benefit from a separate ruling yesterday by the U.S. International Trade Commission that clears the way for tariffs to lapse on cut-to-length plate steel from 11 countries.

The end to tariffs on corrosion-resistant steel essential to car making from Australia, Canada, France and Japan will benefit auto makers. Tariffs remain in place for the same type of steel from Germany and South Korea.

Domestic steelmakers, which have long received favored treatment in Washington, were surprised by the ruling. In addition, they face several more ITC reviews in coming months on products such as hot-rolled steel product, pipe and tubular goods as well as concrete-reinforcing bar, which is used in construction. Some oil companies also are said to be lining up to lobby for an elimination of tariffs on pipe and tubular goods.

"It's very disappointing," said Dan DiMicco, chairman and CEO of Charlotte, N.C.-based Nucor Corp., one of the U.S.'s three largest steel producers that had lobbied to keep the trade restrictions. Mr. DiMicco said he was glad the restrictions for galvanized products were kept in place on products from South Korea and Germany, which make up 40% of total tonnage involved in the case, but he was disappointed the other 60% from Australia, Canada, Japan and France could now be imported into the U.S. with fewer restrictions.

Mr. DiMicco said the steelmakers are planning an appeal. Yesterday, shares in Nucor fell $1.44, or 2.41%, to $58.33 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

The decision by the ITC, an independent agency with broad authority over U.S. trade policy, represents an important victory for the auto industry that had waged a strong campaign against the duties this year.

The duties on steel imports "have been virtually impossible to take off," said Stephen Biegun, Ford Motor Co.'s vice president for international governmental affairs. "This is a tectonic shift that has occurred here."

All of the duties were implemented more than a decade ago. At the time, the steel industry was reeling from the dumping of low-priced, subsidized imports into the market. Today, the steel industry is strong and profitable, and the auto companies argued that the duties are no longer needed and that the elimination of the duties would inject more competition into the steel industry.

The case brought together rival U.S. and Japanese auto makers -- General Motors Corp., Ford, and DaimlerChrysler AG joined forces with Toyota Motor Corp., Honda Motor Co., and Nissan Motor Co. -- in a first-ever alliance in a trade dispute. Yesterday, auto shares rose in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange: General Motors rose 32 cents, or 1.09%, to $29.77; Ford 23 cents, up 3.34%, to $7,11; and DaimlerChrysler up 40 cents, or 0.66%, to $60.64. Toyota's American depositary shares rose $1.45, or 1.17%, to $125.70; Honda's ADS were up 27 cents, or 0.76%, to $36.03.

As a practical matter, the ITC action won't immediately result in the elimination of the duties. The commission must notify the Commerce Department of its decision, expected by Jan. 17. The department would then issue orders eliminating the duties.

The impact of the ITC vote is likely to ripple through the auto industry. Auto-parts suppliers, for example, have felt the brunt of higher commodities costs, including steel. Many parts suppliers had signed contracts in the past few years that required annual price decreases on certain components. And auto makers, in turn, were loath to provide relief to suppliers when materials costs skyrocketed.

In moving to eliminate duties on imported "cut-to-length plate" steel important to heavy-equipment makers, the ITC determined domestic steel producers wouldn't be harmed by the elimination of duties on imports from 11 countries.

Companies such as Caterpillar Inc. and Deere & Co. are expected to benefit. For Caterpillar, in particular, it's a big win. The Peoria, Ill., company is one of the largest U.S. users of plate steel.The end of the tariffs could help it make its products more efficiently, said Bill Lane, Caterpillar's Washington director of governmental affairs. Yesterday, in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading Caterpillar's shares were up 63 cents, or 1.02%, to $62.12; Deere was up $1.41, or 1.49%, to $96.11.

Obama: Not 'the Un-Hillary' (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson

Chicago Tribune, December 15, 2006

On the cusp of a historic decision over whether to run for the White House, Sen. Barack Obama said Thursday that he believed he would be a "viable candidate" for president who could move the nation beyond the generational politics that have defined the last 40 years.

"I wouldn't run if I didn't think I could win," Obama (D-Ill.) said in a wide-ranging, hourlong interview with the Tribune editorial board in which the senator articulated a rationale for his potential candidacy, confidence in his ability to win and an assessment of potential opponents—both Democrat and Republican.

Obama said that he would reveal his decision in January, following a two-week family vacation that returns him to his roots in Hawaii, setting an extraordinary arc for a politician who a little more than two years ago was a state senator toiling in Springfield.

"Obviously, I find myself at an interesting moment in time," said Obama, who has ignited a stunning level of excitement nationwide with the prospects of his candidacy. At the same time, Obama said he viewed hype over his potential candidacy as "transitory" and not something that would dictate his decision.

He said he had no real concerns about his ability to put together a staff and raise the tens of millions of dollars he would need to wage a campaign against his potential opponents, including Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

But he said he would have to weigh heavily the burdens that a campaign would place on his family, with his wife and two young daughters, making sure they would not "unduly suffer" from the hothouse atmosphere a White House run would create.

"Do I have something that is sufficiently unique to offer to the country that it is worth putting my family through a presidential campaign?" he said. "Politically, I think I would be a viable candidate. So that's a threshold question and I wouldn't run if I didn't think I could win."

His best-selling book, demands for him to campaign for other Democrats during the recent midterm elections, and the remarkable attention he has commanded in appearances in states with early nominating contests have combined to quickly thrust Obama into the upper tier of Democratic presidential contenders.

He also conceded that he has never been through anything approaching the level of scrutiny that a presidential campaign would bring on him, his family, and almost anyone who has been associated with him.

He said that his two books, the first an autobiography written when he was in his late 30s, and the second, a more policy-oriented book, offer much detail about who he is and his views on issues.

Asked how he would address the issue of his relative lack of experience, Obama said that he thought that the campaign itself —how he managed it, his position on issues and his framing of a vision for the country—would answer the question. "That experience question would be answered at the end of the campaign," he said.

"The test of leadership in my mind is not going to be what's on a paper resume," Obama said. Vice President Dick Cheney, a former defense secretary, and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "had the best resume on paper of any foreign policy team and the result has been what I consider to be one of the biggest foreign policy mistakes in our history," he said.

Should Obama seek the Democratic nomination, he would face a large field, many with much longer resumes than Illinois junior senator. But in three national polls released this week, Obama has leapfrogged many of those contenders and put himself in a position to be an alternative to Clinton, who, like Obama, has not declared her candidacy.

Obama said he was not concerned about being able to compete either in fundraising or in staffing should he enter the race.

"I don't want it to sound like raising $50 million to $60 million is easy," he said. "It's hard, but I think it's something that we could do."

Though he was born in 1961, Obama cast himself as the face of a post-Baby Boomer generation not fundamentally shaped by Vietnam and the culture conflicts of the 1960s. He said he could "help turn the page in ways that other candidates can't do."

Sounding very much like a candidate, Obama called Clinton, 59, a "tough, disciplined, smart, intelligent public servant." But, compared to Clinton, he maintained he was able to look at "some issues differently as a consequence of being of a slightly different generation."

When asked his assessment of Clinton, Obama said, "I think she'd be a capable president.

"She has gone through some battles that, in some cases unfairly, have created a perception about her that is different from how I am perceived," he said.

Obama said, however, that he had no interest in being what he called "the un-Hillary"—a reference to serving as a standard bearer for Democrats looking for an alternative to Clinton.

As for Republicans, Obama said that he placed Sen. John McCain of Arizona in the same position as Clinton holds among Democrats, with great name recognition and resources and the ability to sew up much of the party establishment. But he also said he considered Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney an "attractive candidate," though he said Romney was "making a mistake in trying to look more conservative than he may be" to gain core conservative support.

Speaking of a potential match up with McCain, Obama said he was under no illusions how a GOP presidential campaign would be run against him.

"War hero against snot-nosed rookie," Obama said.

The first-term Illinois senator said he consulted earlier this week with Mayor Richard Daley on a potential presidential bid, but declined to discuss specifics.

But Obama acknowledged "it was stupid" of him to get involved in the purchase almost one year ago of a strip of property adjoining his $1.65 million home from Antoin "Tony" Rezko, who owned a vacant lot next door. Rezko, a political insider and fundraiser, was indicted in October on charges of trying to extort campaign donations and kickbacks from firms seeking state business. Rezko has pleaded not guilty.

"I am the first one to acknowledge that it was a boneheaded move for me to purchase this 10-foot strip from Rezko, given that he was already under a cloud of concern," Obama said. "I will also acknowledge that from his perspective, he no doubt believed that by buying the piece of property next to me that he would, if not be doing me a favor, it would help strengthen our relationship."

On the same day that Obama and his wife closed on their home, Rezko's wife, Rita, closed on the $625,000 vacant lot next door. Both lots had once been part of the same estate, but the owner listed them as separate parcels.

Obama said he has known Rezko for 20 years and "he had never asked me for anything. I've never done any favors for him."

"There was no sense of betrayal of the public trust here," Obama said.

Taking 'Obama-mania' In Stride (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

This is less about me, and more about you. That was Barack Obama's explanation for his rock-star welcome in New Hampshire last weekend. The possible presidential candidate said he's become a "symbol" of voters' desire for "something new."

Such self-deprecation could be sincere sentiment - or it could be skilled political rhetoric. It doesn't matter which, though, because the words of the junior senator from Illinois are true.

People don't know much about this Democratic fresh face; he's too inexperienced to have a long political track record. But they're obviously responding positively to what he symbolizes: a call to reach across the partisan and ideological divide in America.

What voters are looking for in 2008 is "someone who is seen as independent and detached from the traditional centers of power of each party," says Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center, a nonpartisan polling and research group.

Those qualities aren't the sole purview of any single candidate, though. Indeed, the field that's shaping up (and these look to be about two dozen so far), contains several examples of folks who have reached across the aisle.

John McCain, the senator from Arizona and an expected Republican presidential candidate, has earned a reputation for independence. In his 2000 presidential bid he criss-crossed the country in his "Straight Talk Express" bus. He can pull any number of bipartisan credentials from his pocket, including campaign-finance reform.

And what would you call, for instance, former GOP mayor of New York Rudy Giuliani, who brought his city together after 9/11? A unifier perhaps? And yes, the rap on New York Sen. Hillary Clinton - the accepted Democratic presidential front-runner - may be that she's polarizing, but didn't she and her husband storm the country in 1992 as "new Democrats," i.e., centrists? She's made a concerted effort to work with Senate Republicans, including a 2005 bill she co-sponsored with GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham related to incentives for domestic manufacturing.

Senator Obama is tapping into a public desire for a unified approach to today's challenges. "There's a moment that we are living through in our history right now where we've got a series of very important decisions to make, and we have the opportunity to make them, not as Democrats, not as Republicans, but as Americans," he said last weekend. As the son of a white Kansan mother and black Kenyan father, he literally embodies cross-cultural and cross-racial unity.

But it's not as if Obama is stripped of ideology. He's pro-choice, pro- affirmative action, and supports "universal" health care - traditional Democratic causes. The National Journal, a nonpartisan publication, gave him an 82.5 liberalism rating, higher than Sen. Clinton (79.8).

McCain, meanwhile, has been insisting that he's more conservative than people think he is. Last May for instance, he spoke at Jerry Falwell's Liberty University - after blasting him for intolerance in 2000. So, is his conservative claim a feint to partisan primary voters or true confessions?

Voters indeed may yearn for a candidate above the political fray. But will they be able to recognize one?

Commission Seeks School System Overhaul (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, December 15, 2006

Education and business leaders urged an overhaul of the U.S. school system, including ending high school at the 10th grade for many students. Current teaching is failing to prepare young Americans for the global economy, members of a bipartisan panel said Thursday.

Beginning teachers should earn more, according to the group, and money for this idea could come from the scrapping of conventional teacher pension plans in favor of other benefits such as 401(k)s.

"People have got to understand what we've got is not working. It's not working for kids, but it's not working for teachers either," said William Brock, a former congressman who was labor secretary and trade representative in the Reagan administration.

The Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce was organized by people who launched a group by the same name about 16 years ago. That commission made a series of recommendations, several of which were enacted.

Under the new group's proposal, students would finish 10th grade and then take exams. Depending on how well the students perform, they could go on to community college or stay in school and study for more advanced tests that could earn them a place at a four-year college. Somewhat similar systems are in place in other countries.

The report says that by not spending today's resources on 11th- and 12th-graders and through other changes, the government could eventually save an estimated $60 billion.

The money could pay, for example, for new pre-kindergarten programs and higher teacher salaries, which the report said would help recruit top graduates into the profession.

The commission recommends paying beginning teachers about $45,000 per year, currently the median amount paid to teachers — meaning half earn more than that and half earn less.

To help cover the cost, the commission recommends moving away from traditional, defined benefit pensions to less generous retirement plans commonly found in the private sector.

Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the American Federation of Teachers, said teachers should not have to lose benefits in order to make more.

One other major shift would put independent contractors in charge of operating schools, though the schools would remain public. States would oversee the funding.

Cortese also was critical of that idea. "Blowing up the governance system is very drastic, and we don't know what will happen in its place," she said.

Chuck Saylors, a school board member and parent in Taylors, S.C., said shifting control to the states from the local districts would be controversial. "Mainly because we have done it the same way for so long," Saylors said, adding that he was glad the group had put forward thought-provoking ideas.

The report notes the U.S. had 30 percent of the world's population of college students three decades ago, but that has fallen to 14 percent. The commission also cites poor performance by U.S. students in exams when compared with students in other advanced industrial nations.

"We may want to wait to think about these changes, but quite simply the world will not wait for us to catch up," said Thomas Payzant, a commission member who recently stepped down as Boston's school superintendent.

The commission's work was financed by several foundations, including the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation.

Among the initiatives from the first commission that the government enacted were a push for states to develop achievement standards and stepped-up training for high school graduates going directly into the work force.

The current commission includes are former education secretaries Rod Paige and Richard Riley; former Labor Secretary Ray Marshall; former Michigan Gov. John Engler; and Joel Klein, chancellor of the New York City schools.

Expert Panel Proposes Far-Reaching Redesign Of The American Education System (NYT)

By David M. Herszenhorn

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

Warning that Americans face a grave risk of losing their prosperity and high quality of life to better educated workers overseas, a panel of education, labor and other public policy experts yesterday proposed a far-reaching redesign of the United States education system that would include having schools operated by independent contractors and giving states, rather than local districts, control over school financing.

The panel, the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, included two former federal education secretaries, Rod Paige, a Republican, and Richard W. Riley, a Democrat; two former labor secretaries, William E. Brock, a Republican, and Ray Marshall, a Democrat; and an array of other luminaries, including former Gov. John Engler of Michigan, and the New York City schools chancellor, Joel I. Klein.

The commission's report, released at a news conference in Washington, rethinks American schooling from top to bottom, going beyond the achievement goals of the federal education law known as No Child Left Behind, and farther than many initiatives being pursued by the Bush administration or by experimental state and local school authorities. Among other things, the report proposes starting school for most children at age 3, and requiring all students to pass board exams to graduate from high school, which for many would end after 10th grade. Students could then go to a community or technical college, or spend two years preparing for selective colleges and universities.

"We have run out the string on a whole series of initiatives that were viewed as hopeful," said Lewis H. Spence, commissioner of the Massachusetts De partment of Social Services and a member of the panel. "This puts a whole new set of ideas on the table."

Mr. Spence, a former deputy schools chancellor in New York City, and other commission members acknowledged that enacting the proposals would be difficult, requiring legislation in all states and the cooperation of the federal government. Some, like one for merit pay for teachers, would require renegotiating teacher contracts nationwide and persuading local school boards to relinquish authority and take a new role enforcing performance contracts with schools.

"You can't implement something like this overnight," said Mr. Klein, who had been scheduled to appear at yesterday's news conference with Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York, but whose flights were grounded by thick fog in Washington. Mr. Klein strongly applauded the commission's proposals, and pointed to many efforts in New York — including sharp increases in teacher pay, a new master-teacher career step; increased roles for private groups in running public schools and performance agreements signed by 331 principals in exchange for greater freedom from superintendents — as examples of how some of the commission's goals could begin to be accomplished. "We need to think big," he said.

The commission's work was quickly hailed by some as a potentially groundbreaking document. "This report has the potential to change the debate on education at the national level," said Jack Jennings, the president of the Center on Education Policy, who is a Democrat and prominent expert on the federal education law.

The national teachers' unions were apprehensive. Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the American Federation of Teachers, said the proposals included "some seriously flawed ideas with faddish allure that won't produce better academic results." Reg Weaver, the president of the National Education Association, urged "caution in calling for drastic changes."

The commission was organized by the National Center on Education and the Economy, a nonprofit, nonpartisan group based in Washington, and partly financed by the Bill and Melinda Gates foundation. The center organized a similar commission that issued a similar report 16 years ago. Marc S. Tucker, the group's president, said globalization had created new urgency. "There is this growing mismatch between the demands of the economy and what our schools are supplying," Mr. Tucker said.

In its report, the commission warned of dire consequences should the country not adopt a strikingly bold approach. "If we continue on our current course, and the number of nations outpacing us in the education race continues to grow at its current rate," it said, "the American standard of living will steadily fall relative to those nations, rich and poor, that are doing a better job."

"If the gap gets to a certain but unknowable point," the report said, "the world's investors will conclude that they can get a greater return on their funds elsewhere, and it will be almost impossible to reverse course."

Paul Romer, an economist at Stanford University, said that some of the fears about competition with India and China might be overblown but that the education system still needed improvement. He said the current effort was driven by improvements in technology, much as advances in the early 20th century led to universal high school.

"High productivity investments in education are one of the most universally supported and effective policies that governments have ever undertaken," he said. "The left and the right are both on board for high payoffs in education."

Schools Report Urges Drastic Change, Higher Salaries (WP)

By V. Dion Haynes

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

An independent commission yesterday proposed dramatic changes that would shake up American public education in an effort to make the nation more competitive globally. The recommendations include authorizing school districts to pay companies to run all their schools; enrolling many students in college after the 10th grade; and paying teachers about $100,000 annually.

The New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce -- a bipartisan panel that includes former Cabinet secretaries and governors in addition to federal and state education officials and business and civic leaders -- issued the recommendations in a report on the future workforce. The commissioners warned that unless improvements are made in the nation's public schools and colleges by 2021, a large number of jobs would be lost to countries including India and China, where workers are better educated and paid much less than their U.S. counterparts.

"We're calling for a complete shake-up from top to bottom," Charles Knapp, chairman of the commission, said at a news conference.

"The United States has one of the highest costs of education but produces mediocre results," added Knapp, former president of the University of Georgia. "The recommendations are absolutely necessary if we want America to maintain its standard of living."

The 170-page report, "Tough Choices or Tough Times," is the result of a year-long study by the panel, which includes New York Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg; Joel I. Klein, chancellor of the New York City public schools; former Michigan governor John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers; Roderick R. Paige, former secretary of the U.S. Department of Education; Marc H. Morial, president and chief executive of the National Urban League and former mayor of New Orleans; and D.C. School Superintendent Clifford B. Janey. It was funded by the Annie E. Casey Foundation, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation and the Lumina Foundation for Education.

Implementing all the recommendations, commission members said, would cost about $60 billion.

Education experts expect the study to spur public debates in legislatures and school board chambers across the country, much like the groundbreaking 1983 report "A Nation at Risk."

The report will prompt "constitutional changes, cultural shifts and changes in political will," said Andrew Romanoff, speaker of the Colorado House, who plans to introduce a measure incorporating a recommendation to increase offerings of early childhood education programs. "The report will provide the basis for our conversation."

The most controversial recommendations include empowering school districts to sign contracts with companies and teachers to run the schools -- which would replace schools' administrative structures with something similar to that in charter schools -- and forcing teachers to give up pensions in exchange for large pay increases.

Districts, they said, should relinquish control to the most highly qualified contractors, who would be rewarded for successfully running schools -- or fired if student performance languishes.

The schools "would be like charter schools in one crucial respect: They would be highly entrepreneurial," said Marc Tucker, vice chairman of the commission and staff director and president of the National Center on Education and the Economy.

But Anne L. Bryant, executive director of the National School Boards Association, said hiring contractors to run the schools would create "a huge new set of enterprises that we have no evidence will work." Moreover, it would negate the administrative economies of scale provided by a central office and "add a great deal of costs to a school," she said. "We've seen that to an extent with charter schools."

Boosting teacher pay would draw better candidates to the profession, commission members said. They recommend that schools increase teacher pay by at least $20,000 -- to $45,000 for beginners and $95,000 for experienced ones working a regular school calendar. Teachers who work year-round, they said, would be paid $110,000.

Teachers would get the raises in exchange for giving up pensions and switching to 401(k) retirement plans.

Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, agreed that teacher pay should be increased. However, "it is shortsighted to call for salary programs that increase teacher pay but deplete retirement benefits," he said in a statement.

The proposal also calls for:

Â· Setting up "personal competitiveness accounts" for all citizens to cover the cost of retraining if their jobs are phased out.

Â· Allowing students in vocational courses to graduate from high school after the 10th grade and enroll in trade schools or community colleges if they pass exams demonstrating academic competency. High-performing college-prep students would spend the 11th and 12th grades taking advanced courses and then, after graduation, enroll in college as sophomores and juniors.

Tucker said the recommendations would take 15 years to implement, but he predicted that they would result "in what will plausibly be the best national public school system in the world."

Panel: Revamp U.S. High Schools (CHIT)

By Lori Olszewski And Diane Rado

Chicago Tribune, December 15, 2006

Most high school students could leave after their sophomore year and go to community college or vocational training under a proposal endorsed by a prestigious panel on Thursday.

The report from the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce touches on all aspects of education, but some of its most unusual proposals would end America's four-year high school and replace it with a more European-style model.

The plan is one of the most expansive educational proposals to surface at a time when federal officials are encouraging experimentation in the nation's school districts to help boost high school graduation rates and help Americans better compete with foreign workers. Unlike many education reports, this one is supported by several respected education leaders, including former U.S. Secretaries of Education Richard W. Riley and Roderick Paige. Riley served a Democrat; Paige served a Republican.

Rather than requiring students to remain in high school for four years, the report proposes a rigorous 10th-grade test that would allow those who pass to leave school two years early, which proponents say could help reduce the dropout rate, among other positive effects. They could then go on to technical or vocational training or academic work in preparation for a four-year institution.

The juniors and seniors left in high school would either be teens in remedial classes working to pass the exam or youngsters who chose to stay and pursue challenging academic work so they could attend elite institutions.

Other countries do it

"It may seem radical to some Americans, but many countries do it," said commissioner and former Secretary of Labor William Brock of the goal of making sure most 16-year-olds are ready to leave high school for higher education. "Who would say our young people are less capable?"

Unlike in Europe, though, doors would not permanently close to students who fail the American 10th-grade exams. Teens would be encouraged to retake the exam to be developed by each state until they pass it.

Still, reservations about the controversial proposals surfaced on a variety of fronts.

"There are some seriously flawed ideas," said Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the American Federation of Teachers.

She said, "We don't need a distracting, massive restructuring to help high schoolers reach high standards."

The commission says that much of the plan could be funded by an estimated $67 billion in savings from high school and college programs that would no longer be necessary under the proposal. But those savings would not be fully realized for another 15 years, making it uncertain where the start-up money would come from for the program. The commission also hopes to raise money to launch demonstration projects in interested states.

A number of Chicago high school students on Thursday were open to the idea of going to college early, but they thought it might not be for everyone. They said their friends change interests and careers from day to day.

"A positive is that it would help you see where you are (academically) in time to do something about it," said Derell Bonner, 16, a junior at Prosser High School. "But I think 16 is too young to really know what you want to do."

Commissioners said, however, young people already are making choices at 16 that will limit the rest of their lives, such as dropping out.

"This country is cooked if we don't make a vast improvement in the outcomes for our kids," said Marc Tucker, a major architect of the proposals as vice chairman and staff director of the private, non-partisan commission.

Tucker, a national expert on education and the economy, was on a previous commission that issued a report that helped spur the national education standards movement and resulted in legislation.

Dropout rate too high

The nation's staggering dropout rates drain the economy and continue to erode the middle class, especially in urban areas like Chicago where about half the students don't finish school, the report said. Even students who get a high school diploma and go on to college often must take remedial courses because they don't have the skills to succeed academically.

The report comes after a surge in interest in high school reform during the last several years fueled by philanthropist Bill Gates and a National Governors Association summit in February 2005 that drew attention to the need for higher standards to better prepare students for college or work.

Since then, several states, including Illinois, have increased high school graduation requirements. But only 11 states—Illinois not among them—have in place the rigorous requirements experts believe will truly prepare students for the world beyond high school, said Matt Gandal, executive vice president of Achieve Inc., a sponsor of the governors' summit.

Florida made a splash this week with its efforts to keep students in high school, by requiring all incoming freshmen next year to choose "majors." But a number of people expressed worry that both the Florida proposal and a move for a 10th-grade test could result in a form of tracking. They feared that some students could be steered away from challenging universities.

"The only tracking here is tracking everyone toward college," said Tucker, who emphasized that the students who failed the 10th-grade test would be given additional chances to pass it after they received academic help. The key, many critics said, is whether the nation is really ready to devote the resources to get students up to speed, especially low-income youngsters.

Need to alter entire system

Indeed, the commission report cautions against fiddling with one part of the education system without also addressing broader issues. They include proposals to make preschool available to all, to raise teacher salaries funded partly by reducing retirement benefits and to send more state money to the most disadvantaged students.

One of the most controversial ideas would strip local school boards and administrations of their traditional powers and to contract with private corporations to manage public schools.

The nation's teacher unions both issued statements opposing the move to raise teacher salaries while reducing retirement benefits.

Chester E. Finn Jr., president of the Thomas B. Fordham Foundation, praised the report for a blunt approach that could shake up the education establishment. He compared it to the groundbreaking "Nation at Risk" report of 1983, which paved the way for many educational reforms.

"There is something to offend everybody, and that approximates my own definition of consensus—a uniform level of pain felt by everybody," Finn said.

To Fix US Schools, Panel Says, Start Over (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

What if the solution to American students' stagnant performance levels and the wide achievement gap between white and minority students wasn't more money, smaller schools, or any of the reforms proposed in recent years, but rather a new education system altogether?

That's the conclusion of a bipartisan group of scholars and business leaders, school chancellors and education commissioners, and former cabinet secretaries and governors. They declare that America's public education system, designed to meet the needs of 100 years ago when the workplace revolved around an assembly line, is unsuited to today's global marketplace. Already, they warn, many Americans are in danger of falling behind and seeing their standard of living plummet.

In its place, the group proposes a series of controversial reforms:

· Offer universal pre-kindergarten programs and opportunities for continuing education for adults without high school diplomas.

· Create state board exams that students could pass at age 16 to move either on to community college or to a university-level high school curriculum.

· Improve school salaries in exchange for reducing secure pension benefits, and pay teachers more to work with at-risk kids, for longer hours, or for high performance.

· Create curriculums that emphasize creativity and abstract concepts over rote learning or mastery of facts.

"We've squeezed everything we can out of a system that was designed a century ago," says Marc Tucker, president of the National Center on Education and the Economy, and vice chairman of the New Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, which produced the report. "We've not only put in lots more money and not gotten significantly better results, we've also tried every program we can think of and not gotten significantly better results at scale. This is the sign of a system that has reached its limits."

The report is getting attention in part because of those involved - people like William Brock, the former senator and Reagan-era Labor secretary; John Engler, National Association of Manufacturers president and former Michigan governor; and Joel Klein, chancellor of New York's public schools.

It's also unusual in its scope and ambition, looking at public education in the context of changes in the global economy and workforce needs, and examining education for everyone from preschoolers to adults.

Many of the ideas are likely to encounter opposition. Even the group's proponents insist the report isn't an exact blueprint, but a framework - one they hope will be used to jumpstart a national conversation and entice a few states to experiment with overhauls inspired by these ideas, much the way states led the way with welfare reform in the early 1990s.

The report "is calling for a certain revolution, but it hasn't been put together by revolutionaries," says Mr. Tucker, optimistic that even the controversial ideas are politically feasible. "If you don't like the proposals we put on the ground, come up with some that will work better."

The commission insists, though, that these ideas won't work if only the least controversial and least costly are "cherry-picked" by states, emphasizing that they complement and bolster each other.

One of the biggest proposed changes - the state board examinations that would allow qualified 10th graders to move on to college - would eventually add up to $67 billion in savings that could be reallocated elsewhere, the report estimates. In the transition period, commission members acknowledge, significant but feasible costs would be necessary.

Adults, too, would get access to the education needed to pass the new state board exams, and the commission suggests creating "personal competitiveness accounts" - created at birth and added to over time - that would help pay for continuing education throughout an individual's work life.

Another proposal: Scrap local school funding for a state-funded system that offers more to the needy districts but doesn't diminish the resources of wealthy districts. The report then calls for giving schools far more autonomy - making them, in essence, contract schools run by teachers or others who are monitored by districts but not owned by them.

Many of the suggestions have already run into opposition. Anne Bryant, executive director of the National School Boards Association, says she applauds the goals and some recommendations, but worries that the financial aspects don't add up. Decentralized school districts would weaken the system, Dr. Bryant says.

"It's a groundbreaking report, but how much ground can you afford to break before you start rattling what's really working in order to fix what is not?" she asks. "There's a leap of faith here in about 10 different areas."

But proponents insist that in a world that increasingly rewards only highly skilled, creative workers - in which America spends the second highest amount on education of any industrialized nation but performs in the bottom part of the pack - reforms this drastic are necessary.

"I think we've tried to do what we can to improve American schools within the current context," says Jack Jennings, president of the Center on Education Policy, who says the commission has sparked an important debate. "Now we need to think much more daringly."

Report Calls For Overhaul Of U.S. Education System (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

To preserve its living standard, the U.S. must undertake a radical overhaul of its education system, according to a new report that is spurring debate among policy makers, legislators and teacher unions.

The report, by a group known as the Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, which includes former governors and cabinet secretaries from both political parties, proposes eliminating local control and funding of public schools and turning their management over to private contractors. It would end high school after 10th grade for some students who opt for two-year colleges.

The report endorses mandatory entrance exams for public colleges and universities, and calls for attracting talented young teachers by increasing salaries, while cutting pensions for retirees.

Though these proposals aren't likely to be adopted wholesale in the short run, U.S. Rep. George Miller, chairman-designate of the House Education and Workforce Committee, said some of them should get serious attention in the next Congress.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg endorsed the thrust of the commission's findings. Joel Klein, chancellor of New York City schools and a commission member, said the report is "clearly right and solid" but cautioned against implementing it too quickly.

The report also sparked immediate opposition. Some educators said the proposed college-entrance exams would unnecessarily limit access, and major teacher unions objected to pay changes and a loss of local control.

Members were appointed by the National Center on Education and the Economy, a centrist think tank influential in shaping the 1990s debate over educational standards.

The report comes at a time of changing political agendas, as leadership of Congress shifts and presidential aspirants lash together 2008 platforms. In addition, the No Child Left Behind law, mandating that all students should be proficient in reading and math by 2014, is up for reauthorization in 2007.

"I think people are going to pay close attention" to the report, said Dane Linn, education-division director for the National Governors Association.

Two former labor leaders on the commission dissented from part of the report. Morton Bahr, ex-president of the Communications Workers of America, and Dal Lawrence, past president of the Toledo Federation of Teachers, called letting private contractors run all public schools "an open door for profiteers."

Finding that the U.S. share of the global college-educated work force has fallen to about 14% from about 30% in the 1970s, the report said emerging countries like India are producing more highly educated workers even as only half of U.S. students who go to college earn a degree.

To prepare more U.S. students for postsecondary education, the commission calls for universal preschool, extra resources for at-risk students and, to equalize funding, state control of school finances. It proposes paying for such initiatives with an estimated $67 billion in savings it says would result, in part from an overhaul of public high schools.

Under its plan, after 10th grade, all students would take so-called board exams in core subjects. Although students could take the tests repeatedly during their junior and senior years, no one could gain entry to any public college or university without passing.

Those who passed on their first try could skip the rest of high school and immediately move on to community colleges and technical schools. In preparation for four-year colleges, students passing with higher scores would continue studying in high school for a more rigorous second round of exams, along the lines of current Advanced Placement tests.

U.S. Schools Overhaul Sought, Using Private Control (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, December 15, 2006

Dec. 14 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. public schools should be run by private contractors who would graduate most students by 10th grade, concluded an expert commission sponsored by the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation.

The plan also calls for state funding to replace local property taxes, free pre-kindergarten and higher teacher pay on a merit-based system. The Gates Foundation and other sponsoring groups may pay states to help implement it, organizers said.

The commission includes executives from Viacom Inc. and Lucent Technologies Inc. and school officials from New York, Massachusetts and California. It wants to end an "insane" U.S. school system that's producing students who can't handle either college or the workplace, said one of its members, former U.S. Labor Secretary William Brock.

"Our children must be given the ability to compete in a global economy," rather than a school system that leads the world in drop-out rates, Brock said. "If you're not worried about that, you have to become worried."

U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings hasn't yet studied the report, though she already is pursuing steps such as toughening school standards, offering privately managed alternatives and increasing merit-based teacher pay, spokeswoman Katherine McLane said.

"The department shares many of the concerns and goals raised in this thought-provoking report," McLane said.

Opposition

The plan faces opposition from teacher unions, which expressed concern about the proposal to hand operations over to private contractors, and to shift the structure of teacher retirement pay.

The Gates Foundation, one of the commission's sponsors, has been experimenting with some of the ideas the panel proposed today and is ready to help states implement more of them, said Tom Vander Ark, the foundation's education director.

"We would certainly like to see the states where we're working adopt these sorts of recommendations and would certainly be open to helping them plan and implement these ideas in a thoughtful way," Vander Ark said in an interview.

Congressional leaders from both parties, including the incoming Democratic chairman of the House and Senate education committees, Representative George Miller of California and Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, also praised the ambitiousness of the recommendations and promised to consider them.

Skills Commission

The panel, called the Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, estimates that its plan would cost little more than the $500 billion the U.S. currently spends each year on kindergarten through 12th grade education. The federal government provides about 9 percent of the current total, with the rest split between state revenue and local property taxes.

The commission plan proposes that states take control of the amount now provided by local governments to reduce inequities in spending between richer and poorer communities, said Marc Tucker, a co-author of the report and president of the Washington-based National Center on Education and the Economy. He said the states should then increase that spending by about $30 billion a year.

The plan also suggests adding about $19 billion a year more to teacher salaries to create a merit-based compensation system that would increase pay to a peak of $110,000 a year.

Costs Offset

The added costs of about $60 billion a year would be offset by graduating about 60 percent of students after the 10th grade, when tests would show they are ready for jobs or college. The commission predicted its improvements eventually would leave about 95 percent of all high school graduates ready for college.

The nation's largest teachers union, the 3.2 million-member National Education Association, said that recommendations such as state funding and private control of schools "could potentially disenfranchise poorer communities and eliminate community voices." The NEA, in a written statement, did say the report "shed light on some very real issues," including the need for more access to pre-kindergarten and better high schools.

The 1.3 million-member American Federation of Teachers warned of "enormous upheaval" from allowing private control of schools and from graduating students early.

Gates-funded projects in such places as Boston and Oakland show the change doesn't have to be that unsettling, since the same people who now run their schools might continue to run them, just as private contractors who are held more accountable for results, Vander Ark said. "It wouldn't have to be a mass revolution," he said.

The proposed tax shift "might be popular," since local property tax is seen by Americans as the least-fair method of state and local taxation, said Bill Ahern, spokesman for the Tax Foundation, a Washington-based advocacy group.

Funding Policies

The Education Trust, a Washington-based research and advocacy group, released a state-by-state analysis yesterday concluding that U.S. school funding policies leave poor and minority students with the worst schools, including less- qualified teachers and less-demanding curriculum.

Schools in districts with low-income students receive $907 less per student than those in wealthier districts, based on 2003 figures, the Education Trust said. The gap is as high as $2,280 in New York and $2,065 in Illinois, the organization said.

Members of the skills commission include Michael Dolan, chief financial officer of Viacom; Henry Schacht, former chairman and chief executive officer of Lucent; John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers; and former U.S. Education Secretaries Roderick Paige and Richard Riley.

Others on the panel are Marc Morial, president of the National Urban League; Morton Bahr, former president of the Communications Workers of America; Charles Reed, chancellor of the California State University System; and school system chiefs Joel Klein of New York City, Thomas Payzant of Boston and Clifford Janey of Washington, D.C.

A Pentagon Agency Is Looking At Brains -- And Raising Eyebrows (WSJ)

By Sharon Begley

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

In a request issued in October, a government agency asked researchers for "innovative" ways to monitor the brain as it learns and acquires skills, such as by tracking when brain waves flip from those characteristic of novices to those of experts, and noninvasive ways to speed up the process.

In February, the agency said it was interested in ways to use EEGs to detect when a brain had found what it was looking for in a photograph, such as a familiar face in a crowd.

As part of the same program, the agency awarded Lockheed Martin $650,000 in August to develop technology to monitor a brain's cognitive activity in real time and, if the device senses overload, make changes such as slowing the flow of data the brain is receiving.

In a progress report to the agency's "Augmented Cognition" program, a company said in September that it had completed development of a portable, wearable system of sensors that assess cognitive function, producing a readout showing how a brain's pattern of thought-related activity deviates "from that of the normal population."

The requests came from, and the report went to, the Pentagon's Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency. Established in 1958, Darpa is best known for inventing the forerunner of the Internet. For decades it lavished most of its support on physics. But lately, as part of its mission to maintain U.S. military superiority "by sponsoring revolutionary, high-payoff research," the agency has expanded into neuroscience.

Can the folks who brought you the Internet also bring you ways to look into brains -- and do you want them to?

Darpa has good reason to fund neuroscience. Discoveries and new technologies such as noninvasive imaging to detect what the mind is doing might help analysts, pilots and grunts process and react better to barrages of data, and allow real-time assessment of head injuries on the battlefield. Brain-computer interfaces in which thoughts are electronically translated into signals that operate a computer or prosthetic limb might improve rehab for soldiers suffering grievous injuries.

As with other "dual use" technologies, however, the findings and gizmos born of Darpa's brain research may well find their way into civilian life, and in ways that trouble some ethicists. Darpa's interest in neuroscience is "extensive and growing," says Jonathan Moreno of the University of Virginia, a former adviser on biodefense to the Department of Homeland Security. "There are reasons to be concerned about what uses these discoveries might be put to."

The Augmented Cognition program, for instance, seeks technologies that will "measure and track a subject's cognitive state in real time." The agency is partway there. One prototype helmet monitors brain states, which may include those associated with anger, aggression, anxiety, fatigue, deception -- in principle, any mental state -- and transmit the data wirelessly to a command center.

In battle, that would let commanders redeploy soldiers who are in no state to fight or carry out certain missions; you might not want a soldier who is boiling over with rage to search civilians. How an office supervisor, airport screener or job interviewer might make use of the technology is left to the reader's imagination.

A Darpa project using fMRI imaging of brain activity applies the discovery that recognizing a face or place you've seen before triggers a characteristic pattern of cortical activity. Do you recognize this terrorist training camp? This terrorist? The benefits could be huge. As with polygraphs and fingerprint analysis, however, technologies can be widely deployed without a solid scientific foundation about their rate of false positives, with the result that they send the innocent to prison.

In a new book, "Mind Wars," Prof. Moreno describes a Darpa project on a drug called CX717, which enables sleep-deprived people to maintain memory and cognitive function. In a world where students take Ritalin to give them a boost on the SAT and Provigil to pull all-nighters, there is no reason to think CX717, if it passes more tests, will be confined to military pilots on long-haul flights. If the drug doesn't succeed in keeping a sleep-deprived brain sharp, maybe Darpa-funded research on neurostimulation -- little zaps of electricity to improve cognitive performance -- will.

Presumably, workers and students will have the legal right to reject such "enhancements," Prof. Moreno says. Soldiers might not. Should they? Will employers or others pressure people to accept better thinking through technology? Will the use of such "augmented cognition" by business competitors have the same effect as steroids in baseball, where the perception that everyone is using them exerts pressure to do the same, to keep the playing field level? There has been virtually no debate on the ethical questions raised by the brave new brain technologies.

Ever since the atomic bomb, physicists have known that their work has potential military uses, and have spoken up about it. But on the morality of sending orders directly to the brain (of a soldier, employee, child, prisoner ...), or of devices that read thoughts and intentions from afar, neuroscientists have been strangely silent. The time to speak up is before the genie is out of the bottle.

Local Elections Test For Iran President (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, December 15, 2006

Iranians go to the polls Friday for local council elections that are expected to be a first test of support for hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad since he took office more than a year ago.

Ahmadinejad could face dissatisfaction among conservatives, some of whom feel he has been too caught up in confrontations with the West and has failed to deal with Iran's struggling economy.

Reformists — whose movement was largely crushed by hard-liners after dominating the councils, parliament and the presidency in the late 1990s and early 2000s — are hoping the vote will show popular support on which to rebuild.

All 233,000 candidates, including some 5,000 women, for town and city councils across the country were vetted by parliamentary committees, which are dominated by hard-liners. The committees disqualified about 10,000 nominees, reports said.

In the capital of Tehran, candidates plastered streets and squares of the city with posters and placards and flooded cell phones with election-related text messages.

Voters also will elect the Assembly of Experts, a body of 86 senior clerics that is charged with monitoring Iran's supreme leader and choosing his successor.

However, participation in that vote was expected to be low since there is very little difference among the candidates, who are carefully selected by Guardian Council, an election watchdog controlled by hard-liners.

The external controls on elections have been key in ensuring the ultimate authority of Iran's Islamic cleric leadership. It will be only the third time that Iranians vote for local councils, a reform introduced by former reformist President Mohammad Khatami in 1999.

About 46 million Iranians are eligible to vote in the elections for 113,000 seats in about 45,000 city and village councils. The councils approve community budgets and planning projects. In smaller cities and towns, the councils elect mayor — although in Tehran and other large cities, they only propose nominees, among whom the Interior Ministry chooses.

About 64 percent of eligible voters were expected to take part in the elections, Iran's official news agency IRNA said, based on a survey it conducted in five major cities. Results were expected Sunday or Monday.

Most importantly, the vote could be a measure of conservatives' support — or lack thereof — for Ahmadinejad, who won 2005 presidential elections riding overwhelming backing from hard-liners.

"Division among conservatives is the most significant point of (Friday's) election. Its result can also affect further elections in the coming years," said Saeed Laylaz, a political analyst in the Kargozaran daily newspaper. Parliament and presidential elections are expected to be held in 2009.

Even some hard-liners have complained that Ahmadinejad, who ran on a platform of justice and creating jobs, has boosted Iran's rhetoric against the West but has failed to fix Iran's internal problems, including high unemployment, estimated at 11 percent.

Ahmadinejad has refused to back down on Iran's nuclear ambitions despite Western threats of sanctions. The U.S. accuses Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons, a claim Tehran denies. The president has also touted himself as a strong anti-Israeli leader, saying Israel will be "wiped out" and sponsoring a conference of Holocaust deniers earlier this week, causing international outrage.

Many of the Tehran races pit Ahmadinejad supporters against backers of fellow conservative Mayor Mohammad Bagher Ghalibaf, an Iraq-Iran war veteran and commercial airline pilot.

One of the pro-Ahmadinejad candidates is the president's sister, Parvin Ahmadinejad, who has used slogans including "Justice with No Exception" as part of her campaign.

Despite the vetting done by the committees, some reformist candidates were also in the race, including two former vice presidents and one former Cabinet member from Khatami's administration.

Reformers lost control of the councils in 2003, then lost parliament in 2004 before Khatami had to leave office in 2005 because of term limits.

Rogues And Fools (NYT)

This week's conference in Iran of Holocaust deniers and racists was, predictably, a circus of Holocaust denial and racism argued by discredited scholars and even the former Ku Klux Klan leader, David Duke. But one should never underestimate the political power of these vicious ideas, even among supposedly respectable people across the Middle East and beyond.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran apparently believes his claims that the murder of six million Jews by the Nazis is a myth ginned up to justify the creation of the state of Israel. That is frightening enough. Couple that with his calls to wipe Israel off the map and his government's — so far unrestrained — drive to develop the technology needed to build a nuclear weapon, and you have even more reasons to keep yourself up at night.

What is also frightening is that Mr. Ahmadinejad believes there is political benefit in these hate-filled lies and may well be right.

He is clearly hoping they will divert Iranians' attention away from his failure to rein in corruption and improve the economy. (The conference opened just days before nationwide elections for City Councils.) These lies have already pumped up his standing even in the streets of Sunni-led Arab countries like Egypt, trumping suspicions of Shiite-led Iran's growing regional power.

This week's conference is another reminder as to why the power of rogues and fools should never be underestimated. And why history's truths must never be taken for granted or forgotten.

Israel Bars Hamas Official Carrying Millions (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 14 — In a bizarre standoff that lasted more than seven hours on Thursday, Israel barred the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, from returning home to the Gaza Strip, saying he was carrying tens of millions of dollars in cash that could be used for terrorist attacks.

Mr. Haniya was finally allowed to cross from Egypt into the southern Gaza Strip late Thursday night, but only after leaving the money with Hamas officials who stayed behind in Egypt.

During his lengthy wait, dozens of angry gunmen from his Hamas movement shot up the Rafah border terminal, clashing first with Palestinian security forces on one side of the border and later with Egyptian security officials on the other side. At least 15 Palestinians were hurt, and most were believed to be from Hamas.

After Mr. Haniya reached the Gaza side, another round of shooting broke out and one of his sons was wounded and one of his bodyguards killed.

It was not clear how much money Mr. Haniya was carrying, though the Israeli news media put it at $35 million and said it had been packed in suitcases.

Several Hamas officials have ferried huge sums of cash into Gaza since the group came to power early this year, saying the money was desperately needed to pay government salaries after the cutoff of Western assistance.

The chaotic scenes along the border encapsulated the multiple crises facing the Palestinians: the continuing conflict with Israel, the Palestinians' internecine battles and their worsening financial plight.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas government who was traveling with Mr. Haniya, said in a telephone interview that he and other Hamas officials had the money in El Arish, Egypt, about 30 miles from the border. He declined to give the amount.

Other Palestinian officials said the money would be handed over to the Arab League in Cairo until a way could be found to get it to the Palestinian areas.

The Palestinians did not say where Mr. Haniya had obtained the money, though speculation focused on Iran. Mr. Haniya spent more than two weeks traveling in the Middle East, including a stop in Iran, which pledged $250 million to the Palestinian government.

The Palestinians have not placed any restrictions on the amount of cash that can be brought through Rafah as long as the money is declared at the border.

However, a senior Israeli security official said Israel acted because "we have reason to believe the money will be used to strengthen Hamas and will be used for terror." The official did not provide additional details or say how Israel knew that Mr. Haniya was trying to bring money into Gaza.

With internal Palestinian tensions escalating in the Gaza Strip, Mr. Haniya cut short his extended tour of the Middle East. He flew from Sudan to Egypt, and began heading overland Thursday afternoon toward the Gaza border. But before he arrived, Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz, ordered the crossing closed.

Israel has no troops in Gaza, but it does have forces in southern Israel, just a few miles away from the Rafah crossing, and they could move into Gaza quickly if its order was defied.

Egypt closed its side of the border, and the Palestinian side shut down when the clashes erupted between the Hamas gunmen and the Palestinian security forces, who are loyal to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, from the rival Fatah movement.

Israel and Western countries cut the flow of money to the Palestinian government after Hamas came to power in March. The Hamas government has been able to pay salaries only partly and sporadically.

The Palestinian Authority needs more than $150 million a month for salaries and other basic expenses, and Hamas officials have sought to bring in at least a portion of that amount on their trips abroad.

When the Palestinians took control of the Rafah border crossing in November 2005, it allowed Palestinians in Gaza to travel to Egypt and on to the wider world without having to go through Israeli security.

Thursday's episode demonstrated Israel's ability to shut down the border even when its security forces are not present.

Elsewhere in Gaza, Palestinian internal tensions were still running high. The Palestinian security forces arrested a suspect in the killing of three young sons of a Palestinian security official who were gunned down on Monday as they were being driven to school.

The suspect, Hisham Mkhaimar, belongs to the Popular Resistance Committees, and his arrest ignited a gun battle between the security forces and members of his faction. Shortly afterward, the Popular Resistance Committees kidnapped a member of the security forces and said he would not be released until Mr. Mkhaimar was freed.

In the West Bank, Israeli troops shot dead two Palestinian militants in one confrontation, and killed another Palestinian man in clashes with stone throwers, the military and Palestinian witnesses said.

In Israel, the High Court of Justice addressed one of the most contentious issues in the past six years of violence between Israel and the Palestinians. It ruled that Israel's targeted killings of Palestinian militants were legitimate in some circumstances.

But the court said Israel's military must exhaust other options first, like trying to arrest suspects, and must take into account the possibility of harming innocent civilians.

Palestinian Premier Barred At Border (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 14 -- Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh was stranded for much of Thursday in the Egyptian Sinai after Israel barred him from entering the Gaza Strip with millions of dollars in cash, a standoff that prompted armed demonstrations by his Hamas movement and gunfire as his convoy crossed the border hours later without the money.

Haniyeh attempted to enter Gaza through the Rafah crossing just after noon following a 16-day trip to Iran, Syria and other states that do not have relations with Israel. Some of those governments have pledged money to Hamas, whose administration has been effectively bankrupted by the international aid boycott that followed its victory in January legislative elections.

The United States also has threatened sanctions against any country or group that uses bank transfers to send money to Hamas, a radical Islamic movement that does not recognize the Jewish state's right to exist. In recent months, Hamas officials have resorted to carrying cash into Gaza in suitcases, a financing method that has embarrassed Israeli officials who hope the boycott weakens the movement and brings a change in the Palestinian government.

The rules governing the operation of the border terminal at Rafah allow travelers to bring an unlimited amount of money through the crossing as long as it is declared to the European Union monitoring mission stationed there.

Israeli security officials said that Haniyeh was carrying "a few tens of millions of dollars" and that it was "very likely to be used for terrorist activities." They did not offer evidence to support the assertion. After cutting short what was planned to be a month-long trip, Haniyeh was returning to Gaza to address rising partisan violence in the territory.

But as Haniyeh arrived at the Egyptian side of the crossing, Israeli Defense Ministry officials contacted the E.U. delegation and ordered it closed. The order came from Defense Minister Amir Peretz.

A few hours later, several dozen gunmen from Hamas's military wing, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, opened fire at the crossing in an attempt to force it open. They also clashed with members of the presidential guard loyal to the rival Fatah movement.

Israeli security officials informed Haniyeh that he could enter Gaza without the money, something the prime minister agreed to do as night fell. The Egyptian intelligence chief, Omar Suleiman, then arranged for Haniyeh to leave the money in the port city of El Arish with two Hamas officials, who will escort it to Arab League headquarters in Cairo.

By the time the deal was made, the E.U. monitors had abandoned the crossing because of gunfire. But Haniyeh's convoy was allowed to pass into Gaza just before 11 p.m. amid gunshots in the area of the crossing terminal that killed his bodyguard and lightly wounded his son and a political adviser.

After decades of managing the passage and patrolling the border, Israel effectively turned over the Rafah crossing to Palestinian and Egyptian responsibility following the withdrawal of Israeli settlers and troops from Gaza last year.

The crossing is Gaza's main gateway to the outside world, although Israeli officials fear it also serves as the entry point for foreign intelligence agents arriving to train Hamas's armed wing.

Earlier in the day, Israeli forces killed a 26-year-old member of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades near the West Bank city of Nablus. In a separate incident, Israeli soldiers fatally shot a 27-year-old Palestinian throwing rocks at forces near the Israeli settlement of Ariel.

The Israeli military said at least one Palestinian rocket fired from Gaza landed in southern Israel on Thursday evening, causing no injuries.

Palestinian PM Found With $35m In Cash (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, December 15, 2006

Israel on Thursday prevented Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian prime minister, from returning to Gaza in order to stop him bringing in cash possibly donated by Iran.

Reports said Mr Haniyeh, from the Hamas movement, was carrying $35m (€26.5m, £17.8m) in cash, believed to be part of the $350m he raised during a regional tour that took in Iran, Syria and Qatar. He was later allowed entry, but without the cash.

However, anger spilt over into violence following the order to close the Rafah terminal on the Gaza-Egypt border, given by Amir Peretz, Israeli defence minister.

The closure prompted about 2,000 Hamas supporters to storm the terminal where they had a gun battle with guards. Others used explosives to blow a gap in the concrete wall dividing Gaza and Egypt.

Mushir al-Masri, a Hamas legislator, said the closure "could lead the region to an explosion and the Zionist enemy and its allies will bear the responsibility for the consequences".

The European Union monitoring team at Rafah said its 16 staff were evacuated and safe.

Hamas members have carried about $80m in cash into Gaza since March, when the west imposed an aid boycott aimed at bringing down the Islamic movement but which has increased poverty across the occupied territories.

The clashes at Rafah came as Hamas supporters threatened to defy any call for new elections that Fatah's Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, may make in a speech tomorrow.

Months of negotiations between Fatah and Hamas for a national unity government have foundered, along with hopes for an easing of the western boycott. But Hamas and independent analysts say Mr Abbas has no legal authority to call early elections.

Mr Haniyeh cut short his trip abroad to deal with the internal turmoil. Hamas to-day plans to celebrate the 19th anniversary of its foundation with marches and demonstrations in Gaza.

There were clashes in Gaza and the West Bank this week after Fatah blamed Hamas for the shooting dead on Monday of three young boys who were the sons of an intelligence official loyal to Mr Abbas.

Hamas In Control Of Gaza Border Crossing (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, December 15, 2006

Hamas gunmen seized control of the Gaza Strip's border crossing with Egypt on Thursday in a ferocious gunbattle with Fatah-allied border guards after Israel blocked the Hamas prime minister from crossing with tens of millions of dollars in aid.

More than two dozen people were wounded in the fighting, deepening factional violence that has pushed the rivals closer to civil war. One of the injured was an adult son of Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh.

Haniyeh cut short a trip abroad and was trying to return to Gaza in a bid to quell the infighting between Hamas and Fatah. He finally was allowed to cross into Gaza late Thursday, but it was unclear whether he brought money for the cash-strapped Palestinian government.

After he crossed, there was a new burst of gunfire and Haniyeh's convoy was forced to speed away. Officials said Haniyeh was unharmed but his son was shot and slightly injured in the clashes.

Earlier Thursday, pro-Fatah Palestinian officers arrested a Hamas-linked militant in the killing of the three young sons of a Fatah security chief. The militant's allies retaliated by kidnapping a security officer.

Thursday's gunbattle at the border erupted after Hamas militants, angry that Israel was preventing Haniyeh from returning, stormed the Rafah terminal.

The pro-Fatah Presidential Guard, responsible for securing the area, opened fire, setting off a gunfight. Terrified travelers ran for cover, some carrying their luggage. Crying women and children hid behind walls and taxis, while the European monitors who police the crossing fled. Two Hamas militants were among those wounded.

The Hamas militants, chanting "God is Great, let's liberate this place" took over the arrival hall, and border guards escorted the European monitors to safety. Two loud explosions rocked the area, and security officials said militants had blown a hole in the border fence about a half mile from the terminal.

The rampage destroyed furniture and computer equipment inside the terminal and plunged the area into darkness. Hospital officials said at least 27 people were wounded, two seriously.

With the terminal closed, Haniyeh was stranded on the Egyptian side of the border for several hours. Late Thursday, the Presidential Guard regained control of the terminal and the European monitors moved back in.

Thursday's unrest was likely to strain the U.S.-brokered deal that turned over control of the crossing to the Palestinians last year after four decades of Israeli control. The border can only operate in the presence of European monitors.

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz, working with the EU monitors, had ordered the border closed to prevent Haniyeh from bringing in tens of millions of dollars he raised during a tour of Muslim countries, security officials said.

A senior Israeli security official said they were not trying to block Haniyeh's entry, only to keep out the money. The official said Israel had information the money would be used to strengthen Hamas or fund terror attacks, but he declined to provide further details. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the matter with the press.

A Palestinian official said Haniyeh was carrying $35 million he raised during his trip, which included stops in Syria and Iran.

Haniyeh left Gaza on Nov. 28 for what was supposed to be a monthlong trip to the Muslim world, with the goal of raising money for his government.

The Palestinian Authority has been crippled by international economic sanctions that have left it unable to pay full salaries to its 165,000 workers. Israel and Western donor nations cut off hundreds of millions of dollars for the government after Hamas won legislative elections early this year, demanding the militant group renounce violence and recognize Israel.

Hamas officials have brought in more than $50 million to Gaza this year — far short of the government's needs.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, has been trying to persuade Hamas to join his more moderate party in a coalition government in hopes of lifting the sanctions. But talks between the sides broke down late last month.

Tensions heightened after Abbas threatened to call new elections, drawing charges from Hamas that he is plotting a coup. Abbas is scheduled to deliver a speech outlining his plan on Saturday.

The latest violence broke out Monday when gunmen riddled the car of a Fatah security officer, killing his three sons. Fatah accused Hamas of carrying out the shooting — a charge Hamas denied. The officer, apparently the target of the attack, was not in the car.

On Wednesday, gunmen in the southern Gaza Strip ambushed a Hamas commander and killed him in an execution-style slaying outside a courthouse. Hamas accused Fatah of being behind the killing.

Israel's High Court OKs Targeted Attacks (CHIT)

By Joel Greenberg

Chicago Tribune, December 15, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Sanctioning one of the most controversial tactics used by Israel in its conflict with the Palestinians, the Israeli Supreme Court on Thursday upheld the army's policy of targeted killing of militants but said the legality of each attack had to be determined case-by-case.

The court declined to issue a blanket ban on the practice, frequently used by the Israelis during six years of fighting with the Palestinians. Some human-rights groups have called the tactic execution without trial and a violation of international law.

Targeted killings are often carried out from the air, with unmanned drones or helicopters firing missiles at cars in Palestinian cities, often wounding or killing bystanders along with the intended targets. According to figures compiled by Israeli human-rights group B'tselem, 339 Palestinians were killed in targeted attacks over the past six years, 129 of them bystanders.

"It cannot be determined in advance that every targeted killing is prohibited according to customary international law, just as it cannot be determined in advance that every targeted killing is permissible under customary international law," the court said in a unanimous ruling by a three-judge panel. "There is thus no escaping examination of each and every case."

Two human-rights groups, The Public Committee Against Torture in Israel and the Palestinian Society for the Protection of Human Rights and the Environment, petitioned the court in 2002 to ban the targeted killing policy, but a decision was repeatedly delayed.

The Israeli army has defended the tactic as an effective means of preventing militant attacks in cases in which the arrest of those involved is not possible, as is often the case in the Gaza Strip, from which the Israeli army withdrew last year.

The army says that the tactic is permissible in the context of an armed conflict and that civilian casualties are caused because militants operate in civilian areas.

In the most widely criticized Israeli strike, in July 2002, the air force dropped a 1-ton bomb on a house, killing Salah Shehadeh, the commander of the armed wing of Hamas, along with his bodyguard and 12 civilians, eight of them children.

The attack brought calls by some rights groups for criminal charges against the officers involved, including the current army chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, who was the air force chief at the time.

In 2004 Israel killed the wheelchair-bound founder and leader of Hamas, Sheik Ahmad Yassin, in an air strike that also killed five bystanders. A later attack killed Yassin's successor, Abdel Aziz Rantisi.

The court ruling, written by retired Chief Justice Aharon Barak, who was completing a backlog of decisions left from his tenure, listed several limits on the use of targeted killing.

"Well-based, strong and convincing information ... which has been most thoroughly verified is needed" regarding the identity and activities of the targeted person and he should not be attacked if less harmful means, such as arrest, can be used.

"Every effort must be made to minimize harm to innocent civilians," and such harm "must be proportional" to the military advantage gained by the attack. For example, shooting at a sniper firing from a house is permitted even if an innocent passerby might be harmed, but not bombing the house from the air and hitting scores of residents and bystanders, the ruling said.

Targeted killings should be investigated after they are carried out to determine the circumstances of the attack and whether the target was accurately identified, and compensation should be paid if innocent civilians were harmed, the ruling said.

"The fight against terror is subject to the rule of law," the court said. "We must balance security needs and human rights ... The ends do not justify the means."

Michael Sfard, an attorney for the petitioners, criticized the ruling, saying it "sanctions at least parts of the liquidation policy."

"It's pretty clear to me that the army interprets the ruling as a license to kill, this time a license to kill from the court," Sfard added.

Israeli Arab lawmakers said the ruling authorizes war crimes. "You can't give an officer or the army the title of both judge and executioner and give him the tools for execution in the field," said Ahmad Tibi, one of the legislators.

A Hamas spokesman in Gaza, Ismail Radwan, said the ruling "gives judicial cover for terrorist practices by the government."

But Shai Nitzan, the Israeli deputy state attorney, said the ruling sanctions a legal form of combat.

DOJ_NMG_0106964

"We are talking about a state of war, and in war you can attack the terrorists with any legal method, and targeted killing, as we argued, is a legal method," Nitzan said.

Israeli High Court Backs Military On Its Policy Of 'Targeted Killings' (WP)

By Scott Wilson

JERUSALEM, Dec. 14 -- Israel's high court upheld Thursday the military's right to assassinate members of groups the state defines as terrorist organizations, but cautioned that such operations should always be weighed first against the potential harm to civilian bystanders and the human rights of the target.

The unanimous decision departs little from guidelines the military says it already follows in carrying out "targeted killings," the terminology used by the government and by the court in its ruling. But it does say commanders should allow an independent investigation to follow each assassination and recommends that the military compensate "innocent civilians" harmed in the operation.

Under current practice, Israel's military works with Shin Bet, the domestic security service, to compile lists of Palestinians who are influential or active figures in armed groups. Using eavesdropping equipment, aerial surveillance and informants, air force pilots or drone operators receive detailed information about a target's movements, most commonly in the Gaza Strip, where the army no longer operates regularly on the ground.

Military officers say the decision to strike is made -- sometimes in a matter of minutes -- by balancing the threat posed by the target against the potential for injuring bystanders. Many of the strikes have killed civilians in addition to targeted individuals.

Israeli military officials said they would review the court's findings in coming days. But one senior officer who specializes in matters of international law said the ruling, although vague in places, appeared to be a "validation" of existing policies regarding assassinations, and he expected few new restrictions to be implemented.

The decision states that military commanders must have "strong and convincing" information before ordering an assassination, and should not do so "if a less harmful means can be employed," namely, arrest. The ruling also says that "every effort must be made to minimize harm to innocent civilians."

"The need to balance casts a heavy load on those whose job it is to provide security," the three-judge panel wrote. "Not every efficient means is also legal. The ends do not justify the means."

The ruling has been awaited outside Israel for what it might add to the debate underway in many countries, including the United States, over how to ensure basic human rights in what the Bush administration calls the "war on terrorism." Following Israel's lead, the U.S. military and intelligence agencies have also used drones to carry out assassinations, including a November 2002 strike on a car in Yemen that killed six suspected members of al-Qaeda.

The decision, one of the last to be issued by retiring Chief Justice Aharon Barak, represented a disappointing defeat for Israeli and Palestinian human rights organizations that have called the tactic, pioneered during the most recent Palestinian uprising, a war crime.

Hawkish lawmakers and officials from Israel's security establishment expressed pleasant surprise at the ruling, given that Barak, an activist judge throughout his decades-long career, has often come down against the military in cases where human rights and security measures appear to conflict. The court said the state "must balance security needs and human rights."

The ruling stemmed from a petition filed by two human rights organizations -- one Israeli, one Palestinian -- challenging the state's right to assassinate members of Hamas, the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades and other armed groups fighting the Jewish state. In its decision, the court said the "starting point of the legal analysis is that between Israel and the terrorist organizations active in the Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip" -- referring to the territory Israel occupied in the 1967 Middle East war -- "there exists a continuous situation of armed conflict."

The ruling states that international law applies to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, saying "it is not an internal state conflict that is subject to the rules of law enforcement."

The practice of targeted assassination began officially in November 2000, when an Israeli helicopter fired missiles at a car carrying Hussein Abayat, a senior member of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, near the city of Bethlehem. The strike killed Abayat and two bystanders.

Israeli security officials have argued that targeted killings are among their most effective tools against the armed groups, which have carried out scores of suicide attacks against Israeli civilians, fight from civilian areas and employ other guerrilla tactics that pose challenges to Israel's conventional army.

But many of the assassinations have been conducted by Israeli attack helicopters, drones or fighter aircraft, and civilian casualties are common. B'Tselem, an Israeli human rights group, reports that in operations over the past six years Israeli security forces have assassinated 210 intended targets but also killed 129 bystanders.

"Anyone who thinks that in this kind of warfare things cannot go wrong and mistakes cannot happen does not know in what world he is living," Maj. Gen. Giora Eiland, the former head of Israel's National Security Council, told Israel's Army Radio. "Compare the terrorist attacks that were taking place only four years ago with those taking place today. In the last analysis, we are now living in an incomparably better situation now than what we lived in then. How do you think that came about? It is partly due to targeted killings."

Barak, who once ruled that Israeli officials could not use torture during interrogations even to stop imminent suicide bombings, rejected in Thursday's decision the concept of "unlawful combatants" employed by the Bush administration to justify detaining suspects without charges.

Instead, the court decided that "members of the terrorist organizations are not combatants," but civilians who relinquish certain legal protections when they participate directly in "hostilities" intended to "harm the army or civilians."

By way of offering guidelines to military commanders responsible for ordering assassinations, the decision says that "shooting at a terrorist sniper shooting at soldiers or civilians from his porch is permitted, even if an innocent passerby is harmed. Such harm conforms to the principle of proportionality.

"However, that is not the case if the building is bombed from the air and scores of its residents and passersby are harmed," it continues. "Between these two extremes are the hard cases. Thus a meticulous examination of every case is required."

In reviewing specific cases, the ruling said, "the Court will ask itself if a reasonable military commander could have made the decision which was made." Human rights lawyers criticized that advice, along with several other aspects of the decision, as overly vague.

"Here the court has done something that will create a cloud of illegality over many missions, because the officer will not know what is allowed and what is prohibited," said Michael Sfard, the attorney for the petitioners in the case. "When you go to court, at least you expect to get a clear ruling."

Sfard also represents petitioners in the case of Salah Shehada, a Hamas military commander killed in July 2002 when an Israeli F-16 dropped a one-ton bomb on his house in Gaza, killing him and 14 others, including nine children. Sfard said he will seek a new hearing "on the basis of this ruling, which obliges the court to order a criminal investigation."

In Lebanon, Hizbullah's Rise Provokes Shiite Dissent (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, December 15, 2006

BEIRUT, LEBANON

Hizbullah's ability to draw hundreds of thousands of Shiites to central Beirut to rally against the Lebanese government is the most visible evidence that the militants are now the undisputed representative of the country's Shiite community.

Yet some of the party's coreligionists have started to publicly question Hizbullah's political monopoly. They worry that its ambitious gambit to topple the Western-backed government is intended to benefit backers in Iran and Syria and will be detrimental to the long-term interests of Shiites.

"Hizbullah's actions definitely are not in the interests of Shiites nor of Lebanon," says Sheikh Ali al-Amine, the Shiite mufti of the Jabal Amel district of south Lebanon.

Shiite voices of dissent are few, but are gaining more attention at a time when Lebanon is serving as a battleground in the emerging struggle between Iran and its regional allies - dubbed by some as a "Shiite crescent" - and the Sunni-dominated Arab world led by Saudi Arabia and Egypt.

Hizbullah is caught in the vortex of this regional contest, torn between satisfying the demands of its foreign patrons while serving the needs of its domestic Shiite constituency.

Demonstrations calling for the resignation of Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora have been ongoing since Dec. 1. Since then, the numbers of Hizbullah and opposition supporters filling downtown Beirut seem to ebb and flow at the call of Hizbullah chief Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah.

Thursday, in a bid to ease the political crisis, the Lebanese government and opposition groups agreed on a national unity cabinet in which major decisions could be taken only by consensus, said Arab League chief Amr Moussa. He told reporters, however, that more talks were required to conclude the deal.

Mr. Moussa called on all the parties to defuse the tension and expressed hope that the remaining issues could be resolved in the next two weeks. "Progress is clear and consensus is rising. Please be patient a bit longer," he said. "We hope to finish in the next two weeks or at the end of the month." The anti-Hizbullah voices

Sheikh Amine has become Hizbullah's most visible critic after sparking controversy four months ago by publicly refuting Hizbullah's claim of a "divine victory" in its summer war against Israel. Still, he appears an unlikely critic of Hizbullah.

Wearing a black turban that marks him as a descendent of the prophet Muhammad, he was once close to Hizbullah and in 1981 taught the youthful Hassan Nasrallah at a Shiite seminary in the Iranian city of Qom. The sheikh remembers the future Hizbullah leader as "clever and a quick learner."

"I never wanted to turn myself into a figure of opposition to Hizbullah. But during the war I saw mistakes," he says. "The aim of Hizbullah is to capture all the Shiite sect and push it into the unknown."

During the war, Mona Fayyad, a professor at the Lebanese University in Beirut, penned an acerbic opinion piece titled "To be a Shiite now," railing against the sect's subservience to Hizbullah.

"To be a Shiite is to keep silent and not to ask what is the purpose of liberating a country. Is it to destroy it all over again and to make it possible for it to be occupied once more?" she wrote.

A year ago, Mohammed Mattar, a Shiite lawyer, filed a lawsuit against a prominent Hizbullah cleric who had issued a fatwa, or religious edict, forbidding any Shiite from accepting a ministerial post after the pro-Hizbullah ministers walked out of the government.

"The edict crossed the red line between democracy and a parliamentary system run by the clergy," Mr. Mattar says, describing the fatwa as the "politics of intimidation."

The lawsuit, which was signed by five Shiites and three Christians, was, he says, "bold, but ultimately you have to defend the principles of the republic. If you want to live in a society ruled by clerics, go to Iran."

Those that have spoken out against Hizbullah say they have been subjected to subtle intimidation. Amine had to cancel his e-mail address after receiving anonymous hate mail, while others have been told they are not welcome at social events.

Lokman Slim, a vocal Hizbullah critic who heads Hayya Bina, a political reform group, says his name was included on two "lists of dishonor" circulated on the Web during the war.

"The Hayya Bina website was shut down during the war due to kindly advice, slash, threats," he says with a wry smile.

Hizbullah's dominance of Shiite politics in Lebanon has its roots in the Lebanese state's historical neglect of the Shiite community. Traditionally marginalized by Lebanon's Christian and Sunni elite and ruled by a handful of feudal clans, the Shiites were mainly confined to the impoverished rural south and east.

Hizbullah was established with Iranian support in the wake of Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon and soon began to challenge the already existing Amal Movement for dominance of Shiite politics.

Both groups secured loyalty through offering services to their constituents. Nabih Berri, the leader of Amal and Lebanon's parliamentary speaker, adopted a typically Lebanese system of patronage, using his influence within the state to provide his supporters with employment in government institutions. From shadow militia to Shiite institution

Hizbullah, which initially operated outside the state, used Iranian funds to build a shadow social welfare network for poor Shiites that included schools and hospitals. The battlefield successes of Hizbullah's military wing against Israeli occupation forces further sustained its popularity and earned it a regional standing.

Today, Hizbullah is a formidable multifaceted organization, arguably the second-largest employer after the Lebanese state, with some 35,000 Shiite families directly or indirectly dependent on the party.

Last year, it formed a strategic alliance with rival Amal, effectively absorbing the movement into its own apparatus. That leaves Hizbullah as the only real representative of Shiites, making it all but impossible for an alternative Shiite political entity to emerge.

"According to opinion polls, Hizbullah commands the support of over 90 percent of the community and it's very difficult for any new group to compete against that," says Amal Saad-Ghorayeb of the Carnegie Endowment's Middle East Center in Beirut.

Hizbullah's Shiite opponents argue that the party's popularity is lower than the polls suggest. But they agree that the state's historical disregard for Shiites is to blame as it created a social and political vacuum that was subsequently filled by Hizbullah. Although they say there is a need for a political alternative, swaying Shiite public opinion away from Hizbullah is a near hopeless task.

"We are unable to compete against Hizbullah as secular republican Shiites," says Mr. Slim. "They have God on their side, and it's impossible to compete."

Lebanese Government Still Standing (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

With the pro-Hezbollah movement and its Syrian backers at an impasse, the U.S. should leave well enough alone.

TWO WEEKS AGO, nobody was giving odds that Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government would survive the year. Popular street demonstrations had brought together the major Shiite parties with a weird pro-Syrian coalition led by the Maronite Christian former general Michel Aoun (once a mortal enemy of Syria, confusingly enough). Siniora dismissed the protests as a coup d'etat engineered by Hezbollah and its Syrian backers, but without Shiite representation, his own government looked illegitimate and Hezbollah strongman Hassan Nasrallah's demand for a "national unity" government seemed almost reasonable.

Today, Siniora doesn't look much stronger, but his government is still in business, and the protesters have little to show for their efforts. Sunni Arab governments have supported the prime minister, and the pro-Hezbollah movement is, for the time being, in a stalemate. It is Hezbollah's pro-Syrian faction that remains locked out of the government (which the two major Shiite parties quit in November) and facing a crisis of momentum.

What lessons can we draw from this impasse? First, the current demonstrations are different from the protests last year, which were driven by public rage over the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, a crime in which Syria and its Lebanese clients were probably involved.

It's also clear that for all of Hezbollah's attempts to claim the banner of Lebanon's forgotten Shiites, there is more at stake here than an attempt to give voice to the disenfranchised. It was Hezbollah, along with the more moderate Shiite party Amal, that decided to quit the government last month after a cabinet-stacking power play failed. Nabih Berri, the Amal leader who has been a player in Lebanese politics almost since the time of King Solomon, has participated in governments far dicier than this one, and there is nothing stopping Lebanon's large Shiite minority from being represented in even greater strength than it was before Hezbollah's walkout.

While Siniora's opponents attempt to dismiss him as a U.S. puppet, he leads a broad coalition of Sunnis, Christians, Druze and other groups. Nevertheless, there is an issue here for the United States. In 1990, Lebanon was a chip awarded to Syria in return for its participation in the Persian Gulf War coalition. Now that a bipartisan consensus is beginning to form around the idea that negotiations with Syria are necessary, it's imperative that the U.S. not again make the mistake of sacrificing a shaky but functional democracy for token gestures at assistance in Iraq.

U.S. Standing Sinks In Mideast (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

Attitudes about the United States have deteriorated sharply in the Middle East in the past two years, a survey of five countries in the region shows.

U.S. policy, such as support for Israel, has long been criticized in the Middle East, but a majority of those polled now hold negative views of the American people as well.

"What these numbers say to me is that people are dramatically affected by our policies," said James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute, for whom the survey was conducted. "Our people and our products are at risk in the region."

The survey was conducted in Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Morocco, Jordan and Lebanon. Without exception, a strong majority expressed unfavorable opinions of the United States. The lowest level was in Jordan, where only 5 percent said they had a favorable view of the United States in general. In 2002, Jordanian favorability of the U.S. was the second highest in the region, at 34 percent.

Survey respondents tend to distinguish between U.S. policy and the American people, but that distinction appears to have eroded in the past four years. Mr. Zogby said he first noticed a distinct shift in 2004. In the 2006 survey, only a plurality of Lebanese polled expressed a favorable view of the American people, with 44 percent approving and 18 percent expressing unfavorable views.

The American people are viewed least favorably in Saudi Arabia, where 18 percent said they had a favorable opinion and 34 percent expressed an unfavorable opinion. At the same time, 50 percent of Saudis say they like American products, compared with 24 percent who do not.

"Our policy [In Iraq] drags everything," Mr. Zogby said. "The negatives have become very pronounced."

Middle Eastern poll respondents cited the Iraq war and perceived U.S. support for Israel over the Palestinians as their biggest concerns. "One is the immediate wound while the other is the defining wound," Mr. Zogby said.

The Iraq Study Group, which recently submitted a list of 79 policy recommendations to President Bush, says the Israeli-Arab conflict is tied directly to the escalating violence in Iraq. The group has recommended that the White House emphasize a broader Middle East peace process as part of its effort to improve the situation in Iraq.

"You can accomplish good things in Iraq but you need regional support," Mr. Zogby said. "They would be wise to look at what the commission has proposed."

The one aspect of U.S. society to receive a net positive rating from all five Middle Eastern countries was the American education system.

North Korea Emphasizes Nuclear Pride (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0106968

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea -- North Korean propaganda is putting a renewed focus on pride in the country's new nuclear capability, a sign that suggests disarmament talks next week will make little progress, Pyongyang watchers say.

Immediately after North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear-bomb test, the country's state-controlled news media claimed its weapons were a great benefit for the country, says Brian Myers, a specialist in North Korean propaganda based in Seoul. And last month, signs appeared on the streets of Pyongyang with slogans such as "Revel in the pride of being a country in the Nuclear Club."

State propaganda is one of the few windows into North Korea's nominally communist dictatorship, which controls the flow of information and people into and out of the country. The first job held by dictator Kim Jong Il was in the propaganda department.

Mr. Myers says the current campaign is a sign that nuclear capability has become a tool for the government to galvanize support at a time when the country is suffering food shortages and economic decay.

Little Headway Is Expected

Only a handful of researchers study the propaganda. One reason is the difficulty of the Korean language. Another is that few people are willing to bet that the country, which has appeared to be on the brink of collapse for more than a decade, will sustain a career's work. Mr. Myers is one of only two non-Koreans who regularly visit Seoul's North Korean cultural center.

The other non-Korean regular at the cultural center, Andrei Lankov, a Russian scholar of Korean history, agrees that next week's talks will make little headway. "I can't see North Korea willing to give up nuclear weapons," he says. "And I don't think the United States or the others will offer what it will take for them to consider it."

A month after the nuclear test, North Korea agreed to return to the six-nation disarmament talks it has boycotted since November 2005. Since the early 1990s, the U.S. and others have offered money, food and other assistance to the impoverished country in an effort to persuade it not to build atomic weapons, fearing Pyongyang would either use the weapons or sell them to terrorists.

Mr. Myers, the 43-year-old son of a U.S. Army chaplain, lived around the world while growing up. He became interested in propaganda when he spent a year as a high-school student in apartheid-era South Africa. He then lived in Germany in the years before its reunification. He later made North Korean propaganda the topic of his doctoral thesis and now teaches Korean literature and North Korean culture at Dongseo University in Busan, South Korea's second-largest city.

North Korean news media for 60 years have dished out a steady diet of criticism of Americans, Japanese and South Koreans. Newspapers still run stories playing up American-inflicted damage during the 1950-53 Korean War, when the communist-backed North and the U.S.-backed South fought for control of the Korean Peninsula. They describe South Korea as a hostage to the U.S., which stations about 25,000 military personnel here. Novels portray American and Japanese armies as too scared to invade because of Mr. Kim's cunning strategies. Posters call for the destruction of U.S. nuclear weapons, and magazines depict Americans as clowns or animals.

Several months ago, Mr. Myers says, posters appeared in the streets of Pyongyang depicting a nuclear bomb and urging people to "Prepare to Die" or "Dare to Die." That meant the government had added a nuclear element to the message of constant war -- there has still been no formal end to the Korean War halted by a 1953 truce between North and South -- that the regime uses to help maintain totalitarian control. "They're trying to let people know they have nothing to fear, that the United States will regularly confront North Korea and try to bully it, but that because of Kim Jong Il, America will never succeed," Mr. Myers says.

'Completely New Angle'

Following the October nuclear test, North Korean newspapers claimed South Koreans were just as happy about the test as North Koreans and that the nuclear program was enabling South Korean business to flourish. The logic appeared to be that the U.S. military was intimidated by the North's nuclear program and that without this, the U.S. might have started a damaging confrontation.

Mr. Myers believes the Kim regime is trying to cope with North Koreans' finding out, chiefly through smuggled videos, that South Korea is much wealthier. So his government is responding by saying the South is wealthy because the North has put economic priority on the military. "This is a completely new angle," he says. "In the North Korea of old, they would have not seen any reason to present South Korean capitalists as being happy with the nuclear program. It shows that Marxist-Leninism is being leached out of the ideology and that all you have left is nationalism."

Mr. Myers is sometimes consulted by U.S. diplomats and military officials for his observations on North Korea. "You really have to admire these State Department people who do these negotiations and go through these grueling talks for days and weeks," Mr. Myers said. "They haven't given up on them. I never have expected anything from the talks with the North Koreans."

North Korean Talks To Resume Monday (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

BEIJING _ North Korea is digging in its heels before crucial nuclear talks rev up Monday, raising questions over whether it wants to buy time or is ready to negotiate in earnest.

In recent days Pyongyang's main government-controlled newspaper has dismissed any suggestion that the lure of a massive aid package might pry the North from its nuclear weapons program.

If North Korea listens to the "sweet talk" of the West and accepts massive aid to give up its nuclear weapons, "it will lead to our destruction," said an editorial in the Rodong Shinmun earlier this month. The editorial went on to assert that Europe and the United States hoodwinked Libya a few years ago with a similar deal and stiffed the former Communist bloc nations of Eastern Europe in pledges that led them to capitalism.

Blustery talk from Pyongyang may be designed to bolster a negotiating position for the talks, which come 10 weeks after the North conducted its first nuclear test.

Amid reports of pending U.S. incentives to stir North Korea to action at the talks, a senior Bush administration official said North Korean envoys led him to believe in late November that Pyongyang may be ready to take specific steps toward dismantling its nuclear program.

"There were indications that the DPRK (Democratic People's Republic of Korea), the North Koreans, would be prepared to deal in specifics at the coming round," Christopher Hill, an assistant secretary of state who is the chief U.S. envoy on North Korea, said in a briefing in Washington.

Hill said Washington wants "concrete progress," not just talk, at the negotiations.

China tried to dampen expectations Thursday, and one veteran North Korea watcher voiced skepticism whether the sixth round of negotiations _ and the first after a 13-month stalemate _ would lead to any breakthrough.

"The six-party talks are likely to remain a meaningless exercise," said Andrei Lankov, a Russian-born expert on North Korea at Seoul's Kookmin University, referring to the talks hosted by China that include the two Koreas, Russia, Japan and the United States. "The North Korean side is not willing to consider any serious concessions."

With a successful nuclear test under their belt, Lankov said, North Korean officials "are not in the mood to compromise. . . . From their point of view, giving up the nuclear weapons is unnecessary and unthinkable."

North Korea is believed to be the world's ninth nuclear power.

Hill arrives in Beijing Sunday, after a possible stop in Tokyo, and said he would meet immediately in informal talks with Russian, Chinese and North Korean envoys.

The six-party negotiations, which China began hosting in 2003, formally begin Monday and are open-ended in length and flexible in format.

A flurry of media reports around the region offered conflicting signs about the positions of Washington and Pyongyang in the run-up to the talks. In Seoul, the quasi-official Yonhap news agency, citing diplomatic sources, said the Bush administration has offered Pyongyang a written security guarantee in exchange for concrete actions to end its nuclear program.

A South Korean newspaper, the Hankook Ilbo, reported that North Korea has told the United States that it's willing to shut down the key Yongbyon nuclear complex and accept inspections by U.N. nuclear monitors if conditions are met, mainly the lifting of U.S. sanctions imposed on the North over its alleged counterfeiting of U.S. currency.

One critical question remains unclear: Is North Korea willing to consider giving up its nuclear weapons in exchange for abundant aid, diplomatic recognition and security guarantees?

Hill said he didn't know if Pyongyang had yet made that strategic decision.

"I wish I could answer that question," Hill said. "At this point, I cannot tell whether that choice has been made or not."

The Bush administration says it believes North Korea has enough nuclear material for anywhere from eight to 10 bombs. As time passes, the number may be growing.

The former president of South Korea's military academy, Jang Joon-ik, told Yonhap this week he believes Pyongyang will have 55 kilograms (121 pounds) of weapons-grade plutonium by the end of the year, and that continued reprocessing of spent fuel rods would give it enough fissile material to produce 50 nuclear bombs by 2010.

N. Korea Coming Back To The Table (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0106970

BEIJING — After a 13-month boycott, a nuclear test and much posturing, North Korea returns Monday to six-nation talks that have yielded few results and resume with few expectations.

An important focus for early jostling will be timing and deadlines, analysts said. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has called on the North to dismantle its nuclear weapons program within two years in exchange for aid, energy assistance and improved relations.

North Korea has an interest in avoiding a quick resolution. The longer it keeps the program intact, the more likely the world is to accept its status as a member of the nuclear club, as Pakistan and India discovered. Extending talks beyond the 2008 U.S. elections also could bring it a new negotiating partner, in the form of a new administration, that it might find easier to deal with.

As always, each participant in the talks will be looking over its shoulder. Though the U.S. and the other parties — China, South Korea, Japan and Russia — favor quick results, they don't want to push North Korea so hard that it walks away.

The last time North Korea left in a huff, the standoff led to its Oct. 9 test of what experts believe was a relatively small nuclear device — probably less than 1 kiloton, or about 7% of the explosive capability of the 1945 Hiroshima bomb. Another breakdown in negotiations could lead to a second test.

The regime in Pyongyang, North Korea's capital, has an interest in producing a more powerful and technologically sophisticated explosion. Such a test would not only bolster the country's deterrence against attack but would also raise its weapons program's value as a bargaining chip, offering hope that other countries will pay it more to disband the program.

A key short-term reason North Korea is returning to the table could be the carrots and sticks China quietly offered its neighbor, calling into question how motivated Pyongyang is to achieve real progress.

The longer North Korea keeps the other nations talking, the less likely they are to impose cargo inspections on it or strictly implement economic sanctions involving luxury goods and conventional, ballistic, chemical and nuclear weapons under United Nations Resolution 1718, a measure passed unanimously by the Security Council on Oct. 14.

In recent weeks there has been some narrowing of the wide gap between the U.S. and North Korea in at least two areas: financial sanctions and direct talks.

Pyongyang has been incensed by the sanctions the U.S. imposed in 2005 involving at least $24 million in North Korean assets at a Macao bank. The action was taken in response to Pyongyang's reported money laundering, weapons proliferation and counterfeiting activities, and Washington has insisted this issue be handled outside the six-party framework.

In recent weeks, however, the Bush administration has said that $12 million of the funds might not be related to illegal activity, and officials have indicated a greater willingness to bring the issue into the talks.

After long maintaining that the administration would not hold direct talks with Pyongyang, chief U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill met with his North Korean counterpart Nov. 28. The three-way meetings also involved China, but Beijing officials left the two alone for substantial periods.

"So in effect, the United States was talking directly with North Korea," said Shi Yuanhua, deputy director of the Center for Korean Studies at Fudan University in Shanghai. "The Americans have made their greatest compromise so far."

But huge differences remain as Washington insists on a complete dismantling of the nuclear weapons program before anything else, even as North Korea insists on compensation before it dismantles a program it has been working on and using as leverage since 1990.

"It would certainly be good if we could solve this within two years," said Yan Xuetong, a professor at Beijing's Qinghua University. "But looking at cases in South Africa, Ukraine, Libya, it can take decades to solve a nuclear crisis. This one has only lasted 16 years."

Analysts say that if this round of talks both prevents the North from testing again and stops other nations from tightening sanctions on the regime — in effect a stand-down on both sides — that in itself will be a small achievement.

"Everyone wants good results," said Zhang Liangui, a Korea expert at the Central Party School in Beijing. "Without deadlines and an agreement on holding regular talks, however, that's just a nice wish."

NKorea May Stage Second Nuclear Test During Six-party Talks: Minister (AFP)

AFP, December 15, 2006

North Korea may stage a second nuclear weapons test to strengthen its hand during upcoming negotiations on scrapping its nuclear programme, South Korea's new defence minister has warned.

Kim Jang-Soo, a former army chief of staff, ordered the 650,000-strong military to step up combat-readiness to deter possible aggression from the North, the defence ministry said.

"We have to be thoroughly prepared to counter the possibility of a second or third nuclear test by North Korea and a possible hostile act by it in the process of negotiations over its nuclear weapons programme," Kim said in a message to troops.

The six-nation nuclear talks are set to resume in Beijing on Monday, 13 months after the North walked out. They involve the two Koreas, the United States, China, Japan and Russia.

The North staged its first nuclear test on October 9, sparking international condemnation and United Nations sanctions.

Later that month North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il told China that he had no plans for a second test but that increased international pressure could trigger "further measures".

Defence minister Kim issued his letter after a closed-door meeting of 130 senior commanders, including General Kim Kwan-Jin, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the army, navy and air force chiefs of staff.

The defence minister also urged no further delay in the planned relocation of US bases to Pyeongtaek south of Seoul.

The defence ministry said this week that South Korea would not be able to complete a major relocation of US military bases by 2008 as scheduled, due to protests by residents and a dispute over cost-sharing.

The US forces want to consolidate 35 US bases scattered across the nation into two hub bases by 2008, including one at Pyeongtaek.

Some 29,500 troops are stationed in the country, a legacy of the Korean War. The number is set to drop to 25,000 by 2008.

$1M Fund Intended To Assist Activists (AP)

AP, December 15, 2006

The State Department announced a $1 million emergency fund Thursday to help cover such expenses as legal fees and medical bills for human rights activists.

The fund is meant to pay short-term bills for people who take great risks by defending human rights "in countries where tyranny persists," the department said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also redefined U.S. goals and expectations for international treatment of independent groups that promote democracy and human rights.

People should be able to freely join such groups, which the State Department calls non-governmental organizations or NGOs, and the groups should be free to act within international law, the department said.

"Whenever NGOs and other human rights defenders are under siege, freedom and democracy are undermined. The world's democracies must push back," Rice said in commemorating national human rights week. "We must defend the defenders."

The department issued a 10-point statement of principles on NGOs.

In a slap at Russia, one principle says governments seeking to regulate the groups should aim to protect, not impede, their work. Russia was not mentioned in literature the department handed out Thursday nor in Rice's brief remarks, but the United States has been concerned about a law passed this year that requires groups such as Amnesty International to register with the government.

Another such group, the non-governmental National Endowment for Democracy, said Wednesday that Russia had "steadily retreated from democratic reform" under President Vladimir Putin.

Bush Creates Activists' Funding (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

The Bush administration will create a $1 million fund to support democracy and human rights advocates around the world who are being harassed and persecuted by their governments, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday.

Miss Rice also announced that, beginning next year, she will bestow a Freedom Defenders Award on a foreign activist or nongovernmental organization and a Diplomacy for Freedom Award on a U.S. ambassador for "working to end tyranny and promote democracy."

"The fund will begin at $1 million and will be replenished each year as needed," the secretary said. "This fund, to be administered by the State Department, will enable us to quickly disburse small grants to human rights defenders facing extraordinary needs due to government repression. This funding, for example, could go to cover legal or medical costs or short-term support to meet the pressing needs of an activist's family."

The initiative, announced at a State Department ceremony to mark Human Rights Week, is the administration's response to a global trend of government crackdown on NGOs, said U.S. officials. They cited Russia and other former Soviet republics in Central Asia as examples of some of the most drastic measures.

A Russian law limiting the activities of NGOs and their ability to receive support from abroad sparked criticism from Washington and concern about their work with American and other Western organizations in the vast country.

The governments in Moscow and Central Asia "mischaracterized the recent color revolutions" in Georgia, Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan, said a senior officer at a U.S. organization that promotes democracy around the world.

"Those governments wrongly concluded that the color revolutions were somehow fomented by the United States and by NGOs," said the officer, who asked not to be named for fear of retribution. "What actually took place was that pro-democracy organizations were supporting a credible democratic process, not a particular election outcome."

Barry F. Lowenkron, assistant secretary of state for democracy, human rights and labor, said that, in addition to Russia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan and others, countries in Asia, Latin America, Africa and the Middle East have "pushed back against NGOs."

Even though the situation in Indonesia, Malaysia, China and Vietnam is not as grim as that in Iran, Burma or Venezuela, "a clear statement in support of NGOs is needed," Mr. Lowenkron told reporters. He said the $1 million will come out of the $60 million budget of his bureau, pointing out that it is only "one vehicle" the administration will use to promote the rights of NGOs.

He also said that, if a foreign government does not allow U.S. funding to reach its recipients, the issue will become part of the relationship with that country.

American groups active overseas welcomed Miss Rice's announcement yesterday.

"The amount of money is not as important as the political message this is sending," said Kenneth D. Wollack, president of the National Democratic Institute. "Any initiative that gives concrete expression to our commitment to human rights, democracy and the rule of law is something to be welcomed and should draw strong bipartisan support."

Pentagon Calls For New African Command (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, December 15, 2006

The Pentagon is recommending a new U.S. military command for Africa, which is seen as having greater strategic importance to America since the start of the fight against terrorism.

The Defense Department has sent the proposal to President Bush for his approval, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Thursday.

The U.S. military has a system under which each region of the world is overseen by a specific command. Africa is split among several commands, which have been increasing activities on the continent greatly in recent years.

Central Command, which controls the Horn of Africa, set up a task force there in attempt to catch any al-Qaida escaping from Afghanistan after the war started in late 2001. It has since has expanded to humanitarian and other missions.

The European Command has sent Special Forces to do training exercises in North Africa and worked on humanitarian projects, medical training and other missions such as harbor maintenance in oil-producing nations in the Gulf of Guinea.

The various types of operations are aimed at building partnerships and strengthening the ability of African governments and militaries — as well as winning hearts and minds.

The hope is that the efforts will make African nations less vulnerable to the recruiting efforts of terrorists and help drive out those already using Africa as a safe haven.

Officials say Africa also is strategically more important because of increased efforts by China to involve itself and gain influence on the continent.

Egypt Arrests Opposition Leaders After A Protest (NYT)

By Mona El-Naggar

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

CAIRO, Dec. 14 — Egypt on Thursday arrested several leading members of the Muslim Brotherhood, the banned but powerful opposition group, and more than 140 student members after a campus protest. The government said the group had formed what amounted to militant squads that planned "acts of unrest."

The arrests followed a demonstration at Al Azhar University in which dozens of students, some in militant-type clothing with black face masks, paraded through the university campus while performing what looked liked martial exercises.

In a statement, Interior Ministry officials charged that the brotherhood had created what it called "deterrence committees," which were "trained in the arts of combat and provided with knives, sticks and chains, and appointed to start holding strikes and demonstrations and acts of unrest in the university."

The Muslim Brotherhood, the largest and most organized opposition force in Egypt, has a violent history and was banned after trying to assassinate Gamal Abdel Nasser when he was the prime minister. But the brotherhood disavowed violence in the 1970s and has instead tried to spread its influence through politics and by creating an extensive network of social services.

It has been tolerated, even while many of its leaders and members are often jailed, as part of a cold peace between the brotherhood and the government.

Candidates allied with the brotherhood did well in the parliamentary elections last year, weakening the governing party's power monopoly.

But the sight of brotherhood members parading in costumes that resembled the militant attire of the Palestinian group Hamas apparently crossed a red line. The students immediately apologized, and brotherhood leaders said it was a mistake, but the arrests were ordered anyway, and included the detention of one of the group's top officials.

"What happened was peculiar and wrong, and the students apologized, and the apology should have been accepted," said Essam el-Erian, a leading member of the group.

The Azhar students were protesting because they had been barred from offering their own slate in student government elections.

UK Drops BAE-Saudi Bribery Probe (FT)

By Christopher Adams And James Boxell

Financial Times, December 15, 2006

Britain was accused on Thursday night of caving in to intense pressure from Saudi Arabia after Tony Blair's government intervened to end a Serious Fraud Office inquiry into bribery allegations against BAE Systems.

The SFO's decision to abandon its investigation into the Al Yamamah oil-for-arms contracts came under fierce attack from opposition peers and leading international lawyers.

The decision was announced by Lord Goldsmith, the attorney-general, on a day when the UK government appeared determined to rush out all its controversial news under the cover of the publication of a long-awaited police investigation into the death of Diana, Princess of Wales.

Mr Blair also chose Thursday as the best day to make himself available to police seeking to question him over allegations that honours were sold in return for political donations. The event made him the first sitting prime minister to be questioned in a criminal inquiry.

The abandonment of the BAE inquiry is expected to save a multibillion-pound jet fighter contract with Riyadh and safeguard thousands of jobs. BAE in recent weeks had run a media and lobbying campaign warning that Saudi Arabia would scrap the deal and purchase French Rafale jets instead unless the inquiry was dropped.

For more than two years, the SFO had been investigating allegations of slush funds and other unethical practices surrounding the 20-year-old Al Yamamah oil-for-arms agreement with Riyadh, the UK's biggest export deal.

The proposed deal to purchase 72 Eurofighters would supercede the Al Yamamah contracts and could eventually be worth as much as £40bn (€60bn) to BAE. A similar sum has been made from Al Yamamah, in which BAE supplied Tornado fighter jets, among other military equipment.

But the SFO's decision to seek bank account information from Switzerland in relation to its Al Yamamah probe sparked anger in Riyadh, leading to a suspension of commercial talks over a purchase of the Eurofighters.

BAE, which has always denied any wrongdoing, welcomed the attorney-general's statement. Officials were unaware of whether the Eurofighter talks had recommenced, though the decision to abandon the probe is certain to remove any obstacles to the deal, Britain's biggest export agreement. The Ministry of Defence refused to comment.

The decision to halt the investigation followed a warning by the prime minister that the SFO's inquiry risked causing "serious damage" to British security, intelligence and diplomatic co-operation with the Saudis.

Mr Blair, backed by Margaret Beckett, the foreign secretary, and Des Browne, defence secretary, argued that continuing the inquiry could leave Britain exposed in the war against terrorism by threatening the flow of Middle East intelligence. His intervention followed months of public and behind-the-scenes pressure by Saudi Arabia and BAE to end the inquiry.

Lord Goldsmith said the SFO had taken the decision on public interest grounds and in part because of "the need to safeguard national and international security". Uncertainty over how long the inquiry would take, and whether a prosecution could be brought, was also a factor.

He said: "It has been necessary to balance the need to maintain the rule of law against the wider public interest. No weight has been given to commercial interests or to the national economic interest."

Insiders said Mr Blair's influence had been crucial.

"Everybody wanted it [the inquiry] to go away," said one source. However, suggestions that Mr Blair spoke with the Saudi ruler King Abdullah about the issue were denied by Downing Street.

White House Hosts Malaria Summit (AFP)

US President George W. Bush designated eight African countries as new beneficiaries of US aid to battle malaria, which kills one million people annually around the world.

Bush added Benin, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Liberia, Madagascar, Mali and Zambia to his five-year, 1.2-billion-dollar President's Malaria Initiative (PMI) for Africa, bringing to 15 the number of countries covered.

"For malaria, we know exactly what it takes to prevent and treat the disease. The only question is whether we have the will to act," said the US president, who unveiled the program last year.

Bush, speaking to US and African activists, civic leaders and government officials at a White House summit on the killer mosquito-borne disease, also proposed doubling US development aid to Africa by the end of the decade.

"This administration has doubled development aid to Africa during my presidency -- and I propose to double it again by the end of this decade," he said.

Also at the summit, First Lady Laura Bush unveiled a 30-million-dollar plan to help African communities battle malaria by funding non-governmental organizations and civic and religious groups battling the disease.

"It will encourage more charitable organizations to join the fight" and will complement work by African governments by "creating independent, sustainable malaria-control programs" in villages across the continent, she said.

Malaria kills more than a million people a year, 90 percent of them in Africa, according to the World Health Organization (WHO). It is the leading cause of death for children under five in Africa.

The summit also aimed to raise awareness in the United States about the disease and galvanize public-private cooperation to fight its spread.

"One American with just 10 dollars can help save a life in Africa. A school, a church or a team can help save a village. Together, Americans can help protect an entire continent," the White House said in a statement.

The participants included African and UN officials, non-governmental organizations and stars, including South African singer Yvonne Chaka Chaka, a UNICEF goodwill ambassador for malaria.

PMI aid in Angola, Tanzania and Uganda has already reached six million people, said retired admiral Timothy Ziemer, who leads the initiative. The assistance includes spraying against mosquitoes, drug treatment and handing out bed nets to protect humans from the insects.

Four other countries -- Malawi, Mozambique, Rwanda and Senegal -- have been picked to receive the assistance.

John Bridgeland, who heads the non-profit campaign Malaria No More, said his group would use the summit to rally private support for the cause.

"It's literally our base camp, where this is a first step in ... a three-month undertaking to help galvanize and organize the private sector," said Bridgeland, a former Bush aide.

Other summit participants included US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, WHO chief Margaret Chan and Melinda Gates, the co-chair of the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation.

The Gates Foundation of Microsoft founder Bill Gates and his wife, Melinda, pledged 83.5 million dollars Monday in new grants to boost access to bed nets and treatment, as well as speed research on vaccines.

Bush Celebrates Early Victories In Campaign Against Malaria (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 — Malaria, a deadly tropical disease long overshadowed by AIDS, shared the stage with the president and the first lady on Thursday when the Bushes were the hosts of a forum at the National Geographic Society to raise the profile of this neglected scourge.

The gathering highlighted the growing efforts of influential evangelical, business and charitable leaders to raise money and mobilize volunteers against malaria, which kills 800,000 African children each year. Their rallying cry: Donate $10 for a mosquito net, save a life.

It also gave President Bush, whose reputation for compassionate conservatism has taken a beating during the grueling war in Iraq, a moment to bask in some of the early victories in the five-year, $1.2 billion campaign against the disease that his administration undertook a year and a half ago.

For example, on one of the spice islands of Zanzibar, where the United States helped distribute mosquito nets to cover every slumbering pregnant woman and child younger than 5 years old, the number of malaria cases has plummeted almost 90 percent since last year.

"So we're acting and we're leading," Mr. Bush said. "And with partners across the world we are helping the people of Africa turn the tide against malaria."

Melinda Gates, who with her husband, Bill, has invested heavily in research for a malaria vaccine, told the Who's Who of global malaria warriors packed into the auditorium that a decade ago, their number would have fit in a broom closet.

The top leaders of all the main malaria-fighting organizations — from the World Health Organization to the World Bank, from the United States Agency for International Development to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria, from the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation to Unicef — were at the forum, which the Bush administration titled the White House Summit on Malaria. They met for hours after the public session to plot strategy.

A Gallup poll that was done free for Malaria No More in recent days found that while 96 percent of Americans counted AIDS as a very serious problem in Africa, only two-thirds knew that malaria was also a grave threat.

Malaria No More, a nonprofit group of business and charitable groups that organized in response to a challenge from Mr. Bush, talked up its Web site, www.malarianomore.org, as a place where people can donate $10 to provide a family with a mosquito net to prevent malaria, and the education to use it properly.

The big money, however, has come from big donors. The Global Fund has so far committed $2.6 billion to malaria. The Gates Foundation has promised to spend $766 million. The World Bank has approved $357 million in loans.

The president's Malaria Initiative is supposed to gradually ramp up spending. But money for this year's programs in Uganda, Tanzania, Angola, Mozambique, Rwanda, Senegal and Malawi — $135 million — is still uncertain. Whether it survives depends on collaboration between the administration and Democratic leaders in Congress.

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, a Vermont Democrat expected to lead the Senate appropriations subcommittee that oversees foreign aid, was at the forum and said he wanted to find a way to finance the administration's malaria program. "We're trying to get the kind of money we spend in a day in Iraq," he said. "Somewhere we've got to have our priorities right. It's a moral issue."

Bush Says Ending Malaria 'Possible' (WT)

By Tom Carter

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

Malaria, a disease that kills two African children every minute, can be eliminated if governments, private business and religious organizations have the will to make it happen, President Bush said yesterday.

"It is possible to eliminate malaria," Mr. Bush said at the White House Summit on Malaria. "We know exactly what it will take to prevent and treat the disease ... It is not going to require a miracle. It requires smart, sustained effort."

Some of the world's leading global health specialists gathered at the National Geographic Society to announce a new initiative called Malaria No More.

The program will focus on the mosquito-borne disease in a massive publicity campaign to encourage every American to "save a life" by contributing $10 for a bed net treated with insecticide to prevent mosquitoes from biting at night.

In June 2005, Mr. Bush created a five-year $1.2 billion program to fight malaria in Africa, called the President's Malaria Initiative. On the island of Zanzibar in Tanzania, where PMI is getting bed nets to people, spraying insecticides in houses and getting medicine to those who are infected, malaria has dropped by 90 percent since last year.

"Your taxpayer money is working to save lives," said Mr. Bush, announcing the PMI campaign will expand to eight more African countries next year.

The program already is operating in Uganda, Tanzania, Angola, Malawi, Mozambique, Rwanda and Senegal. The countries to be added are Benin, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Liberia, Madagascar, Mali and Zambia.

Related private initiatives were announced yesterday by Paul Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank; Richard Feachem, executive director of the Global Fund to Fight Aids, Tuberculosis and Malaria; Melinda Gates, co-chair of the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation; Dr. Steven Phillips, medical director of Exxon Mobil Corp.; Ann Veneman, head of UNICEF; Rick Warren, pastor of the Saddleback Church; and the U.S. heads of the United Way, Boys and Girls Club and the Red Cross.

Laura Bush, who has made preventing and treating malaria a focus of her efforts as first lady, organized and convened the conference.

"Any individual who can raise $10, can buy a net and save a life," Mrs. Bush said.

It was not clear why the Malaria No More nets would cost $10; Mr. Feachem of the Global Fund said in his presentation that nets cost between $5 and $6. It was suggested that the extra money may be used for education.

Roger Bate, head of Africa Fighting Malaria, which has been working on malaria for a decade, said he was gratified that powerful people with money are finally paying attention, but that getting bed nets into African homes is only a first step.

"Research done last summer by [the U.S. Agency for International Development] in Togo and Zambia found that the bed nets had been distributed to 90 percent of the homes but only hung up in 70 percent," he said.

"And only 56 percent were being used on the night they were surveyed. They have to be used, even on hot nights. If that [extra $4] is used for education on this, that would be good."

U.S., China Clash On Currency (WP)

By Ariana Eunjung Cha

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 14 -- U.S. and Chinese leaders clashed publicly on the opening day of strategic economic talks, with Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. pushing China to revalue its currency and Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi saying Americans do not have a full understanding of the situation.

After standing by as U.S. officials criticized her country's economic policies in the media during the past week, Wu set the tone for the meeting with assertive introductory remarks that spanned 20 typed pages and 5,000 years of Chinese history.

"Some American friends are not only having limited knowledge of, but harboring much misunderstanding about, the reality in China," Wu said, according to a copy of her remarks provided by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. For example, Wu noted that China needed to create enough jobs to absorb an estimated 300 million rural workers -- equal to the entire population of the United States -- into its urban economy in the next two decades.

Paulson was equally aggressive in his follow-up speech, saying that the U.S. government's "strong view" is that China should allow its currency, the yuan, to be more flexible. Most countries allow the value of their currencies to be set in global markets, but China intervenes to keep its currency pegged to the dollar at an exchange rate that many Western economists regard as skewed in China's favor.

The Chinese economy "would be more effective under a regime where currency values are determined in a competitive, open marketplace based upon economic fundamentals," Paulson said. A revaluation of the yuan upward would make U.S. goods cheaper in China and Chinese goods more expensive in the United States.

Throughout the day, U.S. officials pushed on issues such as trying to resolve the huge trade imbalance between the two countries and making sure that China lives up to commitments it made five years ago when it joined the World Trade Organization. By the afternoon, they said they were optimistic.

"They were very much in a receiving mode," Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao said in an interview with reporters. "They were listening very carefully."

Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said that the meeting "exceeded expectations" and that "it was a very candid . . . honest, solid dialogue."

High-level U.S. officials, interviewed after the close of meetings for the day, said the two sides agreed on many things in principle, such as the need to keep their economies open to other countries. But specific measures and a timetable were less clear, with the United States pushing for rapid change and China seeking to move cautiously.

Skepticism toward foreign trade, particularly with China, played a major role in the recent U.S. elections, and proposals for punitive tariffs or other protectionist measures could gain support in Congress next year.

"I sense that they have an understanding of the stakes," Gutierrez said. "And the stakes are very large. You are talking about a lot of business, a lot of jobs on both sides. We are their No. 1 customer."

While most of the day was focused on U.S. requests of Beijing, China also listed some priorities: fewer obstacles to the export of U.S. technology and to Chinese investment in the United States. The complaint about U.S. export controls, in particular, led to some tense exchanges, U.S. delegates said,

"They would like no restrictions, and we have restrictions, so there are certain things that they would like that we can't give on," Guttierez said.

U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab said in an interview that she told the Chinese that their country was "slowing if not backsliding" on economic reforms.

Paulson is a former Wall Street executive who has made dozens of trips to China. He has taken command of the Bush administration's economic discussions with that country and took a high-level delegation of Cabinet members and others with him on this trip as he seeks to make progress toward resolving thorny disputes.

The format of the meeting included formal presentations and broad debate on issues such as China's transport problems and the U.S. culture of easy credit.

Perhaps the meeting's most anticipated and sensitive talks -- about whether China should allow the yuan to rise in value -- were anchored by a statement from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, who accompanied Paulson on the trip.

Bernanke said an increase in the currency's value would benefit China, according to U.S. officials present at the talk.

"Other people piped in to say the U.S. has a very interested stake in China's economic well-being," Chao said.

China Entreats U.S. To Broaden Its Understanding (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips And Andrew Batson

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

BEIJING -- From the first moment of this week's top-level economic talks here between the U.S. and China, the hosts made clear what they believe to be the root of bilateral tensions: Americans simply don't understand China.

In the Great Hall of the People, under a painting of Chairman Mao Zedong and other revolutionary heroes, Chinese Vice Premier Wu Yi gave Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and his delegation a history lesson about her country's struggles with poverty and foreign interference. American misconceptions about the Asian country aren't "conducive" to good relations, she said as she opened two days of talks yesterday, according to the written text of the speech.

"Throughout all these years' interactions with all quarters of the U.S., the government and the public, we have had the genuine feeling that some American friends are not only having limited knowledge -- but [also] harboring much misunderstanding -- about the reality in China," said Ms. Wu, who is considered an advocate of economic change.

Ms. Wu reiterated longstanding Chinese complaints that foreign critics fail to grasp the extent of her country's huge economic and social challenges, from profound poverty to the waves of rural residents pouring into cities. She and other Chinese officials also have said foreigners misread Beijing's efforts to address those problems through economic development as a threat to its trading partners. Chinese officials argue they have done more to address foreign complaints than critics acknowledge, but that ultimately China must move at its own pace to avoid triggering social unrest.

The American delegation came to Beijing hoping to create a mood of mutual trust that would spur progress on a host of contentious issues, from piracy of U.S. computer software to market access for U.S. financial-service companies to China's alleged practice of keeping its currency weak against the dollar. The Americans here sense that U.S. lawmakers, worried by the huge U.S. trade deficit and the loss of manufacturing jobs, are ready to blame China and are flirting with protectionist legislation.

"It is in everyone's interest that China's growth continues and in doing so that it strengthens the world economy," Mr. Paulson told the Chinese in the closed-door session, according to a copy of the speech. "This dialogue can help us work together to do just that while reducing tensions along the way."

Mr. Paulson has described this round of talks as the beginning of two years of strategic dialogue aimed at creating a climate in which thorny trade, financial, energy and other issues can eventually be resolved. He has gone to great lengths to reduce expectations that this week's meetings would produce instant changes in Chinese policies.

Nonetheless, the participants couldn't avoid the issues of the day. Tensions over the currency issue are particularly sharp, with American manufacturers charging that the weak yuan gives Chinese companies an unfair edge over their American competitors.

Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke told the Chinese that their economy would benefit if they were to allow the yuan to rise against the dollar, according to Labor Secretary Elaine Chao, who participated in the talks. And Mr. Paulson said that eventually China should allow the yuan to move unfettered against other currencies. "We believe that China should move toward such a system over the next several years," Mr. Paulson said. "And of course you understand our strong view that in the meantime, more currency flexibility is necessary."

Ms. Wu repeated earlier statements that China seeks a "rough balance" between imports and exports, rather than its current large trade surplus, and that Beijing intends to move toward a system that would let markets set the yuan's value. The yuan has gained almost 5.9% against the dollar since the Chinese initially allowed it to move against the dollar in July 2005.

The size of the gathering had a slightly stifling effect on what Mr. Paulson hoped would be a free-flowing conversation about the long-term economic issues that both countries face. In the cavernous Golden Hall, 14 senior Chinese officials, backed by 72 aides, faced off with 13 senior U.S. representatives, including seven of cabinet rank, with 48 aides of their own. Participants who wanted to speak had to place their name cards on end as a signal; their names were then entered into a queue posted on a giant video screen. A senior U.S. official nevertheless described discussions as "honest and frank."

Ms. Wu opened the event with a presentation that included a map of China's ancient trade routes, accompanying a speech that ran from the Silk Road and the Opium War to farm policy and taxation. She characterized the main purpose of the talks as educating U.S. officials.

"Our particular hope is to let people in the world know that China's development is an opportunity instead of a threat," she said, emphasizing that China is committed to trade and economic liberalization.

That language was intended to reassure her audience. U.S. officials have publicly worried that China may slow down the pace of overhaul now that it has largely completed the market-opening commitments it made upon joining the World Trade Organization in 2001.

according to one person present, and several U.S. officials urged the Chinese to accelerate overhauls. "We've got to move as quickly as possible, and whatever we're doing today, we've got to do it quicker," Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez told reporters.

Ms. Wu emphasized the challenge of promoting equitable growth in a country where 150 million people -- more than 10% of the population -- live on less than a dollar a day and where 300 million people are expected to migrate from the fields to the cities over the next 20 years.

U.S. officials took the Chinese lecture in stride. "The reason we are having this dialogue is to improve the understanding between our two countries," one senior U.S. official said.

New U.N. Leader Is Sworn In And Promises To Rebuild Trust (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 14 — Ban Ki-moon of South Korea was sworn in Thursday as the next secretary general of the United Nations, and he pledged to rebuild faith in an organization that has been tarnished by scandal and riven by disputes between rich and poor nations.

"You could say that I am a man on a mission, and my mission could be dubbed 'Operation Restore Trust:' trust in the organization, and trust between member states and the Secretariat," he said.

He added, "I hope this mission is not 'Mission: Impossible.' "

Mr. Ban, 62, takes office on Jan. 1, succeeding Kofi Annan, 68, who is at the end of his second five-year term.

Addressing the packed General Assembly hall after taking the oath, Mr. Ban heaped praise on Mr. Annan, who received two standing ovations, as a man of "high ideals, noble aspirations and bold initiatives."

But in a subsequent news conference, he distanced himself from Mr. Annan's plea Monday that the United States return to a more multilateral foreign policy grounded in respect for international law.

"That, I think, was his own personal assessment and insight, which he gained during his tenure," he said.

Mr. Ban, who had strong United States backing, acknowledged that the relationship between the United Nations and the United States had become strained.

"But even in such a case," he said, "it is very important to discuss, to resolve the difference of opinions, and I, as secretary general, will try to harmonize so that we can expect constructive contribution and participation of the United States."

Mr. Ban was emphatic in answering questions about the campaign in Iran to cast doubt on the Holocaust and about statements by Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, that Israel should be wiped off the map.

He said denying the Holocaust was "not acceptable," as was urging the elimination of a nation or people."

He also pledged to become "directly and personally engaged" in trying to persuade Sudan to accept United Nations peacekeepers for Darfur.

Calling the Middle East "the most serious issue" today he urged Israeli and Palestinian leaders to deal directly with each other.

He stumbled only once, appearing uncomprehending when a Canadian reporter asked a question in French. Traditionally, French speakers have held the job, and Mr. Ban had underscored the point by giving part of his address in French.

"I was not able to follow everything you said," he told the questioner, and asked for a translation.

The question was, "I would like to know why, in your view, it is important that French should remain the second official working language of the United Nations."

Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary-general (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, December 15, 2006

South Korea's Ban Ki-moon was sworn in Thursday as the eighth secretary-general of the United Nations, promising to make his top priority the restoration of trust in the world body that has been tarnished by corruption scandals.

Ban, 62, will take the reins of the United Nations on Jan. 1 when Kofi Annan steps down after 10 years at the helm. He will be the first Asian to lead the organization in 35 years

Ban will oversee an organization with some 92,000 peacekeepers around the world and a $5 billion annual budget. Its reputation has been battered by scandals in the oil-for-food program in Iraq and in peacekeeping procurement, and its outdated practices need reform to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

General Assembly President Sheikha Haya Rashed Al Khalifa administered the oath of office to the career diplomat who served as South Korea's foreign minister. Ban swore to conduct himself solely in the interests of the United Nations and to refuse to accept instructions from any government or other authority.

In a brief address, Ban told delegates from the 192 U.N. member states that he was "deeply mindful" of key words in the oath — "loyalty, discretion and conscience" — which he said "will be my watchwords as I carry out my duties as secretary-general."

He pledged "to set the highest ethical standard" and "work to enhance morale, professionalism and accountability among staff members, which in turn will help us serve member states better, and restore trust in the organization."

"The good name of the United Nations is one of its most valuable assets — but also one of its most vulnerable," Ban said.

He promised to strengthen the three pillars of the United Nations — security development and human rights — in order to build "a more peaceful, more prosperous and more just world for succeeding generations."

"As we pursue our collective endeavor to reach that goal, my first priority will be to restore trust," Ban said. "I will seek to act as a harmonizer and bridge-builder."

He said one of his "core tasks will be to breathe new life and inject renewed confidence into the sometimes weary Secretariat."

"The member states need a Secretariat that is dynamic and courageous, and not a Secretariat that is passive and timid," he said.

Ban also paid warm tribute to Annan, saying "it is an honor to follow in your revered footsteps."

"Your tenure has been marked by high ideals, noble aspirations, and bold initiatives," he said. "Your courage and vision have inspired the world. ... You have given the United Nations new relevance to the people's lives."

Before the ceremony, diplomats also paid tribute to Annan and approved a resolution lauding his "many bold initiatives" to reduce poverty, promote peace and security, protect the environment and launch the reform process. They rose and gave him a sustained standing ovation.

In his farewell speech, Annan said that "despite many difficulties and some setbacks, in the past decade we have achieved much that I am proud of."

At a time of sweeping change, he said, the U.N. reoriented and remolded itself, "became more transparent, accountable and responsive ... (and) began to better address the needs of individuals worldwide."

The United Nations and its member also accepted that development, security and human rights "must go hand in hand," he said.

"I depart convinced that today's U.N. does more than ever before, and does it better than ever before. Yet our work is far from complete — indeed, it never will be," Annan said.

He told the General Assembly, which appointed Ban in October, that "you have chosen well."

"Our organization will be in safe hands," Annan said.

Then, looking at Ban, he said the new secretary-general already had a distinguished career in international diplomacy.

"But I can safely tell you that your most rewarding years lie just ahead," Annan said. "I wish you both the strength and the courage to make the most of them."

Ban Ki-moon Sworn In As Next UN Chief (AFP)

By Gerard Aziakou

AFP, December 15, 2006

South Korea's Ban Ki-moon was sworn in as the next UN secretary general at a General Assembly ceremony during which he vowed to be "a harmonizer and bridge-builder" and build on the legacy of the incumbent, Kofi Annan.

"I, Ban Ki-moon, solemnly swear to exercise in all loyalty, discretion and conscience the functions entrusted to me as secretary general of the United Nations," said Ban as he took the oath, his left hand resting on the UN charter.

The 62-year-old South Korean is to officially take up his post on January 1, 2007.

"I add my voice to the many tributes that have been paid to you today," Ban told Annan, who is to step down on December 31 after completing two five-year terms.

Ban vowed to build on the legacy of the outgoing Ghanaian UN chief, adding that one of his priorities would be to "breathe new life and inject renewed confidence into the sometimes weary (UN) Secretariat."

"By strengthening the three pillars of our United Nations -- security, development and human rights -- we can build a more peaceful, more prosperous and more just world for succeeding," the South Korean former foreign minister said to loud applause from the packed assembly.

Mindful of the recent corruption and sexual abuse scandals that have tarnished the world body, Ban promised to "set the highest ethical standard" and to "lead by example".

"My first priority will be to restore trust," he added, in apparent reference to the polarization between rich and poor UN member states over UN reforms. "I will seek to act as a harmonizer and bridge-builder."

Addressing a news conference later in the day, the secretary general-designate described the tragedy in Sudan's Darfur region as "unacceptable" and pledged to be personally engaged in efforts to end the bloodshed there.

And he took Iran to task for hosting a conference casting doubt on the Holocaust.

"The denial of the Holocaust is not acceptable," he said. "Nor is it acceptable to call for the elimination of any state or people," he added in reference to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's remarks that Israel should be "wiped off" the map and "would soon disappear".

He also said the deteriorating Middle East situation would be one of his priorities, particularly the need to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

He also urged Iran to resume negotiations with European powers to settle the standoff with the Security Council over its nuclear program "in a peaceful way".

On a lighter note, Ban flunked a French language test when he was was unable to answer a reporter's question posed in French as to why French should remain the second working language of the world body, after English.

After he fumbled a "je n'ai pas pu (I was not able)", an aide came to his rescue and translated the question into English, to which Ban replied that the decision to give priority to French was made by UN member states for reasons of "convenience and practicality."

By tradition, the UN secretary general is required to have a working knowledge of French.

Ban has been working assiduously on his French since he launched his bid to succeed Annan early this year. France's UN Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere certified that Ban's French was adequate.

Meanwhile the US acting Ambassador to the UN, Alejandro Wolff, whose country played a key role in Ban's appointment, said the South Korean "commands our full respect."

"We have full confidence in his ability, his goodwill and his desire to serve and to achieve," the US delegate said. "We look forward to working with the new secretary general and other member states to achieve our shared goal of making the United Nations stronger and more effective and thus further honor Kofi Annan's vision."

Earlier Thursday, the 192-member General Assembly paid a warm tribute to Annan, hailing his "exceptional contribution to international peace and security".

The assembly gave Annan a standing ovation and adopted by acclamation a resolution "acknowledging with deep gratitude" his "indefatigable efforts and dedicated service" over the past 10 years.

Ban has been at UN headquarters in New York since November working on setting up a transition team ahead of his official assumption of duties.

His election by the General Assembly last October was a mere formality after the powerful 15-member Security Council recommended him.

Ban will become the UN's eighth secretary general and the first Asian UN chief since U Thant of Burma led the organization from 1961 to 1971. He will lead a staff of over 15,000, drawn from more than 170 nations.

Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, December 15, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — South Korea's former foreign minister, Ban Ki-moon, took the oath of office Thursday morning to become the United Nations' eighth secretary-general.

Ban, 62, pledged that after he officially takes up his post Jan. 1, he would try to restore trust in the institution tainted by scandal and management lapses and to bridge divisions between rich and poor nations.

"I look forward with a mixture of awe and enthusiasm to taking up my duties as secretary-general of the United Nations," he said after being sworn in.

Before Ban took his oath in the vaulted General Assembly hall, representatives from 192 countries gave a thundering ovation to outgoing Secretary-General Kofi Annan, 68, who will step down after 10 years in office.

Although Annan brought international spotlight to the issues of human rights and development, saying they deserve as much attention as matters of war and peace, his tenure also was blemished by findings of corruption and mismanagement in the $64-billion Iraq oil-for-food scandal.

Annan's grand vision of reforming the institution was scuttled by developing countries, which viewed the changes as a power grab by U.N. bureaucrats and by the United States, which proposed a more stringent plan.

While praising Annan's "high ideals, noble aspirations and bold initiatives," Ban hinted at a shift from his predecessor's approach.

"The time has come for a new day in relations between the secretariat and member states," he said. "The dark night of distrust and disrespect has lasted far too long."

He also said he would strive to "lead by example" to set high ethical standards at the world body, a statement also seen by diplomats as a subtle swipe at Annan and the scandals that have been exposed at U.N. agencies under his watch.

Ban, whose career as a South Korean diplomat kept him largely out of the spotlight, has said that his modest and unassuming demeanor should not be mistaken for weakness or indecision.

He told the press that he would not evade questions, as he was reputed to do as foreign minister.

"Your colleagues in Korea may have dubbed me the 'slippery eel' because I was too charming for them to be able to catch me," he said. "But I promise today that I can be a pretty straight shooter when I need to."

Addressing concerns that he would be more of an administrator than a leader, Ban said that he was willing to personally engage to find solutions to the standoffs involving Darfur, Iran and North Korea.

"The suffering of the people of Darfur is simply unacceptable," he told reporters. He said he would push leaders in Sudan to allow U.N. peacekeepers to protect the people of Darfur if the government could not halt the violence.

He also said he would meet with Iranian leaders "wherever and when" to discuss their denial of the Holocaust, an attitude he called "not acceptable." He told a news conference that among the many crises in the world, the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians was at the core of tensions in the Middle East and "the most serious issue with which we must deal." He said he planned to revitalize the "road map" peace initiative and to speak soon with leaders in the region.

But Ban left most of his concrete plans and policies vague, saying he would like to resolve issues in the Middle East, Lebanon, Iran and Iraq in each case "in a peaceful way through dialogue."

The new secretary-general also made it clear that despite all his calls for dialogue, he won't be doing it in French.

French is the second official working language of the United Nations, and Ban's resume says that he speaks it — an unstated requirement for his new post. French President Jacques Chirac interviewed Ban to make sure he could pass muster as a Francophone.

But when a Canadian reporter asked Ban in French why it should be one of the U.N.'s working languages, he didn't understand.

"If you speak 'lentement en francais' [slowly in French] I will do my best," he said.

In the end, he relied on an interpreter and answered the question in English, earning him a new nickname from the press corps: "Franco-phony."

Incoming U.N. Chief Ban Pledges To Restore Trust (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 14 -- South Korean diplomat Ban Ki Moon was sworn in Thursday as the United Nations' eighth secretary general in a ritualistic General Assembly ceremony as the United States and other countries praised Kofi Annan's 10-year stewardship of the world's premier political institution.

Ban, 62, said his priority when he takes office Jan. 1 is to restore public confidence and civility to a body that has been buffeted by corruption and sexual misconduct scandals, and has been riven by feuding over its future between its weakest and most powerful countries.

"You could say that I'm a man on a mission, and my mission could be dubbed Operation Restore Trust: trust in the organization and trust between member states and the secretariat," Ban said at a news conference after the ceremony. "I hope this mission is not mission impossible."

Ban's remarks constituted an implicit rebuke of Annan, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate whose legacy was tarnished by his mismanagement of the agency's $64 billion oil-for-food program in Iraq. But Annan, who sat expressionless through much of the ceremony, received a rousing standing ovation and eulogistic tributes from representatives of Asian, African, European and Latin American countries.

Even the United States, whose outgoing ambassador, John R. Bolton, rarely had anything nice to say about Annan, bid an effusive farewell to the Ghanaian civil servant.

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting U.S. ambassador, said Annan had been "a champion of human rights" and a defender of the poor and disadvantaged who "worked tirelessly" to serve "the millions of people who look to the U.N. to help them improve their lives."

"We salute today Secretary General Kofi Annan for his decade of dedicated service as the U.N.'s chief diplomat and administrator," he said, crediting Annan with backing some of Washington's most important foreign policy goals. He "has pushed the U.N. to do its part in the global struggle against extremism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, and terrorist threats."

But the focus of attention quickly shifted to Ban. He outlined his administrative and political priorities, saying he would move to resolve crises in North Korea; Darfur, Sudan; and the Middle East, including the "very hot and deteriorating situations in Lebanon and in Iraq, too."

He said he would select top officials primarily on the basis of merit, but would be mindful of the need to ensure geographical and gender balance in hiring. He said he will seek to identify a woman to serve as his deputy.

"One of my core tasks will be to breathe new life and inject renewed confidence into the sometimes weary [U.N.] secretariat," he said. "As secretary general, I will aim to reward the talent and skill of staff."

Ban said he will serve as a "bridge" between the rich and poor members, who have clashed over a range of issues, including revision of the U.N. bureaucracy and the promotion of human rights.

Ban sought to counter speculation that he is too discreet and cautious to confront the world's tyrants or stand up to the big powers. But he conceded that he can be evasive at times, recalling that the Korean news media had affectionately dubbed him the "Slippery Eel" because of how he can avoid answering sensitive questions.

"But that nickname was given because I was very friendly with the media. You should understand that. But I promise today that I can be a pretty straight shooter when I need to."

Ban sounded off on Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's calls for the destruction of Israel and his hosting of a Holocaust conference that included many speakers who questioned the Nazis' mass murder of more than 6 million Jews.

"Denying historical facts, especially on such an important subject as the Holocaust, is just not acceptable. Nor is it acceptable to call for the elimination of any state or people," Ban said. "I'd like to see this fundamental principle respected both in rhetoric and practice by all the members of the international community."

He urged the international community to support Iraq's political transition, citing the "inability" of Iraqi authorities and the U.S.-led multinational force to "secure peace and security."

Ban stumbled as he tried to cross a critical rite of passage at the United Nations: speaking publicly in French, one of the institution's two official languages. Asked in French why that language merited its designation when more people speak Arabic or Chinese, Ban paused before asking the reporter to repeat the question slowly, saying in French that "it is very difficult for me, off the cuff, to reply in French." After hearing the question a second time, he called for an interpreter.

S. Korea's Ban Sworn In As U.N. Secretary-general (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, December 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- Ban Ki-moonwas sworn in yesterday morning as the eighth secretary-general of the United Nations, promising to restore confidence in an organization that has been tainted by corruption and ethics violations.

The former foreign minister of South Korea took the oath of the office with his hand on a bound copy of the U.N. Charter, promising "not to seek or accept instructions ... from any government or other authority external to the organization."

He also pledged "to breathe new life and inject renewed confidence into the sometimes weary Secretariat."

Mr. Ban, 62, will become secretary-general on Jan. 1, 2007, succeeding Kofi Annan.

He inherits an organization that has been demoralized by the oil-for-food scandal, a perceived double standard in disciplining errant senior officials and persistent criticism from U.S. conservatives.

In addition, the organization has been nearly impotent in resolving the killing in Darfur and reducing tensions in the Middle East.

Mr. Ban will have to make swift and demonstrable progress on U.N. management reforms, human rights issues and security enhancement to win over skeptical observers -- many of them within the organization or powerful governments.

The next secretary-general said he is reviewing all senior U.N. positions, and plans to make staff appointments starting in January. For the key roll of deputy secretary-general, he said, he is leaning toward female candidates.

Pressed by reporters on how he perceived the organization's role in the Middle East, Mr. Ban sounded strong support for Israel and frustration on Iraq.

He was asked by an Iranian reporter whether Israel's perceived acknowledgement of holding nuclear weapons doesn't destabilize the Middle East.

"The Middle East question is of course the most serious issue with which we must deal," he said.

Mr. Ban pledged to become personally involved in tense challenges such as Darfur, the Middle East and North Korea.

The General Assembly also yesterday paid tribute to Mr. Annan, 68, with two sustained standing ovations and a half-dozen speeches. He leaves the organization after more than four decades as an international civil servant.

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro Wolff praised Mr. Annan in a brief ceremony for using his voice and office to promote human rights and development, counterterrorism, conflict prevention and recovery.

"Since early in his first term, Kofi Annan has worked tirelessly to make the U.N. a more efficient and effective organization," Mr. Wolff said. "He has understood the need for the U.N. to evolve and reform to meet the challenges of today's world, and to use its resources wisely to better serve its member states and the millions of people who look to the U.N. to help them improve their lives."

Like a half-dozen speakers before him, Mr. Ban paid tribute to Mr. Annan, who will leave the organization on Dec. 31.

"It is an honor to follow in your revered footsteps," he said. "Your tenure has been marked by high ideals, noble aspirations and bold initiatives."

Castro Near Death, U.S. Intelligence Chief Says (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, December 15, 2006

Cuban President Fidel Castro is very ill and close to death, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said yesterday.

"Everything we see indicates it will not be much longer . . . months, not years," Negroponte told a meeting of Washington Post editors and reporters.

Castro relinquished power for the first time in 47 years after surgery July 31 for an undisclosed intestinal disorder. His brother, Raul, has assumed Castro's duties, but Cuban authorities have repeatedly insisted that he is recovering and eventually will return to office. He was last seen in an Oct. 28 video, shown on Cuban national television, in which he appeared gaunt and weak and warned that his convalescence would be lengthy.

The Cuban leader did not show up as anticipated at a Dec. 2 national celebration in Havana scheduled to commemorate his 80th birthday and the 50th anniversary of the Cuban revolution. In a brief speech at the event, Raul Castro imparted no message from his brother but said that Cuba is willing to open negotiations with the United States "to settle the long U.S.-Cuba disagreement."

In rejecting the offer this week, Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Shannon told reporters that the Bush administration will deal with Cuba's Communist government only when it shows a commitment to democracy. During the period of uncertainty under Raul Castro, Shannon said, "the regime has actually become harder and more orthodox and is not in a position to signal in any meaningful way what direction it will take post-Fidel."

Congressional advocates of easing long-standing U.S. sanctions against Cuba are scheduled to fly to the island today for a three-day visit exploring potential policy changes under Raul Castro. The bipartisan group of 10 is the largest congressional delegation to visit Cuba.

After Years Of Setbacks, Embargo Opponents See Glimmer Of Hope (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, December 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Democrats' capture of Congress and Cuban leader Fidel Castro's illness have dramatically altered the battle lines over Cuba policy and given new hope to opponents of U.S. sanctions.

"There's a re-energizing of the base of people who want to work to change this policy," said Mavis Anderson of Butterfield, Minn., the head of the Cuba program for the Latin America Working Group, a left-leaning advocacy organization based in Washington. "Outside of Congress, certainly people are excited that there may be some new openings. Inside the Congress, I think that will come."

In recent years, President Bush has cut back everything from U.S. travel to bank transfers and gift packages to the island, meeting little resistance in a Republican-controlled Congress.

But now the ailing Castro is largely viewed as unlikely to return to power. Democrats, traditionally less inclined to back the sanctions against Cuba, are set to control Congress for the first time since 1994. Bush is in his final two years in office, and his brother, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, is leaving office in January.

DOJ_NMG_0106984

On top of that perfect-storm scenario, a report last month by the watchdog Government Accountability Office questioned the efficiency of U.S. democracy programs to support dissidents on the island, giving more fuel to foes who argue that a change in policy is overdue.

"If you're a hard-liner on policy toward Cuba, things are not looking very good for you," said Tomas Bilbao, the executive director of the Cuba Study Group, a centrist nonpartisan organization in Miami and Washington that promotes new ideas on Cuba policy.

Congressional interest in Cuba is growing as the island continues to chart its course in the post-Fidel Castro era.

Six Democrats and four Republicans have signed up for a trip to Havana organized by the House International Relations Committee. The visit, which begins Friday, is an initiative of Arizona Republican Rep. Jeff Flake, a vocal supporter of more U.S. engagement with Cuba.

"People are talking about Cuba again," said Sarah Stephens, the director of the Freedom to Travel Campaign, an organization that seeks to overturn the travel ban against U.S. citizens. She said the group had confirmed meetings with Cuban National Assembly President Ricardo Alarcon and Foreign Minister Felipe Perez Roque, and that it might meet with Cuba's interim leader, Raul Castro.

Few observers expect Congress to end the trade embargo on Cuba anytime soon, a decision that ultimately belongs to the legislative branch after the 1996 Helms-Burton Act said Cuba must initiate a democratic path as a condition for lifting sanctions.

But opponents are expected to challenge key portions of the Cuba policy, including funding levels for the South Florida-based Radio and TV Marti and the travel ban for most U.S. citizens. Observers say the 2004 restrictions on travel by Cuban-American citizens to the island - who now can go only once every three years instead of annually - are especially vulnerable.

Several Democrats who are skeptical of Bush's Cuba policies will chair committees that will give them a platform on Cuba matters, including New York Rep. Charles Rangel on the Ways and Means Committee, Michigan Rep. John Conyers on the House Judiciary Committee and Wisconsin Rep. David Obey on the House Appropriations Committee.

In the Senate, Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden is expected to head the Foreign Relations Committee and Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, who once held up Treasury Department nominations to protest restrictions on U.S. trade with Cuba, probably will chair the Finance Committee.

But bills need to pass the floor of both chambers, where supporters of the embargo think that members will be reluctant to change policy when Havana may be on the eve of a historic shift because of Castro's illness.

"I am fully confident that, despite our reversals in Congress, U.S. sanctions will be kept on the Cuban dictatorship until a democratic transition is genuinely under way," said Florida Republican Rep. Lincoln Diaz-Balart, one of the staunchest defenders of Bush's policies on Cuba. "We have bipartisan solid support for Cuba's freedom in Congress, and George W. Bush is still president."

The Latin America Working Group counts 182 representatives from both parties as favoring a change in Cuba policy, well short of the 218 needed to pass bills.

The big uncertainty is the 50-plus-member freshman class, dominated by Democrats. But congressional votes on Cuba tend to muddy, as farm-state Republicans often vote for more trade with Cuba, while many Democrats join Republican colleagues in keeping the restrictions on Havana.

Cuba Vows To Defy U.S. Efforts At Change (AP)

By Vanessa Arrington

AP, December 15, 2006

Cuba vowed to defy U.S. efforts for economic and political change on the island in a front-page editorial Thursday in the Communist Party's newspaper that also referred to dissidents as "mercenaries" and "counterrevolutionary puppies."

Members of the U.S. government "should not fool themselves," the editorial said. "The Cuban government and people will take charge, as they've done until now, of guaranteeing the complete failure of these plans ... to encourage the subversion and internal counterrevolution in our country."

Washington maintains a decades-old trade and travel embargo against Cuba. The Bush administration has adopted even stricter policies aimed at squeezing the island's economy and pushing out the communist leadership.

The editorial comes at a time of uncertainty in Cuba, with the island's longtime leader Fidel Castro ailing and out of sight. The 80-year-old has not been seen since July, when he temporarily handed power over to his younger brother Raul so he could recover from intestinal surgery.

The elder Castro's failure to show up at his own delayed birthday celebration this month has fueled speculation that he is more sick than originally thought. Cuba has warned the U.S. government against trying to take advantage of the situation and Raul Castro has repeated his brother's warning that the island is prepared to defend itself against any U.S. aggression.

The U.S. has dedicated $80 million to what it describes as the promotion of democracy in Cuba over the next few years.

The party newspaper criticized the American diplomatic mission in Havana for distributing books, medicine, clothes and shortwave radios to Cubans, saying the U.S. Interests Section "acts like the central barracks of the counterrevolution."

The Cuban government frequently accuses dissidents of working with U.S. officials to undermine the island's system. That charge — denied by the dissidents and Washington — was used against 75 activists rounded up in the spring of 2003 and sentenced to prison terms ranging from six to 28 years.

"The poorly named dissident movement is no more than a group financed and directed by the U.S. government, true mercenaries ... at the service of the Cuban people's historic enemy: Yankee imperialism," the editorial said.

"No matter how much money they spend, they'll never be able to bend the will of the Cuban people," it added.

On Wednesday, a senior State Department official said the deterioration in Castro's health has been accompanied by the rise of hardline elements to key positions in Cuba.

"With Fidel Castro still alive, the regime has become more orthodox," said Thomas Shannon, who heads the State Department's Western Hemisphere affairs bureau. "It is hard to say what position it will take post-Fidel."

Poll: 1 In 4 Cubans OK With Freedoms (AP)

By Foster Klug

AP, December 15, 2006

About one-quarter of Cubans interviewed in the island's two biggest cities are satisfied with their freedom to choose what they do with their lives, according to a poll released Thursday.

When asked about the job performance of Cuba's leaders, about 40 percent of those surveyed said they disapproved, the Gallup Poll found. Not quite half gave their approval. The poll surveyed 600 people in Havana and 400 in Santiago.

The survey comes as Cuba is at a crossroads. Leader Fidel Castro is ill and questions abound about whether he will recover and what will happen if he does not.

Castro's autocratic rule has fueled widespread criticism, though he has supporters, including Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Gallup conducted the Cuba survey only in two cities because of the difficulty in getting around the island and because of the absence of a reliable way to buy food and provisions, said Carlos Denton, president of CID Gallup Central America.

The results are not meant to be representative of Cuba's more than 11 million citizens — only a look at those nearly 3 million people living in Havana and Santiago, Gallup officials said.

According to the survey:

_When asked about the "ideal partner" for Cuba to increase commercial ties with, the United States was most commonly mentioned, followed by China and Venezuela. The U.S. government maintains a decades-old trade and travel embargo against Cuba.

_Nearly all of those interviewed said they thought Cuban health care was accessible to any person who needed it, regardless of their economic status.

_Nearly all said Cubans who wanted to study have access to education, regardless of their economic situation.

_Only about 40 percent said Cubans can get ahead by working hard.

_About two-thirds of the respondents who had jobs said they were satisfied with them.

Ten people from other Latin American countries conducted the interviews along with 10 Cubans, mostly college students Gallup had previously dealt with. The workers tried to stay away from the homes of people responsible for reporting on neighborhood activities to the government. Such homes, Gallup said, are on nearly every block.

The interviews were not monitored by the Cuban government, the polling group said, and no incentives to answer questions were given to respondents. Gallup said it did not request governmental permission to conduct the survey.

The poll workers entered their results daily in computers at the Internet cafes that have sprung up to cater to tourists. They burned their data each night to avoid having the results recovered by the government.

Jesus Rios, Gallup's director of research for Latin America, said that the questions were the same ones his company uses in similar polls all over the world and were not customized for Cuba.

The poll was conducted Sept. 1-15 with residents above the age of 15. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points for the total sample.

A Central Character In Russian Whodunit Says He Was A Victim (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

MOSCOW -- For 15 years, a former Kremlin security agent named Andrei Lugovoi deftly navigated the treacherous waters of post-Soviet Russia.

In the 1990s, he guarded top government officials, and three times traveled with them to the U.S., where he says he once stood next to President Clinton at the White House. Even a 14-month stint in jail in 2001 didn't throw him for long. Within months, he bounced back to become head of a private-security company whose clients included legislators, governors and even some Kremlin critics.

Today, some of those clients wonder whether he was guarding them or spying for the Kremlin. Mr. Lugovoi, 41 years old, is now at the center of the investigation by Britain's Scotland Yard into the death of Kremlin critic Alexander Litvinenko, who was poisoned by radioactive polonium 210 in London last month.

Trusted by many of the dissident exile Russian community in London, Mr. Lugovoi in October introduced the victim, a longtime acquaintance, to Moscow businessman Dmitry Kovtun. When the three met a second time Nov. 1, at the Pine Bar of London's Millennium Hotel, police believe Mr. Litvinenko got the fatal dose of polonium. Police are investigating whether Mr. Kovtun brought the poison from Moscow via Hamburg, Germany.

Since police have found traces of polonium in Mr. Lugovoi's London hotel, as well as in a Hamburg car and an apartment used by Mr. Kovtun, the widening investigation has opened a window onto a netherworld of former Russian agents who turn their secret contacts into lucrative careers.

In the Russia of President Vladimir Putin, whom Russian media have quoted as saying there's no such thing as a former KGB agent, the case highlights how blurred the distinction can be between active and retired operatives when ex-spies are still in great demand for their services and expertise.

In several phone interviews, Mr. Lugovoi said he is deeply offended by suggestions that he helped kill Mr. Litvinenko. He said he is now undergoing tests for radiation poisoning in a Moscow hospital. "It's nonsense," he said, that he still has ties to Russian security services. "I have a private company, and it guards many people who have only good things to say about me."

The Kremlin has vehemently denied that it had anything to do with Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning. Russia's state-run television has suggested that he poisoned himself, or that other oppositionists killed him in an effort to generate bad publicity for the Kremlin.

Mr. Lugovoi was trusted by some of the country's opposition because of his jail term, when he was charged with conspiring to help one of his clients, a critic of Mr. Putin, escape from prison in Moscow.

Now some wonder whether the prison term -- as well as Mr. Lugovoi's subsequent business dealings -- may have been an elaborate ruse to infiltrate the ranks of the Kremlin opposition and report on them.

Sergei Dorenko, a prominent radio personality and critic of Mr. Putin, said he has let go his bodyguards from Mr. Lugovoi's firm, effective Jan. 1. As Kremlin control tightens throughout Russia, he said, it isn't clear who works for whom.

"If they want to hurt you, I'm not sure there is any defense," said Mr. Dorenko. "In that case, I don't need a bodyguard -- what I really need is a witness."

Mr. Lugovoi's long history of working around Russia's ruling elite includes a few mysterious episodes with political overtones.

A graduate of the Soviet Union's equivalent of West Point, he commanded a platoon of Kremlin guards in the waning years of the Cold War. After the Soviet collapse in 1991, he was chief bodyguard to top officials such as acting Prime Minister Yegor Gaidar and Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev.

In 1996, he says, he left government service to head up security at the main state TV channel, which was controlled at the time by the politically powerful businessman Boris Berezovsky.

But when Mr. Putin came to office in 2000, the political winds shifted dramatically. Mr. Berezovsky came under pressure and left the country to avoid criminal charges. Prosecutors jailed one of his associates, Nikolai Glushkov, on charges that he had looted OAO Aeroflot, the national airline, where Mr. Glushkov was CEO.

Mr. Lugovoi was arrested, too, in 2001, when police said he tried to help Mr. Glushkov escape from prison during a visit to a local hospital. Mr. Glushkov said the escape charges were just a trick to keep him in prison and that Mr. Lugovoi might have been part of the plot. While sitting in court, he said, Mr. Lugovoi let slip that he was talking to officers of Russia's FSB, the successor to the KGB, while he was in prison. None of those conversations turned up in court records, Mr. Glushkov says.

When Mr. Lugovoi was released from prison the following year, he headed up the security firm "Ninth Wave," which he said he founded with some friends.

Mr. Glushkov said he was suspicious of Mr. Lugovoi's quick success. After Mr. Glushkov was released from prison in 2004, he says he invited Mr. Lugovoi to his house for a chat. "I tried to get him to tell me about his conversations with the FSB and where his money was coming from," Mr. Glushkov said. "He didn't explain one or the other."

Mr. Lugovoi said he was "shocked" at Mr. Glushkov's accusations. He said the meeting never happened.

Mr. Glushkov said he advised Mr. Berezovsky, now living in London, to stay away from Mr. Lugovoi. But Mr. Glushkov said the tycoon didn't listen. Others say Mr. Berezovsky may have even helped Mr. Lugovoi's business by recommending his security company to political allies still living in Russia.

One of them was Ivan Rybkin, a former speaker of Russia's Parliament who made an abortive Berezovsky-backed attempt to run against Mr. Putin for president in 2004. Eight private security guards watched Mr. Rybkin, and occasionally Mr. Lugovoi would stop in to check on them, Mr. Rybkin says.

As the campaign entered the home stretch, Mr. Rybkin disappeared. When he resurfaced a few days later, he said that while on a trip to Kiev, he had been drugged and that two men had made a videotape of him that was embarrassing in some unspecified way, before he regained consciousness. He dropped out of the presidential race and retired from politics.

Mr. Rybkin said he always felt uneasy under Mr. Lugovoi's care. It was never clear, he said, whether his security guards were watching him, or trying to learn his next move. He fired Mr. Lugovoi's guards in 2004, and now lives with his family -- and without security guards -- at a dacha outside Moscow.

"Now I only trust my brother," said Mr. Rybkin.

That mishap didn't dent Mr. Lugovoi's business, however. Last year, he plowed his profits into a new venture -- a brewery producing wine, beer and kvas, a Russian beverage made from fermented bread.

He says the business required him to travel to London more than a dozen times this year. While in London, he would often visit his old boss, Mr. Berezovsky, as well as Mr. Litvinenko, who at one time worked as a bodyguard for the tycoon.

Mr. Litvinenko, who fled to London in 2000, had written two books there that were both deeply critical of Mr. Putin and Mr. Litvinenko's former employers in the security services.

In mid-October, Mr. Lugovoi took a trip to London, and brought with him Mr. Kovtun, a fellow military-academy graduate who also said he had moved to the private sector, as a consultant to foreign firms in Russia. Mr. Lugovoi said he introduced Mr. Kovtun to Mr. Litvinenko so they could share business contacts.

Mr. Lugovoi and Mr. Kovtun returned to London two weeks later. This time Mr. Kovtun traveled via Hamburg, where he served back in the days of the Soviet Union. Police said Mr. Kovtun left traces of polonium on his ex-wife's sofa, where he slept, and on the seat of a BMW that picked him up at the airport.

In London, the three men met again Nov. 1 at the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel.

Detectives from Scotland Yard flew to Moscow but have not been allowed to directly question either of the men, who both say they have been hospitalized with polonium poisoning. Mr. Lugovoi says he spoke to Russian investigators for three hours, however, in the presence of British detectives. Mr. Lugovoi waived his right to a lawyer, saying he's a victim, not a perpetrator. "I have nothing to hide," he said.

Defining Democracy Down (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Over the course of five days in Caracas last week, I couldn't help but notice the ubiquitous image of President Hugo Chávez peering down from hundreds of his campaign banners that read "Vote against the devil; vote against the empire." The nationalistic message denouncing President George W. Bush and the U.S. blanketed the capital.

On election night, as it became clear that more votes had been cast for Mr. Chávez than for candidate Manuel Rosales, the president appeared on the balcony of Miraflores, the presidential palace, to proclaim that "the devil who tries to dominate the world," had suffered another defeat.

The red-clad Chávez dramatically recited from the Lord's Prayer and then borrowed from it for his own prophesy. "Thy kingdom come," he bellowed, and thereafter, "the kingdom of socialism." The ailing Fidel Castro reportedly sent a short message from Havana congratulating Mr. Chávez and noting that "the victory was resounding, crushing and without parallel in the history of our America."

Mr. Chávez has for eight years been heading a devoutly anti-American government and he is widely considered the region's heir apparent to Fidel. But be prepared for the Venezuelan bad boy to become even more menacing to the U.S. now. The reason, in a word, is "legitimacy." Having gone through an electoral exercise against candidate Rosales, who managed to garner nearly 40% of the vote, Mr. Chávez is likely to be emboldened by the conventional notion around the region that he heads a "democracy."

This is regrettable. There isn't a shred of evidence to support the claim that Venezuela has a democracy and voices for freedom are badly needed to point out this reality.

The assault on Venezuelan democracy, which began before Mr. Chávez came to power, has been possible largely because of state corruption. But the Chávez government has taken the concept to a whole new level. In this space last week I cited a report by Gustavo Coronel, a former director of the state oil company. His paper, "Corruption, Mismanagement and Abuse of Power in Hugo Chávez's Venezuela," published by the Cato Institute, deserves a fuller airing.

Mr. Coronel, who was the Venezuelan representative for Transparency International from 1996-2000, has painstakingly traced the "hypercorruption" that is now flourishing as a result of record oil income, poor management, and the "ideological predilections" of a president trying to "play a messianic role in world affairs." In 23 pages he neatly shows that Mr. Chávez, who claims to represent the progressive left, is nothing but an old-fashioned authoritarian otherwise known in Latin America as a caudillo.

The report properly notes that government corruption is "the violation of public interest for personal or partisan gain," a definition that goes beyond graft to "the use and abuse of political power." Chávez corruption includes the 1999 constituent assembly, which was packed with his supporters and given supraconstitutional powers to dissolve the country's democratic institutions and create new ones made up of pro-Chávez actors. "This ended with all Venezuelan political institutions under the control of the government and eliminated effective checks and balances," Mr. Coronel writes. "From that moment on . . . Venezuela ceased to be a democracy."

Since then the government has used its unchecked power to "spend" the country's oil wealth arbitrarily and without any accountability. Using the data from the Center for Economic Research in Caracas, Mr. Coronel identifies $17 billion in Venezuelan "donations to politically friendly countries," various infrastructure projects around the region and weapons purchases. Bolivian President Evo Morales, who famously used street violence to bring down two elected governments, got $30 million on a visit to Caracas in January. "According to the Venezuelan Central Bank," Mr. Coronel writes, "about $22.5 billion has been transferred to accounts abroad by the Chávez government since 2004." Some $12 billion of it, he says, remains unaccounted for.

Mr. Coronel notes that "according to Transparency International 95% of all known public contracts are awarded without bidding." In a country where the state owns the oil and the oil is the economy this means massive politicized fraud. False invoicing and the signing of contracts with "nonexistent suppliers" are among the tricks of the trade and explain why the country is witnessing the "emergence of a new rich 'revolutionary' class."

The politicized Supreme Court, National Electoral Council (CNE) and state-owned oil company PdVSA no longer have any transparency obligations. The CNE, for example, has not allowed an independent audit of the voter registry, which contains almost 17 million names, "a statistical improbabilty" in a country of 26 million, "60% of whom are too young to register." With Chávez carte blanche comes power to destroy political enemies too. After a PdVSA strike to oppose the politicization of the oil company 20,000 skilled employees were fired in violation of Venezuelan labor laws.

Drug trafficking through Venezuela has also boomed under the Chávez government and there is good reason to believe the military is involved. A May report for Jane's Intelligence Review by Andy Webb-Vidal contains an interview with a former Colombian guerrilla who knows how to get illegal substances into Venezuela: "Once across the river, the [Colombian rebels] would make a payment to the National Guard and then transport the drugs in four-wheel drive vehicles."

Just days after the election, Mr. Chávez took off on a South American tour to exert his regional leadership as a man chosen by the people. His aircraft was escorted by the first two of 30 Russian-made warplanes that Venezuela has recently ordered. Back home his government had just announced a joint venture with Iran to make cars in Venezuela.

Venezuela is not a democracy by any definition and Mr. Chávez is sure to be a thorn in the side of democrats for years to come. But legitimizing his abuse of power, in face of all the evidence, only makes things worse.

Hair-Raising New World (WSJ)

By Henry Sokolski

The Wall Street Journal, December 15, 2006

Israeli officials this week made two painfully honest nuclear pronouncements. The first -- Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's indirect admission on Monday that Israel had nuclear weapons -- got the lion's share of attention. Another statement, however, was easily as interesting: On Wednesday Israeli officials publicly applauded Saudi Arabia's announcement that it and its Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) neighbors intended to develop "peaceful nuclear energy." Why Jerusalem's endorsement? Because, as Israeli officials explained, these Arab nations' announcement was "directed against Iran." That is, it threatened to check Iran's bomb activities with a Sunni nuclear-weapons option.

Welcome to the new nuclear age where peace is the sturdy child of terror and "peaceful nuclear energy" is the not-so-secret weapon of choice. Unlike Washington, which last month applauded Egypt and earlier Turkey (two other Iran-fearing nations) for the utility and peacefulness of their own just-announced nuclear programs, Israel deserves credit for candidly outing such projects for what they truly are -- nuclear-weapons options.

Still, even with Israel's atomic honesty and America's embrace of a new world full of nuclear-energy programs and a growing number of mutually-not-so-deterred states, no one has yet thought through just how hair-raising this new world is likely to be. Without any luck, in 15 to 20 years, we could see a Middle East (Turkey, Algeria, Egypt, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Syria and Israel), an Asia (Vietnam, Indonesia, Burma, Malaysia, Australia, Japan, Taiwan, Korea, China, India and Pakistan), and even a Latin America (Mexico, Venezuela, Cuba, Argentina and Brazil) full of nuclear weapons-ready states.

This may seem far-fetched but consider: The U.S. is now encouraging nuclear power to sustain economic growth and save the world from global warming. The Bush administration has condoned or backed nuclear expansion in India, China, Brazil, Argentina, South Africa, Ukraine, France, Britain, Japan and Australia. Because of this and previous U.S. winking at the nuclear fuel-making activities of key U.S. allies, our own State Department's lawyers now eagerly insist that all nations have a right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) to make nuclear power and fuel. All that's required, they say, is that states claim their activities have some conceivable civilian application and open them to occasional international visits.

The risk of pursuing such egregious policies is obvious: A world full of nuclear fuel-making states, claiming they are on the right side of the NPT, only days or weeks from having bombs.

The latest idea that is supposed to prevent this is to assure countries affordable (i.e., subsidized) nuclear fuel and reactors in order to bribe them to forgo nuclear fuel-making. If this is not enough, the International Atomic Energy Agency recently suggested that perhaps it would also be useful to share "proliferation resistant" -- but not necessarily proliferation proof -- reprocessing technologies (a key way to make nuclear-weapons fuel). All of this, of course, would be voluntary. Countries that signed up could change their minds.

Much of this is worse than doing nothing. Such subsidized nuclear aid, at a minimum, will undermine whatever moral or economic authority we might otherwise have to scold or isolate would-be bomb makers about their unnecessary, uneconomical and dangerous activities.

What then should we do instead? The short answer is to rely more on market mechanisms and less on government guessing to guide us through the myriad of choices that must be made to fuel and generate clean, economical electricity. Fortunately, the most dangerous nuclear activities, like nuclear fuel-making, are uneconomical as is producing large amounts of nuclear power in oil- and gas-rich countries with small electrical grids (e.g., much of the Middle East). There are also a number of non-nuclear ways to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. We need to exploit this.

First, we should encourage open international bidding on the construction of large electrical power generators and their related fuel-making plants. Winning bids in any national competition should go not to the priciest or the most subsidized project but rather to the option that is the best value in producing a desired amount of clean electricity. Here, one might begin by pushing the Global Energy Charter for Sustainable Development, a popular treaty which calls for "open and competitive" energy markets.

Second, we must recognize that to meet tough greenhouse-gas emission goals, a consumption tax on carbon-generating fuels will be necessary. Besides making its introduction revenue neutral and progressive through tax reform (income and other tax reductions, plus rebates for citizens who are poor), these new taxes should be accompanied with an early sunset on all the fuel-specific subsidies now in place for nuclear and natural gas, oil, clean coal and renewables. Anything less would only stack the deck higher in favor of nuclear against safer, less subsidized alternatives.

Firms building and operating fuel-making and electricity-generating plants would have to assume the full costs of financing, insuring and decommissioning them. In the case of nuclear facilities, they also would have to assume the expense of safeguarding and physically securing them against diversions and terrorist and military attacks. Ideally, keeping governments from subsidizing these activities should be a priority not only for national governments, but for trade organizations like the EU and WTO.

Under such a market regime, nations that choose to subsidize any particular form of energy production would be called to account for undermining economic fairness. If they subsidized nuclear activities, they also could also be collared for threatening international security. Certainly, subsidizing nuclear fuel-making (where the world capacity is projected to exceed demand for the next decade or more) makes no economic sense.

Would this stop nuclear proliferation? No. But, unlike today's interpretation of the NPT, which ignores suspicious "civilian" nuclear undertakings even when it's obvious that they lack any economic rationale, it would help flag worrisome nuclear activities far sooner -- well before a nation came anywhere near making bombs. Would it stifle nuclear power? No. A carbon tax should favor nuclear power but no more than cheaper, clean alternatives.

Would it take care of a nuclear-ready Iran? Hardly. Only military, economic and diplomatic efforts to squeeze Iran (as we did the Soviet Union during the Cold War) can handle that problem. But it would prevent Iran from becoming an international nuclear model. It certainly would be far more effective in promoting nonproliferation than any American-led effort to subsidize atomic power, and clearly less risky than backing Israeli and GCC efforts to surround Iran with peaceful nuclear-weapons options.

A Tough Beginning (WP)

WHEN FELIPE CalderÃ³n took office as Mexican president two weeks ago, the dominant question was whether he would be able to govern the country. Having won election by a razor-thin margin, he faced a virtual insurrection on the part of the leftist populist he defeated, plus a separate standoff with militants attempting to overthrow an unpopular state governor and escalating violence by drug traffickers. It wasn't even clear that he would manage to take the oath of office, since opposition militants vowed to physically block him from entering Congress.

Fortunately Mr. CalderÃ³n has opened his presidency with aggressiveness and skill. He outmaneuvered the congressional dissidents at his swearing-in; five days later, he ordered the arrest of one of the main leaders of the violent protests in Oaxaca state. Next came a raid on the offices of Oaxaca state police and prosecutors, who had failed to act against those who shot and killed some of the anti-government protesters.

This week Mr. CalderÃ³n launched an offensive against the drug traffickers, dispatching 6,500 federal forces to his home state of Michoacan. Feuding gangsters there have committed some 500 murders this year, including a series of grisly beheadings. Though no one expects that the gangs will be quickly vanquished, the new president has sent an important message: He does not intend to allow his narrow election to produce a weak or indecisive government.

That is fortunate, because after six years of passivity and political impasse under former president Vicente Fox, Mexico badly needs an effective leader. In addition to the dangers of political rebellion and criminal disorder, Mexico's economy is being held back by monopolies and unions whose resistance to competition and deregulation needs to be tackled. There are also unnecessary obstacles to foreign investment, especially in the energy sector. Mr. CalderÃ³n has spoken of the need for tax and fiscal reform that would leave the government less dependent on revenue from the state oil company.

So far Mr. CalderÃ³n has accompanied his law-and-order campaign with populist gestures: He slashed his own salary and the presidential budget and adopted some of the social spending measures championed by AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador, the failed presidential candidate who now seeks to destroy Mexico's democracy. Considering the divided electorate and Mr. CalderÃ³n's shaky starting point, that looks wise. Good politics and aggressive law enforcement should help to increase and consolidate the new president's authority. Then he will have to use it to push through the institutional and structural reforms Mexico needs to thrive.

Pacts Americana? (NYT)

By David Kaye, K. Russell Lamotte And Peter Hoey

The New York Times, December 15, 2006

WHAT can the incoming Democratic Congress do to help reverse the steep erosion of America's standing abroad, particularly the impression that the United States has disengaged from global problem-solving? Though the President dominates foreign policy, the Senate can make an impact in one significant area: by giving the required two-thirds majority vote to approve a raft of treaties awaiting action.

The Senate has before it more than two dozen treaties submitted for approval by President Bush and his predecessors — some, in fact, were negotiated as long ago as the Eisenhower administration. These agreements are not like the Kyoto Protocol on climate change or the statute that established the International Criminal Court, which are too controversial even to be transmitted to the Senate.

Indeed, these are widely supported pacts, making it difficult to discern why many stalled in the first place: perhaps it's as simple as a senator's vague concerns about "sovereignty," a lack of domestic constituency or the press of other legislative business.

Early approval of key agreements in areas of great international concern, like the environment and the laws of war, would show the world that the United States is committed to solving global problems. To hit the point home, the Senate should act within the first six months of the next Congress. Quick approval for most is eminently doable.

There is a pressing need to repair America's image now, even while the Democratic Congress and the White House battle over the future of Iraq policy. Approving treaties from this list would make a good start.

Yale students sue federal officials over immigration raid

NEW HAVEN, Conn._A group of Yale University students sued federal officials today, accusing them of participating in a campaign to harass immigrants in Danbury.

The lawsuit was filed against the U.S . Department of Homeland Security on behalf of several immigration advocacy groups. It seeks records related to a sting operation in September that led to eleven arrests.

Simon Moshenberg, a Yale Law School student involved in the case, says the students fear that the way the arrests took place may have violated the Constitution.

The sting involved an undercover officer posing as a building contractor who drove to a day-laborer site in Danbury in search of workers. The lawsuit says the officer transported eleven men to the purported work site where they were arrested.

Moshenberg says lawful stings are supposed to be focused on specific suspects, not a group of people who look Latino.

A spokesman at the homeland security agency says the agency focuses on specific violations based on intelligence and does not conduct random enforcement.

Hicks' latest court bid for freedom delayed until February

By Belinda Tasker

SYDNEY, Dec 15 AAP - Australian terror suspect David Hicks has suffered a setback in his latest attempt to be freed from the Guantanamo Bay jail, where he has spent five years.

Hicks' legal team today took his fight to the Federal Court in Sydney, where they are seeking orders for the Commonwealth government to demand US authorities release the Adelaide man.

His lawyers, led by NSW constitutional barrister Brett Walker, SC, had hoped to be granted a hearing in early January, saying the case was of the utmost urgency.

But Justice Brian Tamberlin instead set a date of February 26 after agreeing with the government's\l "l" lawyers\l "l" that he first had to decide whether he had the power to hear Hicks' case.

In papers filed with the court, the government argues Hicks' case should be thrown out because he has "no reasonable prospect" of success.

The commonwealth's solicitor-general David Bennett, QC, also attacked the timing of the case, saying it was "grossly unreasonable" given the court and lawyers were due to take their annual summer break.

"The plaintiff has had five years during which proceedings of this sort could have been commenced," he told the court.

Dr Bennett disputed claims by Hicks' lawyers that Australia should demand Hicks' freedom, based on Britain's success in having nine of its citizens freed from the Cuban prison.

But Mr Walker argued the federal government was bound by the constitution to protect all its citizens and should seek his release.

"(The) commonwealth owes a duty of protection or has a function to protect Mr Hicks as an Australian citizen overseas," he said.

Mr Walker also wants the court to review decisions by Foreign Minister Alexander Downer and Attorney-General Philip Ruddock not to seek Hicks' release because of their belief that he cannot be tried here if set free.

Outside the court, Hicks' Adelaide-based lawyer David McLeod expressed disappointment at the delay in the case.

"David wanted to have this matter heard as quickly as possible, we wanted it heard as quickly as possible," he told reporters.

"The fact that it's now not going to be heard until February is a concern but it simply recognises the judicial timetable and the fact that these things do take time."

Hicks has been imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay since January 2002 after being arrested in Afghanistan on or around December 9, 2001, during the US invasion.

He had pleaded not guilty to charges of conspiracy, attempted murder and aiding the enemy.

However, the charges were dropped after the US Supreme Court in June declared illegal the military tribunals set up to try Hicks and other inmates.

The Australian government believes Hicks could face charges next month with the enactment of new regulations governing the US military commission expected to try him.

Hicks' Pentagon lawyer Major Michael Mori was in Sydney today to support his client's latest bid for freedom.

Major Mori said he visited Hicks, who remains in solitary confinement, last week.

"He's trying to hang in the best he can," he told reporters.

"I don't know how he survives every day, but his desire to see his family and the support that he knows is out here in Australia helps him get through each day."

Also lending his support today was former Guantanamo inmate Mamdouh Habib, who was released in January 2005 at the request of the Australian government.

"People supported me and I have to support this guy because I believe David Hicks is a victim of the government," said Mr Habib.

German foreign minister says government was not complicit in alleged CIA kidnapping (al-Masri)

BERLIN_Germany's foreign minister said Thursday that he did not know of the CIA's alleged kidnapping of a German man until after the man was released.

Khaled al-Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, says he was seized in Macedonia on Dec. 31, 2003, and taken by CIA agents to Afghanistan, where he was allegedly abused before being released in Albania in May 2004.

"Germany provided no assistance to the kidnapping of a German citizen," Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said on his way into a parliamentary committee hearing on the case.

Germany's opposition parties sought the creation of the committee to investigate whether the government\l "l" was complicit in el Masri's case.

Steinmeier, who was chief of staff under former Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder at the time, said he only learned that el Masri had been in custody after his release.

Al-Masri has asked a federal appeals court in Richmond, Va., to reinstate a lawsuit he filed against the CIA. A judge dismissed the lawsuit in May, ruling that a trial could harm national security by revealing details about CIA activities.

Munaf files against Romania in UN Human Rights Committee

Mohammad Munaf - the Romanian / Iraqi / US citizen involved in the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists - had his lawyers filing a complaint against Romania at the United Nations' Human Rights Committee. The lawyers claim that Romania broke Munaf's rights in refusing to offer him diplomatic assistance. Munaf was sentenced to death by hanging two months ago.

The purpose of the action is to determine Bucharest authorities to demand that Munaf's sentence is commuted from death to life in jail.

Romania did nothing in the case, although the Romanian embassy in Baghdad could have prevented the transfer into American custody after Munaf's release along with the hostages, the document reads (Munaf posed as a hostage as the rest of the group).

Profs Assail Anti-Terror Act; Harvard professors take on Bush administration and enlist unlikely allies

By PARAS D. BHAYANI and KEVIN ZHOU

Crimson Staff Writers

A group of elite law professors from Harvard filed a legal brief this week asserting that one of the Bush administration's central anti-terror policies is unconstitutional, a move that brought together ideologues from across the political spectrum.

The "friend-of-the-court" brief, filed in the case of suspected al Qaeda agent Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, argues that the Military Commissions Act violates the Constitution. The professors argue that the act denies al-Marri the right to a writ of habeas corpus—an order requiring that a "court of law review the legal adequacy of the executive's grounds for detaining" an individual, according to Frank I. Michelman, Harvard's Walmsley university professor and one of the scholars who signed the brief.

Since it was filed Tuesday, the brief has made a large splash in legal circles principally because two well-known conservatives—Steven G. Calabresi of Northwestern University and Richard A. Epstein of the University of Chicago—joined in the brief.

The Bush administration "figured out every constitutional protection you'd want and they removed them," Epstein told The Associated Press. He added that while he considers many of his liberal colleagues, including Koh, to be "mad on many issues," the government's interpretation in this case was "beyond the pale."

The brief was largely the work of three academics: Armstrong Professor of International, Foreign, and Comparative Law Gerald L. Neuman '73; Bemis Visiting Professor in International Law Sarah H. Cleveland; and Yale Law School Dean Harold H. Koh '75, a member of the Harvard Board of Overseers.

Neuman, in a Crimson interview yesterday, stressed the need for habeas corpus review, saying that it "is important for determining whether a person has been lawfully classified as an 'enemy combatant.'"

"The fact that the government applies the label is not enough," Neuman said, adding that the process for determining who is an enemy combatant should distinguish between those who are "arrested in the United States [and] those who have never taken up arms against the United States on a foreign battlefield."

The brief was also signed by Loeb University Professor Laurence H. Tribe '62, Smith Professor of Law Martha L. Minow, and Cromwell Professor of Law, Emeritus David L. Shapiro '54.

The professors focused their criticisms on the act's stipulation that no court has the "jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the United States."

The professors wrote that allowing such a statute "would constitute a permanent abrogation of the writ," and that the Bush administration's "interpretation would be vastly threatening to the liberty of more than 20 million noncitizens residing in the United States."

Arar still on U.S. watch list: U.S. ambassador

Despite being exonerated by a federal inquiry, Maher Arar remains on a U.S. government watch list, says the U.S. ambassador to Canada.

David Wilkins became ambassador to Canada in June, replacing Paul Cellucci.
(Canadian Press)

In an interview with CBC Radio's The House, Ambassador David Wilkins confirmed Arar remains on the American border lookout system.

"My information is that he is on the watch list and has been since he was deported, yes," he said.

Four years ago, the RCMP mistakenly labelled Arar as an Islamic extremist and asked Washington to place a lookout for Arar. The former Ottawa engineer was detained at a New York airport in late 2002 and deported to Syria, where he spent a year being tortured in a prison.

Opinion: A travesty of injustice (Limone, Salvati)

By Brian McGrory, Globe Columnist

Spend a couple of days -- or, for that matter, a couple of minutes -- in the Moakley federal courthouse listening to testimony in the lawsuit brought by four wrongfully convicted men against the FBI, and a few simple questions come to mind.

Why is the federal government fighting this? Why haven't Joe Salvati and Peter Limone already been paid for the 30 years they spent in jail? Why are 40-year-old documents being kept secret? Why isn't there a single person in the Justice Department with a shred of common sense?

Don't get me wrong. For pure legal drama, it doesn't get much better than what's happening in Courtroom 3 these days.

First off, there's the parade of swaggering legal eagles like F. Lee Bailey and Jack I . Zalkind taking the witness stand to decimate the FBI. Zalkind, for example, quipped after a long day of testimony, "At $450 an hour, I'd like to get out of here."

There was the cameo appearance of former governor Michael S . Dukakis on Wednesday afternoon. He strode from the witness stand out into the hallway, where he declared the actions of the FBI "disgraceful."

Then there's the unfailingly brainy and always brassy judge, Nancy Gertner, who began Tuesday morning's court session by threatening to haul the director of the FBI in front of her.

The plaintiffs' table is lined with so many lawyers -- nine, most days -- that it looks like a reenactment of da Vinci's "The Last Supper." The government attorneys act as if they haven't slept in a month. Even Gertner appeared to take pity one morning, telling them, "You've been asked to litigate this case with one hand tied behind your back."

But there shouldn't be the need for pity. There shouldn't be any reason for Limone and Salvati to give up more of their lives to dutifully sit in the front row and relive the loss of their freedom.

Because there shouldn't be a trial at all.

In fact, it should be the opposite. FBI Director Robert Mueller ought to fly to Boston, all right, but rather than offer absurd excuses to Gertner, he needs to extend apologies and big payouts to the men who were framed by his agency so many decades ago and the families that have survived them.

Let's not draw too fine a point on this: The Boston office of the FBI was for too many years its own crime family. It sanctioned murders. It turned a blind eye toward drug-running. It wrought havoc on the everyday lives of everyday people, all, supposedly, in the name of ridding the town of the Mafia. And in this case, it intentionally hid evidence that would have exonerated four men who were wrongly convicted in the 1965 murder of a petty thief.

Two of the men, including a World War II hero, died in prison. Two others, Salvati and Limone, were released a few years ago. Salvati has since lived a simple life filled with family and odd jobs and friends who have survived his ordeal.

To this day, the federal government has never offered a settlement. When the two sides met with Gertner earlier this year, the government lawyers said there would be no offer forthcoming.

Salvati and Limone are both in their 70s, and you get the sense the government would rather see them die than compensate them for their loss of freedom.

Contrast that to the government's handling of a case in Oregon, where a lawyer was wrongly implicated by the FBI in the 2004 Madrid terrorist bombings and jailed for two weeks. The Justice Department wrote him a $2 million check last month, accompanied by an apology.

If two weeks in jail are worth $2 million, then by my calculation, Salvati alone would be owed $1.6 billion. Makes you think the geniuses down in Washington should have rethought that stand about not settling.

What the FBI and the rest of the Justice Department are doing in this trial isn't just an embarrassment, but a disgrace -- and it will undoubtedly prove to be an expensive one at that.

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 15

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Sent Home 33 Guantanamo Detainees Last Week. The Washington Post (12/18, A19, White) reports 33 Guantanamo Bay detainees "were returned to their home countries over the past week, part of a government effort to reduce the facility's population to a core group of terrorism suspects who could be held indefinitely." On Sunday, the Pentagon said it "transferred 17 detainees to their home countries over the weekend: seven to Afghanistan, five to Yemen, three to Kazakhstan, one to Libya and one to Bangladesh. Military officials announced Thursday that 16 detainees were sent to Saudi Arabia last week." With their departure, "Guantanamo now holds about 395 detainees, almost none of whom have been charged with a crime."

Difficulties Have Kept Even "Easy" Guantanamo Cases From Going To Trial. In a front-page story running nearly 3,000 words, the Wall Street Journal (12/18, Bravin) writes that even "'easy' cases have lingered" at Guantanamo because of difficulties with intelligence-sharing, the fact that witnesses are "scattered across the globe," and defense attorney challenges that have "paralyzed proceedings. … Such challenges help explain why the Bush administration failed to complete a single Guantánamo trial in the five years before the Supreme Court struck the system down in June."

Military Rehearsing For Detainee Hearings. The AP (12/17, Melia) reports the US military "is rehearsing for hearings on whether 14 top terror suspects can be held indefinitely without charge as enemy combatants, but defense lawyers say the outcome is preordained." Khalid Sheikh Mohammed "and the 13 others will be the highest-profile detainees to undergo the so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, and the first to do so in two years."

LATimes Says Writ Of Habeas Corpus Must Be Protected. The Los Angeles Times (12/18) editorializes that as outgoing Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter "points out, the Constitution allows for the suspension" of the writ of habeas corpus "only in times of invasion or rebellion, and 'we are suffering neither of those alternatives at the present time.' Habeas protection for enemy combatants -- not just those at Guantanamo but other aliens who might be detained in the future -- is not just a legal nicety. Without such protection, real injustices could be suffered by flesh-and-blood individuals."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DOJ, ACLU Battle Over War On Terror's "Information Front." The Christian Science Monitor (12/18, Marks) writes about "the latest battle in one key arena of the Bush administration's war on terror -- the information front." Both civil libertarians at the ACLU and attorneys at the Justice Department "agree that nothing less than the nature of American society is at stake, although each side sees different threats. The administration says the danger comes from technically savvy terrorists who are out to exploit the nation's open society in order to undermine it. Critics contend that the real peril comes from the administration itself, which, they charge, is abusing the classification system to shield its activities from public scrutiny, thus undermining the workings of democracy."

Hentoff Condemns Guantanamo Hearings. In his column appearing in the Village Voice (12/18), Nat Hentoff writes, "During the mutual-admiration hearing before the Senate Committee on Armed Services—which led to the unanimous confirmation of former CIA chief Robert Gates to be Donald Rumsfeld's successor—no senator asked Gates if he approves of the Pentagon's 'extreme . . . emergency' insistence on a $125 million appropriation to construct a permanent compound for a war-crimes court at Guantánamo" slated for war-crimes trials for Guantanamo detainees. Hentoff writes, "Unlike the Nuremberg war-crimes trials of the Nazis, there will be no government officials in the dock, but rather—as detailed in my last column—prisoners against whom the United States has itself committed war crimes under the Geneva Conventions and our own War Crimes act." Hentoff adds, "Our rampant lawlessness during the past four years at Guantánamo has long been "controversial" in the international press and among human rights groups. But the extent and depth of our abuse of these prisoners—resulting in a number of desperation suicides—have been illuminated with damning clarity in a series of reports by New Jersey's Seton Hall University School of Law."

WAR NEWS:

Powell Says US Losing In Iraq, Sounds Skeptical Note About Troop Surge. The Iraq war continued to dominate media coverage on Sunday. In particular, former Secretary of State Colin Powell's appearance on CBS' Face the Nation (12/17, Schieffer) generated a lot of coverage, much of it negative toward the Bush Administration. NBC Nightly News (12/17, story 2, 2:50, Seigenthaler) said that as President Bush considers "his options…on a change of course for Iraq," there was "a sobering view from his former Secretary of State, who says US forces are losing." NBC (Corke) added, "Usually a good soldier doesn't complain in public, but today, General Colin Powell, the man the Administration tapped to help bolster its case for the war in Iraq, says that America was less safe than when the war began. In his most extensive public comments about the war, former Secretary of State Colin Powell today offered a damning assessment." Powell was shown saying, "It's grave and deteriorating and we're not winning, we are losing. … I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purpose of suppressing this communitarian violence or civil war will work." The general also "said the war was still winnable, but he also seemed to criticize outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld for not sending in more troops after the fall of Saddam Hussein." The Washington Times (12/18, Pfeiffer) notes Powell, "whose so-called Powell Doctrine calls for the use of overwhelming force in military conflicts, said he thinks force levels should have been increased after the fall of Saddam Hussein in order to fill the security vacuum that led to the Iraq insurgency."

ABC World News (12/17, story 2, 2:35, Morrell) also reported Powell gave a "blunt assessment of the plan to send thousands more troops into Iraq: It will not work." Powell was shown saying, "There needs to be a clear mission that these additional troops are going to be performing. Is it to secure Baghdad? In which case the American Army isn't large enough to secure Baghdad. And we should not use our troops as policemen." USA Today (12/18, 10A, Slavin) quotes Powell saying the US Army "is about broken" and "could not support sending a significant increase of soldiers to Iraq. 'That surge cannot be sustained,'" he said. The New York Times (12/18, Johnston) runs a similar piece titled "Powell Doubts Need To Raise Troop Levels."

Powell also disagreed with the Administration on whether Iraq is in the middle of a civil war. He said on CBS' Face The Nation (12/17, Schieffer), said, "It seemed to me that this looks like a civil war and we ought to call it that." And backing much of what was proposed by the Iraq study group, Powell went on to say, "I think you have to talk to a country like Syria. It's a little discordant to see that we're not talking to them. … Iran is a little difficult. … But at the same time, I think that low-level conversations of the kind we had earlier might give us some channels of communication. Now, I have no illusions that either Syria or Iran want to help us in Iraq. I am also quite confident that what is happening in Iraq is self-generated for the most part. … Do they get marginal support and some support from Iran and Syria? You bet they do. … But at the same time, I've looked down on many people over the years, in the course of my military and diplomatic career, and I still had to talk to them."

Powell added that "ultimately…the Iraqis are the key to the solution. … The number one priority has to be working with the Iraqi government and their strategy, provide security for the people of Baghdad initially. That's the center of gravity. But I think ultimately, with our help, it has to be done by the Iraqis. They're the ones who have to solve this internecine civil war, communitarian conflict that they're in."

The Washington Post (12/18, A20, Deyoung) reports, "During Bush's first term, Powell was often on the losing side of disagreements with then-Defense Secretary Donald H.

Rumsfeld, Vice President Cheney and the president over a range of foreign policy issues, including the Arab-Israeli peace process, North Korea and Iraq." Although "he ultimately supported the 2003 invasion of Iraq -- and played a major role in building public backing for war when he delivered a UN Security Council speech saying Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction -- he objected to the administration's detention and interrogation policies for 'enemy combatants' and privately questioned the lack of planning and troop strength for postwar Iraq." Powell's "low-key departure from office in January 2005, after Bush's request for his resignation, stood in contrast to Friday's ceremonial farewell to Rumsfeld, whose retirement festivities at the Pentagon were attended by Bush and Cheney." Asked "whether he agreed with Cheney's assessment that Rumsfeld was 'the finest defense secretary this nation has ever had,' Powell demurred. 'Well, that's the vice president's judgment,' he said. 'I've known many fine secretaries of defense. ... But it's history that will judge the performance of all of us in this troubling time...and it is a history that I think will ultimately be written as a result of what happens in Iraq.'"

Democrats Split On Temporary Troop Increase. NBC Nightly News (12/17, story 2, 2:50, Corke) reported Bush is considering "increasing the number of troops by 20,000 or more to get the violence under control. Underscoring the divisive nature of the debate, leading Democrats are at odds over what is the next best course of action." Sen. Edward Kennedy: "I have been convinced by the generals and the commanders in Iraq that have made a convincing case that they feel that just adding more troops is going to delay the decision making by the Iraqi government." But "incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said the idea is worth trying." Sen. Harry Reid: "If there were some plan to send in some more troops for a very, very short period of time in an effort to get us out of there by the beginning of 2008 as the Iraq Study Group suggested, then I would go along with it."

Reid was asked on ABC's This Week (12/17, Stephanopoulos) if he would support the deployment of additional troops to Iraq. Reid said, "If it's for a surge, that is, for two or three months and it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year, then, sure, I'll go along with it."

The AP (12/18) reports "likely presidential hopeful Sen. Joe Biden said Sunday that he opposes sending additional troops to Iraq, even as the idea seemed to gain support from the Senate's leading Democrat, incoming majority leader Harry Reid. 'I will not to support a surge of troops unless it's tied to some reason for me to believe that they have a political solution,' said Biden, incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee."

Asked on CNN's Late Edition (12/17, Blitzer) about additional troops, Sen. Jack Reed said, "What is the mission of these new troops? Are they going to go take on these sectarian militias? Are they going to simply augment troops that are on the ground today? This is a city of six million people. It will require a huge number of security forces, not just another 15,000. My sense is that this is more of a political gesture."

Asked on Fox News Sunday (12/17, Wallace) about additional troops, Sen. Edward Kennedy said, "I don't believe that would stabilize the country, nor do I think it'll bring victory. … What is absolutely necessary is a political resolution and determination by the Iraqi government." Democrats' "commitment is to the troops, so they're not getting caught in a crossfire and a civil war, which they are."

Rep.-elect Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral described by ABC This Week (12/17) host George Stephanopoulos as "the highest-ranking military officer ever elected to the House," said on Stephanopoulos' show, "In Iraq, we're on the road to nowhere. Putting more troops on that road is not in the interest of the United States. We have moved troops from Anbar into Baghdad before. There was not only no dent in violence, it's actually increased. We doubled our forces in Baghdad. If we double and triple those forces, what we're doing is merely putting a Band-Aid out there."

More Commentary On New US Strategy. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/18), Major Ben Connable writes, "What will become of Iraqi villages, towns and cities as we pull out? Although past is not necessarily prologue, recent experience in Anbar Province may be instructive. American units have already withdrawn from the western Euphrates River valley — twice, in fact. ... The consequences were immediate and bloody. Insurgents assumed control of several towns and villages. They tortured and executed police officers, local politicians, friendly tribal leaders and informants. They murdered contractors who had worked with the Americans or the Iraqi government." Connable predicts of a US departure, "Insurgents of all stripes would make the most of the combined American and Iraqi withdrawal, harassing the departing convoys with homemade bombs and small-arms fire. Videos of insurgents dancing in the streets would become prevalent on the Internet and international television."

Retired Army Lt. Gen. Dan Christman said on CNN's Late Edition (12/17, Blitzer) that Bush "needs obviously to change strategy, in my judgment. I think he's on the path to doing that, as a result of the Iraq Study Group -- a change in strategy, essentially moving from a direct ground combat role into a long-term training establishment for the Iraqi military."

Clinton White House Chief of Staff John Podesta said on CNN's Late Edition (12/17, Blitzer), "The Iraq Study Group put it right. It's grave and deteriorating. And I think we're on a downhill slide in Iraq, and I think that until the President changes his strategy and changes his course, we're going to continue on that downhill slide, and the chaos will continue."

Kevin Ryan, a retired Army brigadier general, is a senior fellow at the Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government, writes in the Washington Post (12/18, A25), "The stage has been set for a serious discussion about the appropriate size for our Army: a discussion that should balance resources with demands. … The lack of ground forces has an impact beyond the ability to commit more troops to Iraq. Our published defense strategy requires a military that can defend our homeland, sustain two major wars, be present in key regions abroad and fight a global war on terrorism. With Marine and Army ground forces barely large enough to fight the two major wars, the other security tasks are left to flyovers and ship visits from our Air Force and Navy." Ryan adds, 'Throughout the 1980s we recruited an Army of more than 750,000 entirely from volunteers: the same Army that won the Persian Gulf War. It will take several years to recruit additional troops and build the organizations and facilities to house them, but these numbers are well within our reach."

Newt Gingrich said on NBC's Meet The Press (12/17, Russert), "The war's a failure in part because the strategy…has been wrong consistently, it's been a strategy that was far too American. Second, it's a failure because the instruments of national power don't work. … I think the Administration shouldn't just focus narrowly on Iraq. They should look, first of all, at the larger war, which does include Iran, it does include North Korea, it does include al-Qaeda. And they should look second at what are the strategic changes necessary to win in Iraq."

Dozens Of Aid Workers Kidnapped In Iraq.

NBC Nightly News (12/17, story 3, 2:45, Seigenthaler) reported, "In Baghdad…there was more violence. Insurgents kidnapped dozens of Iraqis. Another example of the obstacles facing US and Iraqi forces." NBC (Maceda) added, "Not even the offices of the Iraqi Red Crescent are safe. Gunmen wearing Iraqi uniforms abducted dozens of aid workers and guards. This, the sixth mass kidnapping in Baghdad this year, targeting either Sunnis or Shi'ites. It happened on the final day of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's much time-touted national reconciliation conference which US tells NBC News provided good speeches but no breakthroughs to end the bloodshed."

The AP (12/18, Torchia) reports, "Pierre Kraehenbuehl, director of operations of the International Committee of the Red Cross, said in Geneva that seven abductees were released. The Dutch Foreign Ministry said three Iraqi security guards at its embassy building in Baghdad -- adjacent to the Red Crescent offices -- were also kidnapped, but were later released." The Red Crescent, "which is part of the international Red Cross movement, has around 1,000 staff and some 200,000 volunteers in Iraq. It works closely with the International Committee of the Red Cross, which visits detainees and tries to provide food, water and medicine to Iraqis." The Los Angeles Times (12/18, Hennessy-Fiske) and Washington Post (12/18, A20, Raghavan, Trejos), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

Field Commanders Lack Good Intelligence On Insurgents. The Washington Times (12/18, Scarborough) reports, "The chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence says he has traveled to Iraq eight times to assess US intelligence collection, and each time he returns to Washington struck by the lack of knowledge about the insurgency that is killing hundreds of American troops. 'When I come back from Iraq, or even a briefing here, you learn how tough intelligence is,' said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican. 'I don't walk out of there believing that I've got a crystal-clear picture of what the insurgency is, what the scope of it is, what the magnitude is, what the capabilities are. How much is international? How much is external? How much is al Qaeda? How much is Iranian? How much is Syrian? I walk out with lots of unanswered questions.'" The Times adds, "The fact that US command lacks broad knowledge about the enemy in Iraq, in the opinion of Mr. Hoekstra and others, has brought a steady stream of criticism. … Defense sources have told The Washington Times that when field commanders return to the US from Iraq, one of their chief complaints is a lack on information about the enemy."

Blair Visits Iraq, Offers Support To Maliki Government. The AP (12/18, Lawless) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair took his Middle East peace tour to Iraq on Sunday, urging support for its fragile government and seeking to draw the violence-wracked country into his vision of a global battle against extremism. Standing in front of a Lynx helicopter in a cavernous hangar, Blair told some of the 7,000 British troops serving in southern Iraq they were fighting on behalf of 'people of tolerance and moderation' around the world."

Iraqi VP Says Sunnis Endangered By "Ethnic Cleansing." The Financial Times (12/18, Dinsmore) reports, "Vice-president Tariq al-Hashimi, Iraq's most senior politician from the Sunni Arab minority, said on Sunday that more US troops were needed in Baghdad to stop the 'systematic cleansing' of the Sunni community by Shia militias. Some 3,000 Iraqis were fleeing the country daily and Iraqi forces were insufficient, incompetent and corrupted, he said [on CNN]." Hashimi also "said there was 'no consensus' between the US and Iraq on how to tackle security." Colin Powell's doubts about the effectiveness of a troop surge are also quoted by the FT.

Saudis Claim Iran Has Created Shiite "State Within A State" In Iraq. The Washington Times (12/18, Behn) reports, "Iran has effectively created a Shi'ite 'state within a state' in neighboring Iraq, defying both Iraqi Sunnis and neighboring Sunni nations, according to a Saudi security report." Iranian forces "are providing Shi'ite militias with weapons and training, Iranian charities are pouring funds into schools and hospitals, and Tehran is actively supporting pro-Iranian Iraqi politicians, the report said." The study, which "has not been publicly distributed," "states that the Sunni insurgency numbers about 77,000, while the Shi'ite militia forces total about 35,000." CFR analyst Isobel Coleman "cautions that the report, while not necessarily inaccurate, is not impartial," while RAND analyst Ed O'Connell "said the Iranian intelligence was trying to counter Saddam Hussein's former formidable spy network, Iraqi Intelligence Service (IIS), or the Mukhabarat."

Special Forces Missions Said To Clash With CIA, Upset Allies. The Los Angeles Times (12/18, Miller) reports senior intelligence and military officials say Special Forces teams "sent overseas on secret spying missions have clashed with the CIA and carried out operations in countries that are staunch US allies, prompting a new effort by the agency and the Pentagon to tighten the rules for military units engaged in espionage." The missions "are part of a highly classified program that officials say has better positioned the United States to track terrorist networks and capture or kill enemy operatives in regions such as the Horn of Africa, where weak governments are unable to respond to emerging threats." But they have "also led to several embarrassing incidents" for the US, and some intelligence officials say the teams "have sometimes launched missions without informing the CIA, duplicating or even jeopardizing existing operations."

France Pulling 200 Special Forces Out Of Afghanistan. The New York Times (12/18, A10) and the Washington Post (12/18, A18) both carry versions of an AP report that France will withdraw approximately 200 special forces from Jalalabad, Afghanistan. A contingent of 1,100 French troops deployed under NATO command will remain in Kabul.

NATO's Increased Use Of Air Power Undermining Support Among Afghanis. The Christian Science Monitor (12/18, Morarjee) reports that "with so few boots on the ground," NATO is increasingly relying on air power in Afghanistan, which "has led to thousands of civilian deaths. The devastating air offenses are undermining support for the Afghan government, say human rights workers and Afghan officials, and are turning public opinion in the four southern provinces of Afghanistan against NATO forces, who took command of the south from the US in August."

DOJ:

Republicans Worry About Potential Ideological Shift In Fourth Circuit. The Washington Post (12/18, A1, Markon, Shear, 690K) reports, "A number of prominent Republican appointees have left or announced plans to leave the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which has played a key role in terrorism cases and has long been known for forceful conservative rulings and judicial personalities." This "growing list of vacancies" is "heightening concern among Republicans that one of the nation's most conservative and influential courts could soon come under moderate or even liberal control, Republicans and legal scholars say." The Post adds, "Republican concerns also are fueled by the pending Democratic takeover of Congress, as several of President Bush's 4th Circuit nominees were already bottled up in the Senate when Republicans ran it. From the GOP's perspective, the situation now will worsen."

New E-Mail Discovery Rules Noted. The Miami Herald (12/18, Meeks, 286K) reports, "If your business is sued for copyright infringement, restraint of trade or employment discrimination, having a means in place to track electronic data is critical to successfully defending the case. Otherwise, you're likely to lose -- and pay hefty damages -- even before stepping into a federal courtroom. … Under the new rules, both parties in a lawsuit must disclose their electronically stored information, along with any other materials they plan to use to prove their cases. … Small-business owners can no longer use the excuse that they have not been able to go through their e-mail archives in time for the initial disclosures."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Investigation Derails Siemens Reorganization. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, A1, Esterl) reports, "When turnaround artist Klaus Kleinfeld became chief executive of storied German conglomerate Siemens AG in early 2005, he vowed to shake things up. Nearly two years later, Mr. Kleinfeld finds himself under intense pressure, haunted by his company's past. A widening money-laundering and bribery investigation is shining a harsh spotlight on management and threatening to unravel his aggressive restructuring drive. Europe's largest engineering company said last week it has found about half a billion dollars in suspicious transactions spanning the past seven years -- twice the amount German authorities flagged in November after more than 200 police raided the offices and homes of employees. … Prosecutors say Mr. Kleinfeld is a witness in the fraud investigation, not a suspect. But the scandal represents the latest and biggest distraction for the 49-year-old executive. He spent much of the autumn wrestling with fallout from an ill-timed salary hike and a messy divestment that brought a barrage of criticism from unions and politicians. It also raises serious questions about oversight at the company, which books more than $100 billion in annual revenue."

Documents Highlight HP Counsel's Failure to Stop Pretexting. Law.com (12/18, Reisinger) reports, that while "little has been said" of the role of former HP counsel Ann Baskins' "role in the spying efforts" at Hewlett Packard, "an in-depth analysis of more than 1,500 pages of documents, as well as interviews with people close to the investigation, offers insights into how she let the spying probe spin out of control. … In the end, the HP scandal comes down to this: The spying probe became a runaway train. And Ann Baskins was the person in the best position to recognize the danger and stop it. But she didn't. In fact, the records show that from June 2005 to April 2006, Baskins raised legal questions about the tactics at least six times. But she never pushed for a definitive answer about whether the methods used were, in fact, lawful. Or, more importantly, whether they were unwise and dangerous to the company. In retrospect she could have, and should have, shut down the throttle on this train long before it crashed."

Study Finds Directors Received Backdated Options. The New York Times (12/18, Dash) reports, "Board members were not just blissfully ignorant or willfully blind bystanders when they backdated stock option grants for corporate executives, according to a new study. Some 1,400 outside directors themselves may have received manipulated grants over the past decade. The research, to be released today, sheds new light on the stock options manipulation that has entangled more than 120 companies in a nationwide scandal. It suggests that what has been widely seen as a dot-com phenomenon to enrich managers in the executive suite probably extended to directors in the boardroom as well. The study, sponsored by the Harvard Law School Program on Corporate Governance, also raises serious questions about corporate governance if the outside directors, who are supposed to act as a final backstop against bad practices, received — and in many cases may have even approved — fraudulent option grants."

The Washington Post (12/18, O'Hara) reports, "According to the study, 9 percent of 29,000 option grants to outside directors from 1996 to 2005 were granted on a day when the company stock price was at a monthly low. The likelihood of such a concentration of 'lucky' grants is so low as to be statistically impossible, the study's authors said. …

The study found the "lucky grants" at about 460 firms, involving about 1,400 outside directors."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Florida And California Halt Of Executions Seen As Likely to Curb Death Penalty Nationwide. USA Today (12/18, 8A, Dorell, Johnson, 2.27M) reports, "The questions over lethal injection that have led executions to be halted in Florida and California are likely to curb the use of the death penalty across the USA, according to analysts who support capital punishment and others who oppose it. However, it's unclear whether the increasing focus on whether lethal injection is unconstitutionally painful represents a significant and lasting turn against the death penalty or a temporary slowdown in executions that will end once procedures for injections are improved." Kent Scheidegger, legal director at the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a pro-death-penalty group, "calls the controversy over lethal injection — which is used in nearly all of the 38 states that have the death penalty — 'a significant but temporary setback' for capital punishment that will lead to fewer executions only until problems with injections are resolved."

Hackers Deploy "Ransomware" To Extort Money From Users. USA Today (12/18, 5B, Swartz, 2.27M) reports, "In the latest online scam, cybercrooks are breaking into the PCs of small businesses and individuals, locking up data and demanding money in return for freeing it. So-called ransomware is the latest iteration of extortion on the Internet. Typically, hackers threaten to disrupt the websites of companies with a deluge of data unless they are paid. With ransomware, however, online crooks implant malicious computer code on websites in hopes of breaking into the PCs of consumers and remotely encrypting a victim's files and photographs. The thieves demand a ransom through an online-payment service such as PayPal or e-gold."

Gonzales Says Probe Of Duke Rape Prosecutor Is Possible. On its Web site, WRAL-TV of Raleigh, NC (12/17, Charbonneau) reported, "The United States Attorney General suggested Sunday that his office might investigate the way District Attorney Mike Nifong has handled the Duke lacrosse rape case. In an interview with Fox News on Sunday, United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales confirmed he received a letter asking for a federal probe into the investigation, in which an exotic dancer claims three lacrosse players raped her at a March 13 party." NC3 Rep. Walter B. Jones (R) "sent Gonzales the letter last week asking for a federal investigation into possible prosecutorial misconduct, and specifically, to determine whether the defendants' civil rights were violated." WRAL-TV added, "Gonzales said that even though the case is a state and local matter, the federal government could still become involved 'if an investigation is conducted in such a way that civil rights laws are violated, that would be something that we might look into."

WSVN- TV (12/17, 10:00 p.m.) broadcast in Miami, "The investigation into the Duke lacrosse scandal intensifying again tonight. The North Carolina Congressman asked the US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez, who you see here, to step in. Jones wrote a letter asking if the accused lacrosse players' civil rights were being violated. The congressman also wants the attorney in charge of the case to be prosecuted for alleged misconduct of his own."

CIVIL LAW:

Start-Up Develops Copyright-Enforcement Software. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, B1, Delaney, 2.04M) reports, "To deal with the mounting copyright issues swirling around video and other content online," privately held Attributor Corp., a startup, "is taking a novel approach: combing the entire Web for unauthorized uses." The company is testing "a system to scan the billions of pages on the Web for clients' audio, video, images and text -- potentially making it easier for owners to request that Web sites take content down or provide payment for its use."

Law Affecting Video-Sharing Sites Is "Murky." The Christian Science Monitor (12/18, Wood, 59K) reports that the law on services like YouTube is "murky," and "likely to get murkier before it gets clearer, say experts in intellectual property law." The Monitor writes, "Several companies such as Time Warner have been threatening YouTube with copyright infringement lawsuits. Now that Internet giant Google has purchased YouTube, experts expect that the rampant disregard of copyright law shown by early YouTube users, at least, is likely to get resolved - but they caution that each successive new technology can put early users, in particular, on nebulous legal ground, especially if financial profit is involved." Mark McCreary, a partner at Fox

Rothschild, which handles IP cases, and other experts, say "those who watch videos at YouTube - whether or not such content is copyrighted - are unlikely to be pursued with the same fervor with which the music industry prosecuted those who downloaded music free of charge via the file-sharing website Napster."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Houston Police Face Discrimination Question In Use Of Tasers. The Washington Post (12/18, A3, Moreno) reports, "Roiled by allegations of using unjustified deadly force against Latino suspects, the Houston Police Department began using stun guns two years ago so officers could avoid pulling the trigger of an automatic weapon. Now officers are facing a new question: Are they using the high-voltage Taser -- what police call a less-than-lethal 'intermediary' weapon -- indiscriminately against black suspects? The recent arrest and use of a Taser against a black professional football player has once again put the police department of the nation's fourth-largest city under scrutiny."

Companies Apply Different Techniques To Promote Tolerance, Diversity. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, B3, Dvorak) reports on companies trying to help "leaders -- still predominantly white and male -- come to grips with an increasingly diverse work force and customer base. Experts say such efforts can be a valuable addition to traditional diversity training because they can foster a deeper understanding of unfamiliar cultures and help executives see how they are perceived. … Some companies, such as financial firm Wachovia Corp., urge executives to work with organizations representing other demographic groups." Other companies "encourage deeper immersion. Raytheon's missile-systems division in 2004 required managers to spend a day in a wheelchair in the office to better understand the concerns of disabled employees. Raytheon also asks executives to act as liaisons for employee 'affinity groups,' which bring together workers of specific races, genders, sexual orientations or religions."

National Federation Of Blind President Does Not Support Currency Lawsuit. In an op-ed appearing in the New York Times (12/18) Marc Maurer, president of the National Federation of the Blind, notes Judge James Robertson's recent ruling that US currency discriminates against the blind. He writes, "[A]as president of the National Federation of the Blind, the nation's oldest and largest organization of the blind, I believe that Judge Robertson's ruling is wrong." He adds, "[W]hile blind people cannot identify paper currency by touch, that does not prevent us from spending money. When we hand merchants our money, they take it and provide us with the goods or services we have paid for, no questions asked. People with whom we transact business provide us with correct change if needed, and we then organize the money in a manner that allows us to identify it in the future. We transact business in this way every day. … While it is crucial that minorities have a voice in society, it is also the responsibility of every minority group to use that voice wisely and not to cry "discrimination" when no discrimination has occurred. The blind of America will fight discrimination wherever we find it, but we achieve nothing by falsely portraying ourselves as victims and engaging in frivolous litigation."

Houston Chronicle Calls Administration's Currency Appeal "Mean." The Houston Chronicle (12/18) editorializes, "When it comes right down to it, there is no way to sugarcoat the Bush administration's objection to revamping the nation's paper currency to make it distinguishable to the visually impaired. It's contrary to federal law banning discrimination against the disabled in government programs. And it's downright mean. … Sight-impaired adults, like the rest of us, value their ability to live as independently as possible. According to their advocates, when it comes to distinguishing between denominations of currency, the blind use folding systems that help them distinguish, say, a $10 bill from a $20. But that only assists a person in knowing which bill to hand a clerk. A person who cannot see still has to rely on the honesty of the sales clerk to return the correct change."

ANTITRUST:

Express Scripts Prepares Offer To Stop Caremark Takeover Of CVS. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, Berman, 2.04M) reports, "Pharmacy-benefit manager Express Scripts Inc. was last night preparing a $26 billion cash and stock offer for Caremark Rx Inc., in an effort to break up the company's existing takeover deal with drug chain CVS Corp., people familiar with the matter said. An offer could be launched as early as today, these people said. It could set off a back-and-forth struggle for Caremark, of Nashville, Tenn., at a time when the company's deal with CVS was gaining credibility in the market. That transaction -- which awarded no premium to Caremark's shareholders -- initially failed to convince investors, who pushed shares in both companies downward." Express Scripts "is a far smaller company than Caremark, with a market capitalization of $9.3 billion, and debt of around $1.6 billion. The intended offer shows how the immense financings used to fund private-equity deals are also being used by corporate buyers trolling for acquisitions."

The New York Times (12/18, Sorkin) reports, "The bid by benefits manager Express Scripts for rival Caremark Rx tops a competing offer by the CVS drugstore chain in a bold move that evokes memories of the big buyout deals of the 1980s. Pharmacy benefit managers act as the middleman between drug companies and employers that offer drug subsidies to their workers as part of health-care coverage. By acquiring Caremark Rx, which is double its size, Express Scripts would by far become the largest pharmacy benefits manager in the nation."

Private Apollo Group Buys Into Real Estate Firm. The New York Times (12/18, Sorkin, De La Merced) reports, "Realogy, the giant real estate franchisor that owns Coldwell Banker, Century 21 and Sotheby's International Realty agreed yesterday to be sold to Apollo Group, the private equity firm, for about $9 billion. The deal marks the latest play by private equity firms to buy into the real estate business just as it appears to have peaked. Just two weeks ago, Blackstone Group led a $36 billion deal to acquire Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office building owner and manager, for about $36 billion, which was the biggest buyout in history. … Realogy is among the biggest players in the real estate field, taking part in a fourth of all home sales nationally. It has more than 300,000 agents among its franchises, almost three times more than its closest rival, Re/Max International. It is also a player in commercial real estate through its Coldwell Banker Commercial arm."

The Bloomberg (12/18) reports, "Although the company's takeover would allow stockholders ;to realize the value of Realogy's fundamentally strong businesses,' the purchase price 'takes into account the substantial pressures and uncertainties facing the residential real estate markets that may well continue for some time,' Chief Executive Henry R. Silverman said in a statement."

Harrah's "Poised" To Accept Private-Equity Buyout. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, A3, Sanders, Berman) reports, "Gambling giant Harrah's Entertainment Inc. yesterday was poised to accept a bid valued at roughly $16.7 billion from two private-equity firms, which are expected to retain its current management and strategy, people familiar with the matter said. If a deal with Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group is completed, Chairman and Chief Executive Gary Loveman is expected to stay at the helm of Las Vegas-based Harrah's, the world's largest casino operator by revenue. The company's plans -- including a redevelopment of its numerous properties and vast land holdings along the Las Vegas Strip -- also are expected to proceed, these people said."

Computer Chip Companies Undergo "Dealmaking Frenzy." USA Today (12/18, 1B, Kessler) reports, "Computer chip companies are in a dealmaking frenzy — gobbling up rivals or going private — as they attempt to adjust to a changing industry. Nearly $40 billion worth of deals have been announced or closed since August, and chip analysts say more are on the way. … The semiconductor industry has always been competitive. But the tech boom of the 1990s created dozens of midsize chipmakers, says semiconductor analyst John Barber at researcher Gartner."

Congress To Hold Hearings On Impact Of Airline Mergers. The Arizona Republic (12/18, Geewax) reports, "Even though the new Congress won't convene until January, key lawmakers are preparing for hearings to examine the economic impact of possible airline mergers. Many members of Congress are condemning the potential deals, while few, if any, are supporting the idea of industry consolidation. … Perhaps the most controversial of the potential acquisitions involves US Airways Group Inc.'s unsolicited $8.7 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. The two carriers have routes that overlap significantly along the East Coast, and hubs relatively near each other in the West." The Republic adds, "Concerns about a loss of competition grew dramatically last week when UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, and Continental Airlines Inc. announced they are considering a possible merger. In addition, AirTran Holdings Inc. offered to buy Midwest Air Group Inc. for about $290 million. With so many carriers now in play, the number of concerned congressmen is on the rise."

Brookings Fellows Inveigh Against Government Intervention In Airline Mergers. In a commentary appearing in the Wall Street Journal (12/18, A16, 2.04M), Robert W. Crandall and Clifford Winston, senior fellows at the Brookings Institution, write, "Almost on cue, members of Congress have responded" to potential mergers in the airline industry "with predictions that fares will rise, service will be reduced, and more mergers will surely follow. Not to appear soft on threats to competition, the Justice Department has expressed its concern that the proposed mergers raise antitrust concerns and has vowed to conduct thorough investigations." Crandall and Winston opine, "Mergers may harm consumers if they are the route to (or the root of) market power and ultimately allow the combined firm to increase consumer prices and reduce service. … But our research suggests that government efforts to address such threats do little to improve consumer welfare and sometimes actually reduce it. More importantly, government often misses fruitful opportunities to benefit consumers because it eschews market-oriented policies." They add, "Rather than attempt to combat airline mergers, government policy makers could have a much more beneficial impact on the welfare of air travelers by pursuing policies that increase competition on international and domestic routes."

National Governments' Objections Undermine European Commission's Authority Over Mergers. The Financial Times (12/18, Buck) reports, "The European Commission has regularly courted controversy by blocking mergers and takeovers. Last week, the Brussels-based regulator learnt that defending such deals can be just as hard. The Commission could only look on in frustration as Spain's Abertis and Autostrade, the Italian motorway operator, abandoned a €25bn ($33bn) merger that would have created a new pan-European infrastructure group. … Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, and Charlie McCreevy, the EU internal market commissioner, had warned Rome repeatedly to mind its own business. Both ruled that Italy's objections violated EU law and threatened to file a legal challenge - but their intervention still failed to save the deal. Worryingly for Brussels, Abertis/Autostrade is no isolated case. While cross-border mergers and takeovers in the European Union have increased during recent years, a growing number of deals face stiff opposition from governments and national regulators. To the Commission - which by law has the exclusive power to scrutinise and approve big pan-European mergers - such national meddling presents a serious challenge to its authority."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Inhofe Says Global Warming "Alarmists" Silencing Dissenters. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (12/18, A17) Oklahoma Sen. James Inhofe (R) writes, "Those who wish to quell opposing viewpoints on manmade global warming do so because of a number of inconvenient facts about both the science of climate change and the economic harm their proposed 'solutions' would cause the American people." He adds, "Despite enjoying a huge advantage in funding over skeptics, liberal special interests groups have had almost no impact in convincing policymakers to pass economically destructive climate legislation in the U.S. Now it appears those same alarmists are panicking and adopting a new agenda: to silence those who disagree with their views. I find it troubling that two of my colleagues in the Senate would join the campaign to shut down the ongoing debate on the science of global warming."

WSJournal Says "Unleashing Private Sector" Key To Lowering Air Temperatures. The Wall Street Journal (12/18) editorializes, "Climate-change activists and Democrats on Capitol Hill are gearing up to push the US to limit so-called greenhouse gases. In their telling, America must save mankind from an eco-Apocalypse by adopting the arbitrary targets popular with Europe and other Kyoto Protocol signatories. Well, let's look at results in the real world, as opposed to this Kyoto spin. Recent data show that placing artificial limits on emissions hasn't done all that much to reduce emissions, and may even be counterproductive. Contrary to caricature, the American approach offers more promise than Europe's. … If global-warming activists were as interested in lowering air temperatures as they are in expanding the role of the state, they'd understand that the key to reducing carbon emissions lies in unleashing the private sector, not capping it. That's the real lesson from the policies -- and the results -- in Europe and the US."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Marin County Sheriffs To Shift Tactics Against Marijuana Growers. The Marin (CA)

DOJ_NMG_0107010

Independent-Journal (12/18, Wolfcale) reports, "The dope growers who ripped up Marin parkland to plant acres of marijuana valued at more than $100 million this summer, then got away as authorities moved in, might not be as lucky next year. County sheriff, federal park rangers and other officials are planning a crackdown aimed at ensuring extensive growing operations don't take root again. … Marin County Sheriff Robert Doyle said deputies will coordinate plans with other Marin authorities to thwart the growers."

IMMIGRATION:

NYTimes Says Swift Raids Show Need For Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The New York Times (12/18) editorializes that to blame Swift & Company and the illegal immigrant workers arrested there in raids last week "misses the bigger picture. Swift and its workers are merely Exhibit A in an immigration system that is failing in all of its parts. It is a system that rewards illegality and pays lip service to lawfulness and order. … The Swift raids are powerful evidence that I-9's and Basic Pilot are ineffective and disingenuous, a nod to by-the-books technical lawfulness that allows a far vaster world of illegality to flourish." Meanwhile, "Immigration reform built on piecemeal enforcement — factory raids and border walls — won't solve the problem of the 12 million illegal immigrants already here. The American economy wouldn't stand the shock if the Swift raids were multiplied to levels beyond the merely symbolic. The system needs what Mr. Bush and Congress have refused to give it: a way to end the sham" through comprehensive immigration reform.

"Largely Unprotected" Northern Border Seen As Terror Risk. USA Today (12/18, 4A, Hall) reports on the northern border, along which there are "slim sections" where "anyone can drive the back roads that flow from Canada into the United States." The situation "worries local police, Border Patrol officers and members of Congress alike. Many say the USA's northern border — more than 4,000 miles of open and largely unprotected land — remains a dangerously weak link in the nation's post-9/11 effort to shore up security against terrorist attacks." Sen. Byron Dorgan says security along the border has improved since 9/11, but, "There should be no less anxiety about it." Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar notes that "new helicopters and more agents" are headed north and "disputes the notion that the Canadian border has been 'forgotten' by the Homeland Security Department."

TAX:

Facing Tax Liabilities, More Americans Abroad Renounce Citizenship. The New York Times (12/18, Carvajal) reports, "Historically, small numbers of Americans have turned in their passports every year for political and economic reasons, with the numbers reaching a high of about 2,000 during the Vietnam War in the early 1970s. But after Congress sharply raised taxes this year for many Americans living abroad, some international tax lawyers say they detect rising demand from citizens to renounce ties with the United States, the only developed country that taxes it citizens while they live overseas. Americans abroad are also taxed in the countries where they live."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Myers Likely To Face "Tough Fight" If Renominated To 9th Circuit. The AP (12/18, Wittmeyer) reports, "If President George W. Bush renominates a controversial Republican Idaho lawyer for a seat on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, he's going to have a tough fight ahead of him, Senate leaders say. The nomination of Boise lawyer William Gerry Myers III, which has been stalled in the Senate for three years, may have almost reached an end. Now that Democrats have control of Congress, a consensus has formed on Capitol Hill that Myers -- who has stirred up some of the fiercest Democratic opposition of all Bush's judicial nominees -- has almost no chance of getting through."

Pro-Environment Shift In Congress Under Democrats No Sure Thing. The Los Angeles Times (12/18, Simon) writes that while "environmentalists are busy these days crafting their holiday wish-list, giddy about the prospects for success in the new Democratic-controlled Congress," industry groups "are gearing up to fight, and their forces may include more than the usual Republican allies." The Times says "the politics surrounding environmental issues have proved hard to predict, largely because the potential economic impact of stronger regulation tends to scramble partisan loyalties. Democrats from auto-making states, for example, have fought efforts to mandate stricter miles-per-gallon rules for vehicles. These crosscurrents could cause the push for an aggressive environmental agenda to become an object lesson on the limits of what can actually be achieved in the Congress that will convene in January."

NYTimes Says Democrats Must Keep Promise On Ethics Reform. The New York Times (12/18, A28) editorializes, "The Democrats promised sweeping ethics reform in this year's campaign, and now they have control of Congress. But procrastination is a legendary Capitol vice, and there are worrisome signs that the Democrats may already be indulging. … Rather than committing wholeheartedly" to the need for an independent, nonpartisan ethics body, incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "is opting to create a bipartisan task force to study the issue and report back by mid-March." Pelosi and incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "should keep foremost in mind the voters' anticipation of a cleaner, more quickly responsive Congress."

Federal Employees Unions Have High Hopes For Democratic Congress. The Washington Post (12/18, A23, Goldfarb) reports that "unions that represent most federal employees" have argued since 2001 that the Bush Administration "has been hostile to the needs of workers -- keeping pay raises low, trying to prevent employees from organizing in the departments of Defense and Homeland Security, and outsourcing government jobs to the private sector. Now, the change in control of Congress gives unions much more powerful allies in the legislative branch." American Federation of Government Employees National President John Gage said, "We're hoping not only we'll have more access to committees and Congress, but that word will get down to the political appointees in the departments."

NYTimes Says GOP To Blame For Appropriations Stalemate. The New York Times (12/18, A28) editorializes that "under normal circumstances," for Congress to decide to operate "under old budgets would be a dereliction of lawmakers' duty to weigh needs and resources, and spend tax dollars accordingly. But the current situation is hardly normal. The departing Republican-led Congress was supposed to nail down the government's spending plans for 2007 before it adjourned, but it neglected to do so. … During the lame duck session, they did not even try to complete the spending bills -- a crass attempt to force the new Democratic majority to expend time and energy cleaning up the mess. By choosing to operate much of next year's government at the 2006 level, the Democrats avoid that trap. But solving the political problem creates some practical ones. President Bush, for example, will have to step up during the year to ask for more money as needed."

OTHER NEWS:

Rumors Suggest Zelikow Forced Out Over Policy, Leaked Memos. The Washington Post's (12/18, A23) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "the rumors at Foggy Bottom were that counselor Philip Zelikow, who had been advising his close friend of many years, Condoleezza Rice, on Iraq and other matters, was eased out last month because he wasn't on the same page with the administration." Some insiders felt there were "suspicious leaks of his internal memos -- taking issue with administration policy on Iraq and the Middle East -- in books and articles, culminating with one at the end of November in the New York Times that was headlined: 'Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want to Hear.' That one was called the last straw."

WPost Says Maryland Justice System Needs "Thorough Examination." In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/18, A24) examines the "appalling details" of the case of Lawrence Banks, who spent "nine years, four months and 18 days…in a Maryland prison for murdering two people, one of whom was his 17-year-old son." Banks "is now a figure in a new double-murder investigation -- raise troubling questions about Maryland's justice system. … This was a botched case, and it raises new questions in Maryland's long-running debate over truth in sentencing. … It is time for a thorough examination of the system."

Justice Stevens Says Flag-Burning Amendment Not Needed. The Washington Post/AP (12/18, A23) reports Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens, who "twice voted to outlaw burning the U.S. flag," now says there is "no need to amend the Constitution to protect Old Glory." In a September address to the Chicago Bar Association that recently aired on C-SPAN, Stevens said the court's two 5-4 flag burning rulings "seem to have solved the problem because no one burns flags anymore."

Internet Changed Campaign Fundraising Strategies In 2006. USA Today (12/18, 6A, Schouten) writes that "this year's midterm elections offered fresh examples of the ways the Internet is changing how candidates in both parties raise money as they scramble to collect the $20, $30 and $50 donations needed in the aftermath of changes to campaign-finance laws in 2002 that banned large donations." Online fundraising "has proved a cost-effective and lightning-fast method to raise cash, rally the faithful and promote or smear office seekers," and "could transform fundraising in presidential races."

Today's Events In Washington 12

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 13

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Sent Home 33 Guantanamo Detainees Last Week. The Washington Post (12/18, A19, White) reports 33 Guantanamo Bay detainees "were returned to their home countries over the past week, part of a government effort to reduce the facility's population to a core group of terrorism suspects who could be held indefinitely." On Sunday, the Pentagon said it "transferred 17 detainees to their home countries over the weekend: seven to Afghanistan, five to Yemen, three to Kazakhstan, one to Libya and one to Bangladesh. Military officials announced Thursday that 16 detainees were sent to Saudi Arabia last week." With their departure, "Guantanamo now holds about 395 detainees, almost none of whom have been charged with a crime."

Difficulties Have Kept Even "Easy" Guantanamo Cases From Going To Trial. In a front-page story running nearly 3,000 words, the Wall Street Journal (12/18, Bravin) writes that even "'easy' cases have lingered" at Guantanamo because of difficulties with intelligence-sharing, the fact that witnesses are "scattered across the globe," and defense attorney challenges that have "paralyzed proceedings. … Such challenges help explain why the Bush administration failed to complete a single Guantánamo trial in the five years before the Supreme Court struck the system down in June."

Military Rehearsing For Detainee Hearings. The AP (12/17, Melia) reports the US military "is rehearsing for hearings on whether 14 top terror suspects can be held indefinitely without charge as enemy combatants, but defense lawyers say the outcome is preordained." Khalid Sheikh Mohammed "and the 13 others will be the highest-profile detainees to undergo the so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, and the first to do so in two years."

LATimes Says Writ Of Habeas Corpus Must Be Protected. The Los Angeles Times (12/18) editorializes that as outgoing Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter "points out, the Constitution allows for the suspension" of the writ of habeas corpus "only in times of invasion or rebellion, and 'we are suffering neither of those alternatives at the present time.' Habeas protection for enemy combatants -- not just those at Guantanamo but other aliens who might be detained in the future -- is not just a legal nicety. Without such protection, real injustices could be suffered by flesh-and-blood individuals."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DOJ, ACLU Battle Over War On Terror's "Information Front." The Christian Science Monitor (12/18, Marks) writes about "the latest battle in one key arena of the Bush administration's war on terror -- the information front." Both civil libertarians at the ACLU and attorneys at the Justice Department "agree that nothing less than the nature of American society is at stake, although each side sees different threats. The administration says the danger comes from technically savvy terrorists who are out to exploit the nation's open society in order to undermine it. Critics contend that the real peril comes from the administration itself, which, they charge, is abusing the classification system to shield its activities from public scrutiny, thus undermining the workings of democracy."

Hentoff Condemns Guantanamo Hearings. In his column appearing in the Village Voice (12/18), Nat Hentoff writes, "During the mutual-admiration hearing before the Senate Committee on Armed Services—which led to the unanimous confirmation of former CIA chief Robert Gates to be Donald Rumsfeld's successor—no senator asked Gates if he approves of the Pentagon's 'extreme . . . emergency' insistence on a $125 million appropriation to construct a permanent compound for a war-crimes court at Guantánamo" slated for war-crimes trials for Guantanamo detainees. Hentoff writes, "Unlike the Nuremberg war-crimes trials of the Nazis, there will be no government officials in the dock, but rather—as detailed in my last column—prisoners against whom the United States has itself committed war crimes under the Geneva Conventions and our own War Crimes act." Hentoff adds, "Our rampant lawlessness during the past four years at Guantánamo has long been "controversial" in the international press and among human rights groups. But the extent and depth of our abuse of these prisoners—resulting in a number of desperation suicides—have been illuminated with damning clarity in a series of reports by New Jersey's Seton Hall University School of Law."

WAR NEWS:

Powell Says US Losing In Iraq, Sounds Skeptical Note About Troop Surge. The Iraq war continued to dominate media coverage on Sunday. In particular, former Secretary of State Colin Powell's appearance on CBS' Face the Nation (12/17, Schieffer) generated a lot of coverage, much of it negative toward the Bush Administration. NBC Nightly News (12/17, story 2, 2:50, Seigenthaler) said that as President Bush considers "his options…on a change of course for Iraq," there was "a sobering view from his former Secretary of State, who says US forces are losing." NBC (Corke) added, "Usually a good soldier doesn't complain in public, but today, General Colin Powell, the man the Administration tapped to help bolster its case for the war in Iraq, says that America was less safe than when the war began. In his most extensive public comments about the war, former Secretary of State Colin Powell today offered a damning assessment." Powell was shown saying, "It's grave and deteriorating and we're not winning, we are losing. … I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purpose of suppressing this communitarian violence or civil war will work." The general also "said the war was still winnable, but he also seemed to criticize outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld for not sending in more troops after the fall of Saddam Hussein." The Washington Times (12/18, Pfeiffer) notes Powell, "whose so-called Powell Doctrine calls for the use of overwhelming force in military conflicts, said he thinks force levels should have been increased after the fall of Saddam Hussein in order to fill the security vacuum that led to the Iraq insurgency."

ABC World News (12/17, story 2, 2:35, Morrell) also reported Powell gave a "blunt assessment of the plan to send thousands more troops into Iraq: It will not work." Powell was shown saying, "There needs to be a clear mission that these additional troops are going to be performing. Is it to secure Baghdad? In which case the American Army isn't large enough to secure Baghdad. And we should not use our troops as policemen." USA Today (12/18, 10A, Slavin) quotes Powell saying the US Army "is about broken" and "could not support sending a significant increase of soldiers to Iraq. 'That surge cannot be sustained,'" he said. The New York Times (12/18, Johnston) runs a similar piece titled "Powell Doubts Need To Raise Troop Levels."

Powell also disagreed with the Administration on whether Iraq is in the middle of a civil war. He said on CBS' Face The Nation (12/17, Schieffer), said, "It seemed to me that this looks like a civil war and we ought to call it that." And backing much of what was proposed by the Iraq study group, Powell went on to say, "I think you have to talk to a country like Syria. It's a little discordant to see that we're not talking to them. … Iran is a little difficult. … But at the same time, I think that low-level conversations of the kind we had earlier might give us some channels of communication. Now, I have no illusions that either Syria or Iran want to help us in Iraq. I am also quite confident that what is happening in Iraq is self-generated for the most part. … Do they get marginal support and some support from Iran and Syria? You bet they do. … But at the same time, I've looked down on many people over the years, in the course of my military and diplomatic career, and I still had to talk to them."

Powell added that "ultimately…the Iraqis are the key to the solution. … The number one priority has to be working with the Iraqi government and their strategy, provide security for the people of Baghdad initially. That's the center of gravity. But I think ultimately, with our help, it has to be done by the Iraqis. They're the ones who have to solve this internecine civil war, communitarian conflict that they're in."

The Washington Post (12/18, A20, Deyoung) reports, "During Bush's first term, Powell was often on the losing side of disagreements with then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Vice President Cheney and the president over a range of foreign policy issues, including the Arab-Israeli peace process, North Korea and Iraq." Although "he ultimately supported the 2003 invasion of Iraq -- and played a major role in building public backing for war when he delivered a UN Security Council speech saying Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction -- he objected to the administration's detention and interrogation policies for 'enemy combatants' and privately questioned the lack of planning and troop strength for postwar Iraq." Powell's "low-key departure from office in January 2005, after Bush's request for his resignation, stood in contrast to Friday's ceremonial farewell to Rumsfeld, whose retirement festivities at the Pentagon were attended by Bush and Cheney." Asked "whether he agreed with Cheney's assessment that Rumsfeld was 'the finest defense secretary this nation has ever had,' Powell demurred. 'Well, that's the vice president's judgment,' he said. 'I've known many fine secretaries of defense. ... But it's history that will judge the performance of all of us in this troubling time...and it is a history that I think will ultimately be written as a result of what happens in Iraq.'"

Democrats Split On Temporary Troop Increase. NBC Nightly News (12/17, story 2, 2:50, Corke) reported Bush is considering "increasing the number of troops by 20,000 or more to get the violence under control. Underscoring the divisive nature of the debate, leading Democrats are at odds over what is the next best course of action." Sen. Edward Kennedy: "I have been convinced by the generals and the commanders in Iraq that have made a convincing case that they feel that just adding more troops is going to delay the decision making by the Iraqi government."

But "incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said the idea is worth trying." Sen. Harry Reid: "If there were some plan to send in some more troops for a very, very short period of time in an effort to get us out of there by the beginning of 2008 as the Iraq Study Group suggested, then I would go along with it."

Reid was asked on ABC's This Week (12/17, Stephanopoulos) if he would support the deployment of additional troops to Iraq. Reid said, "If it's for a surge, that is, for two or three months and it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year, then, sure, I'll go along with it."

The AP (12/18) reports "likely presidential hopeful Sen. Joe Biden said Sunday that he opposes sending additional troops to Iraq, even as the idea seemed to gain support from the Senate's leading Democrat, incoming majority leader Harry Reid. 'I will not to support a surge of troops unless it's tied to some reason for me to believe that they have a political solution,' said Biden, incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee."

Asked on CNN's Late Edition (12/17, Blitzer) about additional troops, Sen. Jack Reed said, "What is the mission of these new troops? Are they going to go take on these sectarian militias? Are they going to simply augment troops that are on the ground today? This is a city of six million people. It will require a huge number of security forces, not just another 15,000. My sense is that this is more of a political gesture."

Asked on Fox News Sunday (12/17, Wallace) about additional troops, Sen. Edward Kennedy said, "I don't believe that would stabilize the country, nor do I think it'll bring victory. … What is absolutely necessary is a political resolution and determination by the Iraqi government." Democrats' "commitment is to the troops, so they're not getting caught in a crossfire and a civil war, which they are."

Rep.-elect Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral described by ABC This Week (12/17) host George Stephanopoulos as "the highest-ranking military officer ever elected to the House," said on Stephanopoulos' show, "In Iraq, we're on the road to nowhere. Putting more troops on that road is not in the interest of the United States. We have moved troops from Anbar into Baghdad before. There was not only no dent in violence, it's actually increased. We doubled our forces in Baghdad. If we double and triple those forces, what we're doing is merely putting a Band-Aid out there."

More Commentary On New US Strategy. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/18), Major Ben Connable writes, "What will become of Iraqi villages, towns and cities as we pull out? Although past is not necessarily prologue, recent experience in Anbar Province may be instructive. American units have already withdrawn from the western Euphrates River valley — twice, in fact. ... The consequences were immediate and bloody. Insurgents assumed control of several towns and villages. They tortured and executed police officers, local politicians, friendly tribal leaders and informants. They murdered contractors who had worked with the Americans or the Iraqi government." Connable predicts of a US departure, "Insurgents of all stripes would make the most of the combined American and Iraqi withdrawal, harassing the departing convoys with homemade bombs and small-arms fire. Videos of insurgents dancing in the streets would become prevalent on the Internet and international television."

Retired Army Lt. Gen. Dan Christman said on CNN's Late Edition (12/17, Blitzer) that Bush "needs obviously to change strategy, in my judgment. I think he's on the path to doing that, as a result of the Iraq Study Group -- a change in strategy, essentially moving from a direct ground combat role into a long-term training establishment for the Iraqi military."

Clinton White House Chief of Staff John Podesta said on CNN's Late Edition (12/17, Blitzer), "The Iraq Study Group put it right. It's grave and deteriorating. And I think we're on a downhill slide in Iraq, and I think that until the President changes his strategy and changes his course, we're going to continue on that downhill slide, and the chaos will continue."

Kevin Ryan, a retired Army brigadier general, is a senior fellow at the Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government, writes in the Washington Post (12/18, A25), "The stage has been set for a serious discussion about the appropriate size for our Army: a discussion that should balance resources with demands. … The lack of ground forces has an impact beyond the ability to commit more troops to Iraq. Our published defense strategy requires a military that can defend our homeland, sustain two major wars, be present in key regions abroad and fight a global war on terrorism. With Marine and Army ground forces barely large enough to fight the two major wars, the other security tasks are left to flyovers and ship visits from our Air Force and Navy." Ryan adds, 'Throughout the 1980s we recruited an Army of more than 750,000 entirely from volunteers: the same Army that won the Persian Gulf War. It will take several years to recruit additional troops and build the organizations and facilities to house them, but these numbers are well within our reach."

Newt Gingrich said on NBC's Meet The Press (12/17, Russert), "The war's a failure in part because the strategy…has been wrong consistently, it's been a strategy that was far too American. Second, it's a failure because the instruments of national power don't work. … I think the Administration shouldn't just focus narrowly on Iraq. They should look, first of all, at the larger war, which does include Iran, it does include North Korea, it does include al-Qaeda. And they should look second at what are the strategic changes necessary to win in Iraq."

Dozens Of Aid Workers Kidnapped In Iraq. NBC Nightly News (12/17, story 3, 2:45, Seigenthaler) reported, "In Baghdad…there was more violence. Insurgents kidnapped dozens of Iraqis. Another example of the obstacles facing US and Iraqi forces." NBC (Maceda) added, "Not even the offices of the Iraqi Red Crescent are safe. Gunmen wearing Iraqi uniforms abducted dozens of aid workers and guards. This, the sixth mass kidnapping in Baghdad this year, targeting either Sunnis or Shi'ites. It happened on the final day of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's much time-touted national reconciliation conference which US tells NBC News provided good speeches but no breakthroughs to end the bloodshed."

The AP (12/18, Torchia) reports, "Pierre Kraehenbuehl, director of operations of the International Committee of the Red Cross, said in Geneva that seven abductees were released. The Dutch Foreign Ministry said three Iraqi security guards at its embassy building in Baghdad -- adjacent to the Red Crescent offices -- were also kidnapped, but were later released." The Red Crescent, "which is part of the international Red Cross movement, has around 1,000 staff and some 200,000 volunteers in Iraq. It works closely with the International Committee of the Red Cross, which visits detainees and tries to provide food, water and medicine to Iraqis." The Los Angeles Times (12/18, Hennessy-Fiske) and Washington Post (12/18, A20, Raghavan, Trejos), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

Field Commanders Lack Good Intelligence On Insurgents. The Washington Times (12/18, Scarborough) reports, "The chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence says he has traveled to Iraq eight times to assess US intelligence collection, and each time he returns to Washington struck by the lack of knowledge about the insurgency that is killing hundreds of American troops. 'When I come back from Iraq, or even a briefing here, you learn how tough intelligence is,' said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican. 'I don't walk out of there believing that I've got a crystal-clear picture of what the insurgency is, what the scope of it is, what the magnitude is, what the capabilities are. How much is international? How much is external? How much is al Qaeda? How much is Iranian? How much is Syrian? I walk out with lots of unanswered questions.'" The Times adds, "The fact that US command lacks broad knowledge about the enemy in Iraq, in the opinion of Mr. Hoekstra and others, has brought a steady stream of criticism. … Defense sources have told The Washington Times that when field commanders return to the US from Iraq, one of their chief complaints is a lack on information about the enemy."

Blair Visits Iraq, Offers Support To Maliki Government. The AP (12/18, Lawless) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair took his Middle East peace tour to Iraq on Sunday, urging support for its fragile government and seeking to draw the violence-wracked country into his vision of a global battle against extremism. Standing in front of a Lynx helicopter in a cavernous hangar, Blair told some of the 7,000 British troops serving in southern Iraq they were fighting on behalf of 'people of tolerance and moderation' around the world."

Iraqi VP Says Sunnis Endangered By "Ethnic Cleansing." The Financial Times (12/18, Dinsmore) reports, "Vice-president Tariq al-Hashimi, Iraq's most senior politician from the Sunni Arab minority, said on Sunday that more US troops were needed in Baghdad to stop the 'systematic cleansing' of the Sunni community by Shia militias. Some 3,000 Iraqis were fleeing the country daily and Iraqi forces were insufficient, incompetent and corrupted, he said [on CNN]." Hashimi also "said there was 'no consensus' between the US and Iraq on how to tackle security." Colin Powell's doubts about the effectiveness of a troop surge are also quoted by the FT.

Saudis Claim Iran Has Created Shiite "State Within A State" In Iraq. The Washington Times (12/18, Behn) reports, "Iran has effectively created a Shi'ite 'state within a state' in neighboring Iraq, defying both Iraqi Sunnis and neighboring Sunni nations, according to a Saudi security report." Iranian forces "are providing Shi'ite militias with weapons and training, Iranian charities are pouring funds into schools and hospitals, and Tehran is actively supporting pro-Iranian Iraqi politicians, the report said." The study, which "has not been publicly distributed," "states that the Sunni insurgency numbers about 77,000, while the Shi'ite militia forces total about 35,000." CFR analyst Isobel Coleman "cautions that the report, while not necessarily inaccurate, is not impartial," while RAND analyst Ed O'Connell "said the Iranian intelligence was trying to counter Saddam Hussein's former formidable spy network, Iraqi Intelligence Service (IIS), or the Mukhabarat."

Special Forces Missions Said To Clash With CIA, Upset Allies. The Los Angeles Times (12/18, Miller) reports senior intelligence and military officials say Special Forces teams "sent overseas on secret spying missions have clashed with the CIA and carried out operations in countries that are staunch US allies, prompting a new effort by the agency and the Pentagon to tighten the rules for military units engaged in espionage." The missions "are part of a highly classified program that officials say has better positioned the United States to track terrorist networks and capture or kill enemy operatives in regions such as the Horn of Africa, where weak governments are unable to respond to emerging threats." But they have "also led to several embarrassing incidents" for the US, and some intelligence officials say the teams "have sometimes launched missions without informing the CIA, duplicating or even jeopardizing existing operations."

France Pulling 200 Special Forces Out Of Afghanistan. The New York Times (12/18, A10) and the Washington Post (12/18, A18) both carry versions of an AP report that France will withdraw approximately 200 special forces from Jalalabad, Afghanistan. A contingent of 1,100 French troops deployed under NATO command will remain in Kabul.

NATO's Increased Use Of Air Power Undermining Support Among Afghanis. The Christian Science Monitor (12/18, Morarjee) reports that "with so few boots on the ground," NATO is increasingly relying on air power in Afghanistan, which "has led to thousands of civilian deaths. The devastating air offenses are undermining support for the Afghan government, say human rights workers and Afghan officials, and are turning public opinion in the four southern provinces of Afghanistan against NATO forces, who took command of the south from the US in August."

Republicans Worry About Potential Ideological Shift In Fourth Circuit. The Washington Post (12/18, A1, Markon, Shear, 690K) reports, "A number of prominent Republican appointees have left or announced plans to leave the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which has played a key role in terrorism cases and has long been known for forceful conservative rulings and judicial personalities." This "growing list of vacancies" is "heightening concern among Republicans that one of the nation's most conservative and influential courts could soon come under moderate or even liberal control, Republicans and legal scholars say." The Post adds, "Republican concerns also are fueled by the pending Democratic takeover of Congress, as several of President Bush's 4th Circuit nominees were already bottled up in the Senate when Republicans ran it. From the GOP's perspective, the situation now will worsen."

New E-Mail Discovery Rules Noted. The Miami Herald (12/18, Meeks, 286K) reports, "If your business is sued for copyright infringement, restraint of trade or employment discrimination, having a means in place to track electronic data is critical to successfully defending the case. Otherwise, you're likely to lose -- and pay hefty damages -- even before stepping into a federal courtroom. … Under the new rules, both parties in a lawsuit must disclose their electronically stored information, along with any other materials they plan to use to prove their cases. … Small-business owners can no longer use the excuse that they have not been able to go through their e-mail archives in time for the initial disclosures."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Investigation Derails Siemens Reorganization. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, A1, Esterl) reports, "When turnaround artist Klaus Kleinfeld became chief executive of storied German conglomerate Siemens AG in early 2005, he vowed to shake things up. Nearly two years later, Mr. Kleinfeld finds himself under intense pressure, haunted by his company's past. A widening money-laundering and bribery investigation is shining a harsh spotlight on management and threatening to unravel his aggressive restructuring drive. Europe's largest engineering company said last week it has found about half a billion dollars in suspicious transactions spanning the past seven years -- twice the amount German authorities flagged in November after more than 200 police raided the offices and homes of employees. … Prosecutors say Mr. Kleinfeld is a witness in the fraud investigation, not a suspect. But the scandal represents the latest and biggest distraction for the 49-year-old executive. He spent much of the autumn wrestling with fallout from an ill-timed salary hike and a messy divestment that brought a barrage of criticism from unions and politicians. It also raises serious questions about oversight at the company, which books more than $100 billion in annual revenue."

Documents Highlight HP Counsel's Failure to Stop Pretexting. Law.com (12/18, Reisinger) reports, that while "little has been said" of the role of former HP counsel Ann Baskins' "role in the spying efforts" at Hewlett Packard, "an in-depth analysis of more than 1,500 pages of documents, as well as interviews with people close to the investigation, offers insights into how she let the spying probe spin out of control. … In the end, the HP scandal comes down to this: The spying probe became a runaway train. And Ann Baskins was the person in the best position to recognize the danger and stop it. But she didn't. In fact, the records show that from June 2005 to April 2006, Baskins raised legal questions about the tactics at least six times. But she never pushed for a definitive answer about whether the methods used were, in fact, lawful. Or, more importantly, whether they were unwise and dangerous to the company. In retrospect she could have, and should have, shut down the throttle on this train long before it crashed."

Study Finds Directors Received Backdated Options. The New York Times (12/18, Dash) reports, "Board members were not just blissfully ignorant or willfully blind bystanders when they backdated stock option grants for corporate executives, according to a new study. Some 1,400 outside directors themselves may have received manipulated grants over the past decade. The research, to be released today, sheds new light on the stock options manipulation that has entangled more than 120 companies in a nationwide scandal. It suggests that what has been widely seen as a dot-com phenomenon to enrich managers in the executive suite probably extended to directors in the boardroom as well. The study, sponsored by the Harvard Law School Program on Corporate Governance, also raises serious questions about corporate governance if the outside directors, who are supposed to act as a final backstop against bad practices, received — and in many cases may have even approved — fraudulent option grants."

The Washington Post (12/18, O'Hara) reports, "According to the study, 9 percent of 29,000 option grants to outside directors from 1996 to 2005 were granted on a day when the company stock price was at a monthly low. The likelihood of such a concentration of 'lucky' grants is so low as to be statistically impossible, the study's authors said. … The study found the "lucky grants" at about 460 firms, involving about 1,400 outside directors."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Florida And California Halt Of Executions Seen As Likely to Curb Death Penalty Nationwide. USA Today (12/18, 8A, Dorell, Johnson, 2.27M) reports, "The questions over lethal injection that have led executions to be halted in Florida and California are likely to curb the use of the death penalty across the USA, according to analysts who support capital punishment and others who oppose it. However, it's unclear whether the increasing focus on whether lethal injection is unconstitutionally painful represents a significant and lasting turn against the death penalty or a temporary slowdown in executions that will end once procedures for injections are improved." Kent Scheidegger, legal director at the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, a pro-death-penalty group, "calls the controversy over lethal injection — which is used in nearly all of the 38 states that have the death penalty — 'a significant but temporary setback' for capital punishment that will lead to fewer executions only until problems with injections are resolved."

Hackers Deploy "Ransomware" To Extort Money From Users. USA Today (12/18, 5B, Swartz, 2.27M) reports, "In the latest online scam, cybercrooks are breaking into the PCs of small businesses and individuals, locking up data and demanding money in return for freeing it. So-called ransomware is the latest iteration of extortion on the Internet. Typically, hackers threaten to disrupt the websites of companies with a deluge of data unless they are paid. With ransomware, however, online crooks implant malicious computer code on websites in hopes of breaking into the PCs of consumers and remotely encrypting a victim's files and photographs. The thieves demand a ransom through an online-payment service such as PayPal or e-gold."

Gonzales Says Probe Of Duke Rape Prosecutor Is Possible. On its Web site, WRAL-TV of Raleigh, NC (12/17, Charbonneau) reported, "The United States Attorney General suggested Sunday that his office might investigate the way District Attorney Mike Nifong has handled the Duke lacrosse rape case. In an interview with Fox News on Sunday, United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales confirmed he received a letter asking for a federal probe into the investigation, in which an exotic dancer claims three lacrosse players raped her at a March 13 party." NC3 Rep. Walter B. Jones (R) "sent Gonzales the letter last week asking for a federal investigation into possible prosecutorial misconduct, and specifically, to determine whether the defendants' civil rights were violated." WRAL-TV added, "Gonzales said that even though the case is a state and local matter, the federal government could still become involved 'if an investigation is conducted in such a way that civil rights laws are violated, that would be something that we might look into."

WSVN- TV (12/17, 10:00 p.m.) broadcast in Miami, "The investigation into the Duke lacrosse scandal intensifying again tonight. The North Carolina Congressman asked the US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez, who you see here, to step in. Jones wrote a letter asking if the accused lacrosse players' civil rights were being violated. The congressman also wants the attorney in charge of the case to be prosecuted for alleged misconduct of his own."

CIVIL LAW:

Start-Up Develops Copyright-Enforcement Software. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, B1, Delaney, 2.04M) reports, "To deal with the mounting copyright issues swirling around video and other content online," privately held Attributor Corp., a startup, "is taking a novel approach: combing the entire Web for unauthorized uses." The company is testing "a system to scan the billions of pages on the Web for clients' audio, video, images and text -- potentially making it easier for owners to request that Web sites take content down or provide payment for its use."

Law Affecting Video-Sharing Sites Is "Murky." The Christian Science Monitor (12/18, Wood, 59K) reports that the law on services like YouTube is "murky," and "likely to get murkier before it gets clearer, say experts in intellectual property law." The Monitor writes, "Several companies such as Time Warner have been threatening YouTube with copyright infringement lawsuits. Now that Internet giant Google has purchased YouTube, experts expect that the rampant disregard of copyright law shown by early YouTube users, at least, is likely to get resolved - but they caution that each successive new technology can put early users, in particular, on nebulous legal ground, especially if financial profit is involved." Mark McCreary, a partner at Fox Rothschild, which handles IP cases, and other experts, say "those who watch videos at YouTube - whether or not such content is copyrighted - are unlikely to be pursued with the same fervor with which the music industry prosecuted those who downloaded music free of charge via the file-sharing website Napster."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Houston Police Face Discrimination Question In Use Of Tasers. The Washington Post (12/18, A3, Moreno) reports, "Roiled by allegations of using unjustified deadly force against Latino suspects, the Houston Police Department began using stun guns two years ago so officers could avoid pulling the trigger of an automatic weapon. Now officers are facing a new question: Are they using the high-voltage Taser -- what police call a less-than-lethal 'intermediary' weapon -- indiscriminately against black suspects? The recent arrest and use of a Taser against a black professional football player has once again put the police department of the nation's fourth-largest city under scrutiny."

Companies Apply Different Techniques To Promote Tolerance, Diversity. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, B3, Dvorak) reports on companies trying to help "leaders -- still predominantly white and male -- come to grips with an increasingly diverse work force and customer base. Experts say such efforts can be a valuable addition to traditional diversity training because they can foster a deeper understanding of unfamiliar cultures and help executives see how they are perceived. … Some companies, such as financial firm Wachovia Corp., urge executives to work with organizations representing other demographic groups." Other companies "encourage deeper immersion. Raytheon's missile-systems division in 2004 required managers to spend a day in a wheelchair in the office to better understand the concerns of disabled employees. Raytheon also asks executives to act as liaisons for employee 'affinity groups,' which bring together workers of specific races, genders, sexual orientations or religions."

National Federation Of Blind President Does Not Support Currency Lawsuit. In an op-ed appearing in the New York Times (12/18) Marc Maurer, president of the National Federation of the Blind, notes Judge James Robertson's recent ruling that US currency discriminates against the blind. He writes, "[A]as president of the National Federation of the Blind, the nation's oldest and largest organization of the blind, I believe that Judge Robertson's ruling is wrong." He adds, "[W]hile blind people cannot identify paper currency by touch, that does not prevent us from spending money. When we hand merchants our money, they take it and provide us with the goods or services we have paid for, no questions asked. People with whom we transact business provide us with correct change if needed, and we then organize the money in a manner that allows us to identify it in the future. We transact business in this way every day. … While it is crucial that minorities have a voice in society, it is also the responsibility of every minority group to use that voice wisely and not to cry "discrimination" when no discrimination has occurred. The blind of America will fight discrimination wherever we find it, but we achieve nothing by falsely portraying ourselves as victims and engaging in frivolous litigation."

Houston Chronicle Calls Administration's Currency Appeal "Mean." The Houston Chronicle (12/18) editorializes, "When it comes right down to it, there is no way to sugarcoat the Bush administration's objection to revamping the nation's paper currency to make it distinguishable to the visually impaired. It's contrary to federal law banning discrimination against the disabled in government programs. And it's downright mean. … Sight-impaired adults, like the rest of us, value their ability to live as independently as possible. According to their advocates, when it comes to distinguishing between denominations of currency, the blind use folding systems that help them distinguish, say, a $10 bill from a $20. But that only assists a person in knowing which bill to hand a clerk. A person who cannot see still has to rely on the honesty of the sales clerk to return the correct change."

Express Scripts Prepares Offer To Stop Caremark Takeover Of CVS. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, Berman, 2.04M) reports, "Pharmacy-benefit manager Express Scripts Inc. was last night preparing a $26 billion cash and stock offer for Caremark Rx Inc., in an effort to break up the company's existing takeover deal with drug chain CVS Corp., people familiar with the matter said. An offer could be launched as early as today, these people said. It could set off a back-and-forth struggle for Caremark, of Nashville, Tenn., at a time when the company's deal with CVS was gaining credibility in the market. That transaction -- which awarded no premium to Caremark's shareholders -- initially failed to convince investors, who pushed shares in both companies downward." Express Scripts "is a far smaller company than Caremark, with a market capitalization of $9.3 billion, and debt of around $1.6 billion. The intended offer shows how the immense financings used to fund private-equity deals are also being used by corporate buyers trolling for acquisitions."

The New York Times (12/18, Sorkin) reports, "The bid by benefits manager Express Scripts for rival Caremark Rx tops a competing offer by the CVS drugstore chain in a bold move that evokes memories of the big buyout deals of the 1980s. Pharmacy benefit managers act as the middleman between drug companies and employers that offer drug subsidies to their workers as part of health-care coverage. By acquiring Caremark Rx, which is double its size, Express Scripts would by far become the largest pharmacy benefits manager in the nation."

Private Apollo Group Buys Into Real Estate Firm. The New York Times (12/18, Sorkin, De La Merced) reports, "Realogy, the giant real estate franchisor that owns Coldwell Banker, Century 21 and Sotheby's International Realty agreed yesterday to be sold to Apollo Group, the private equity firm, for about $9 billion. The deal marks the latest play by private equity firms to buy into the real estate business just as it appears to have peaked. Just two weeks ago, Blackstone Group led a $36 billion deal to acquire Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office building owner and manager, for about $36 billion, which was the biggest buyout in history. … Realogy is among the biggest players in the real estate field, taking part in a fourth of all home sales nationally. It has more than 300,000 agents among its franchises, almost three times more than its closest rival, Re/Max International. It is also a player in commercial real estate through its Coldwell Banker Commercial arm."

The Bloomberg (12/18) reports, "Although the company's takeover would allow stockholders ;to realize the value of Realogy's fundamentally strong businesses,' the purchase price 'takes into account the substantial pressures and uncertainties facing the residential real estate markets that may well continue for some time,' Chief Executive Henry R. Silverman said in a statement."

Harrah's "Poised" To Accept Private-Equity Buyout. The Wall Street Journal (12/18, A3, Sanders, Berman) reports, "Gambling giant Harrah's Entertainment Inc. yesterday was poised to accept a bid valued at roughly $16.7 billion from two private-equity firms, which are expected to retain its current management and strategy, people familiar with the matter said. If a deal with Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group is completed, Chairman and Chief Executive Gary Loveman is expected to stay at the helm of Las Vegas-based Harrah's, the world's largest casino operator by revenue. The company's plans -- including a redevelopment of its numerous properties and vast land holdings along the Las Vegas Strip -- also are expected to proceed, these people said."

Computer Chip Companies Undergo "Dealmaking Frenzy." USA Today (12/18, 1B, Kessler) reports, "Computer chip companies are in a dealmaking frenzy — gobbling up rivals or going private — as they attempt to adjust to a changing industry. Nearly $40 billion worth of deals have been announced or closed since August, and chip analysts say more are on the way. … The semiconductor industry has always been competitive. But the tech boom of the 1990s created dozens of midsize chipmakers, says semiconductor analyst John Barber at researcher Gartner."

Congress To Hold Hearings On Impact Of Airline Mergers. The Arizona Republic (12/18, Geewax) reports, "Even though the new Congress won't convene until January, key lawmakers are preparing for hearings to examine the economic impact of possible airline mergers. Many members of Congress are condemning the potential deals, while few, if any, are supporting the idea of industry consolidation. … Perhaps the most controversial of the potential acquisitions involves US Airways Group Inc.'s unsolicited $8.7 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. The two carriers have routes that overlap significantly along the East Coast, and hubs relatively near each other in the West." The Republic adds, "Concerns about a loss of competition grew dramatically last week when UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, and Continental Airlines Inc. announced they are considering a possible merger. In addition, AirTran Holdings Inc. offered to buy Midwest Air Group Inc. for about $290 million. With so many carriers now in play, the number of concerned congressmen is on the rise."

Brookings Fellows Inveigh Against Government Intervention In Airline Mergers. In a commentary appearing in the Wall Street Journal (12/18, A16, 2.04M), Robert W. Crandall and Clifford Winston, senior fellows at the Brookings Institution, write, "Almost on cue, members of Congress have responded" to potential mergers in the airline industry "with predictions that fares will rise, service will be reduced, and more mergers will surely follow. Not to appear soft on threats to competition, the Justice Department has expressed its concern that the proposed mergers raise antitrust concerns and has vowed to conduct thorough investigations." Crandall and Winston opine, "Mergers may harm consumers if they are the route to (or the root of) market power and ultimately allow the combined firm to increase consumer prices and reduce service. … But our research suggests that government efforts to address such threats do little to improve consumer welfare and sometimes actually reduce it. More importantly, government often misses fruitful opportunities to benefit consumers because it eschews market-oriented policies." They add, "Rather than attempt to combat airline mergers, government policy makers could have a much more beneficial impact on the welfare of air travelers by pursuing policies that increase competition on international and domestic routes."

National Governments' Objections Undermine European Commission's Authority Over Mergers. The Financial Times (12/18, Buck) reports, "The European Commission has regularly courted controversy by blocking mergers and takeovers. Last week, the Brussels-based regulator learnt that defending such deals can be just as hard. The Commission could only look on in frustration as Spain's Abertis and Autostrade, the Italian motorway operator, abandoned a €25bn ($33bn) merger that would have created a new pan-European infrastructure group. … Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, and Charlie McCreevy, the EU internal market commissioner, had warned Rome repeatedly to mind its own business. Both ruled that Italy's objections violated EU law and threatened to file a legal challenge - but their intervention still failed to save the deal. Worryingly for Brussels, Abertis/Autostrade is no isolated case. While cross-border mergers and takeovers in the European Union have increased during recent years, a growing number of deals face stiff opposition from governments and national regulators. To the Commission - which by law has the exclusive power to scrutinise and approve big pan-European mergers - such national meddling presents a serious challenge to its authority."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Inhofe Says Global Warming "Alarmists" Silencing Dissenters. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (12/18, A17) Oklahoma Sen. James Inhofe (R) writes, "Those who wish to quell opposing viewpoints on manmade global warming do so because of a number of inconvenient facts about both the science of climate change and the economic harm their proposed 'solutions' would cause the American people." He adds, "Despite enjoying a huge advantage in funding over skeptics, liberal special interests groups have had almost no impact in convincing policymakers to pass economically destructive climate legislation in the U.S. Now it appears those same alarmists are panicking and adopting a new agenda: to silence those who disagree with their views. I find it troubling that two of my colleagues in the Senate would join the campaign to shut down the ongoing debate on the science of global warming."

WSJournal Says "Unleashing Private Sector" Key To Lowering Air Temperatures. The Wall Street Journal (12/18) editorializes, "Climate-change activists and Democrats on Capitol Hill are gearing up to push the US to limit so-called greenhouse gases. In their telling, America must save mankind from an eco-Apocalypse by adopting the arbitrary targets popular with Europe and other Kyoto Protocol signatories. Well, let's look at results in the real world, as opposed to this Kyoto spin. Recent data show that placing artificial limits on emissions hasn't done all that much to reduce emissions, and may even be counterproductive. Contrary to caricature, the American approach offers more promise than Europe's. … If global-warming activists were as interested in lowering air temperatures as they are in expanding the role of the state, they'd understand that the key to reducing carbon emissions lies in unleashing the private sector, not capping it. That's the real lesson from the policies -- and the results -- in Europe and the US."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Marin County Sheriffs To Shift Tactics Against Marijuana Growers. The Marin (CA) Independent-Journal (12/18, Wolfcale) reports, "The dope growers who ripped up Marin parkland to plant acres of marijuana valued at more than $100 million this summer, then got away as authorities moved in, might not be as lucky next year. County sheriff, federal park rangers and other officials are planning a crackdown aimed at ensuring extensive growing operations don't take root again. … Marin County Sheriff Robert Doyle said deputies will coordinate plans with other Marin authorities to thwart the growers."

IMMIGRATION:

NYTimes Says Swift Raids Show Need For Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The New York Times (12/18) editorializes that to blame Swift & Company and the illegal immigrant workers arrested there in raids last week "misses the bigger picture. Swift and its workers are merely Exhibit A in an immigration system that is failing in all of its parts. It is a system that rewards illegality and pays lip service to lawfulness and order. … The Swift raids are powerful evidence that I-9's and Basic Pilot are ineffective and disingenuous, a nod to by-the-books technical lawfulness that allows a far vaster world of illegality to flourish." Meanwhile, "Immigration reform built on piecemeal enforcement — factory raids and border walls — won't solve the problem of the 12 million illegal immigrants already here. The American economy wouldn't stand the shock if the Swift raids were multiplied to levels beyond the merely symbolic. The system needs what Mr. Bush and Congress have refused to give it: a way to end the sham" through comprehensive immigration reform.

"Largely Unprotected" Northern Border Seen As Terror Risk. USA Today (12/18, 4A, Hall) reports on the northern border, along which there are "slim sections" where "anyone can drive the back roads that flow from Canada into the United States." The situation "worries local police, Border Patrol officers and members of Congress alike. Many say the USA's northern border — more than 4,000 miles of open and largely unprotected land — remains a dangerously weak link in the nation's post-9/11 effort to shore up security against terrorist attacks." Sen. Byron Dorgan says security along the border has improved since 9/11, but, "There should be no less anxiety about it." Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar notes that "new helicopters and more agents" are headed north and "disputes the notion that the Canadian border has been 'forgotten' by the Homeland Security Department."

TAX:

Facing Tax Liabilities, More Americans Abroad Renounce Citizenship. The New York Times (12/18, Carvajal) reports, "Historically, small numbers of Americans have turned in their passports every year for political and economic reasons, with the numbers reaching a high of about 2,000 during the Vietnam War in the early 1970s. But after Congress sharply raised taxes this year for many Americans living abroad, some international tax lawyers say they detect rising demand from citizens to renounce ties with the United States, the only developed country that taxes it citizens while they live overseas. Americans abroad are also taxed in the countries where they live."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Myers Likely To Face "Tough Fight" If Renominated To 9th Circuit. The AP (12/18, Wittmeyer) reports, "If President George W. Bush renominates a controversial Republican Idaho lawyer for a seat on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, he's going to have a tough fight ahead of him, Senate leaders say. The nomination of Boise lawyer William Gerry Myers III, which has been stalled in the Senate for three years, may have almost reached an end. Now that Democrats have control of Congress, a consensus has formed on Capitol Hill that Myers -- who has stirred up some of the fiercest Democratic opposition of all Bush's judicial nominees -- has almost no chance of getting through."

Pro-Environment Shift In Congress Under Democrats No Sure Thing. The Los Angeles Times (12/18, Simon) writes that while "environmentalists are busy these days crafting their holiday wish-list, giddy about the prospects for success in the new Democratic-controlled Congress," industry groups "are gearing up to fight, and their forces may include more than the usual Republican allies." The Times says "the politics surrounding environmental issues have proved hard to predict, largely because the potential economic impact of stronger regulation tends to scramble partisan loyalties. Democrats from auto-making states, for example, have fought efforts to mandate stricter miles-per-gallon rules for vehicles. These crosscurrents could cause the push for an aggressive environmental agenda to become an object lesson on the limits of what can actually be achieved in the Congress that will convene in January."

NYTimes Says Democrats Must Keep Promise On Ethics Reform. The New York Times (12/18, A28) editorializes, "The Democrats promised sweeping ethics reform in this year's campaign, and now they have control of Congress. But procrastination is a legendary Capitol vice, and there are worrisome signs that the Democrats may already be indulging. … Rather than committing wholeheartedly" to the need for an independent, nonpartisan ethics body, incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "is opting to create a bipartisan task force to study the issue and report back by mid-March." Pelosi and incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "should keep foremost in mind the voters' anticipation of a cleaner, more quickly responsive Congress."

Federal Employees Unions Have High Hopes For Democratic Congress. The Washington Post (12/18, A23, Goldfarb) reports that "unions that represent most federal employees" have argued since 2001 that the Bush Administration "has been hostile to the needs of workers -- keeping pay raises low, trying to prevent employees from organizing in the departments of Defense and Homeland Security, and outsourcing government jobs to the private sector. Now, the change in control of Congress gives unions much more powerful allies in the legislative branch." American Federation of Government Employees National President John Gage said, "We're hoping not only we'll have more access to committees and Congress, but that word will get down to the political appointees in the departments."

NYTimes Says GOP To Blame For Appropriations Stalemate. The New York Times (12/18, A28) editorializes that "under normal circumstances," for Congress to decide to operate "under old budgets would be a dereliction of lawmakers' duty to weigh needs and resources, and spend tax dollars accordingly. But the current situation is hardly normal. The departing Republican-led Congress was supposed to nail down the government's spending plans for 2007 before it adjourned, but it neglected to do so. … During the lame duck session, they did not even try to complete the spending bills -- a crass attempt to force the new Democratic majority to expend time and energy cleaning up the mess. By choosing to operate much of next year's government at the 2006 level, the Democrats avoid that trap. But solving the political problem creates some practical ones. President Bush, for example, will have to step up during the year to ask for more money as needed."

OTHER NEWS:

Rumors Suggest Zelikow Forced Out Over Policy, Leaked Memos. The Washington Post's (12/18, A23) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "the rumors at Foggy Bottom were that counselor Philip Zelikow, who had been advising his close friend of many years, Condoleezza Rice, on Iraq and other matters, was eased out last month because he wasn't on the same page with the administration." Some insiders felt there were "suspicious leaks of his internal memos -- taking issue with administration policy on Iraq and the Middle East -- in books and articles, culminating with one at the end of November in the New York Times that was headlined: 'Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want to Hear.' That one was called the last straw."

WPost Says Maryland Justice System Needs "Thorough Examination." In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/18, A24) examines the "appalling details" of the case of Lawrence Banks, who spent "nine years, four months and 18 days…in a Maryland prison for murdering two people, one of whom was his 17-year-old son." Banks "is now a figure in a new double-murder investigation -- raise troubling questions about Maryland's justice system. … This was a botched case, and it raises new questions in Maryland's long-running debate over truth in sentencing. … It is time for a thorough examination of the system."

Justice Stevens Says Flag-Burning Amendment Not Needed. The Washington Post/AP (12/18, A23) reports Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens, who "twice voted to outlaw burning the U.S. flag," now says there is "no need to amend the Constitution to protect Old Glory." In a September address to the Chicago Bar Association that recently aired on C-SPAN, Stevens said the court's two 5-4 flag burning rulings "seem to have solved the problem because no one burns flags anymore."

Internet Changed Campaign Fundraising Strategies In 2006. USA Today (12/18, 6A, Schouten) writes that "this year's midterm elections offered fresh examples of the ways the Internet is changing how candidates in both parties raise money as they scramble to collect the $20, $30 and $50 donations needed in the aftermath of changes to campaign-finance laws in 2002 that banned large donations." Online fundraising "has proved a cost-effective and lightning-fast method to raise cash, rally the faithful and promote or smear office seekers," and "could transform fundraising in presidential races."

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Sends Home 33 Detainees From Guantanamo Bay (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Thirty-three detainees who had been held at the U.S. military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, were returned to their home countries over the past week, part of a government effort to reduce the facility's population to a core group of terrorism suspects who could be held indefinitely.

The Defense Department announced yesterday that it transferred 17 detainees to their home countries over the weekend: seven to Afghanistan, five to Yemen, three to Kazakhstan, one to Libya and one to Bangladesh. Military officials announced Thursday that 16 detainees were sent to Saudi Arabia last week.

With the transfer of the 33 detainees -- nearly 8 percent of the facility's population -- Guantanamo now holds about 395 detainees, almost none of whom have been charged with a crime. State Department officials have been working to reducesignificantly reduce the number of Guantanamo detainees through lengthy negotiations with other countries, although the United States is unwilling to release detainees into the custody of nations where they would likely be abused, tortured or killed.

A large percentage of the remaining population is from Saudi Arabia and Yemen.

According to Pentagon figures, approximately 380 detainees have departed Guantanamo for at least 29 countries since 2002, meaning the facility's current population represents slightly more than half of the suspects captured and transferred to U.S. custody in Cuba. An additional 85 detainees are slated for transfer or release to their home nations pending the outcome of diplomatic discussions. Their departure would leave the number of detainees at Guantanamo at about 310.

"Departure of these remaining detainees approved for transfer or release is subject to ongoing discussions between the United States and other nations," according to a Defense Department news release yesterday. "The United States does not desire to hold detainees for any longer than necessary."

Guantanamo did not accept new detainees from September 2004 to this past September, when 14 high-value suspects who had been in secret CIA custody were moved to Cuba.

Fenced In At Guantanamo, Even "Easy" Cases Have Lingered (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0107032

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

After an hours-long firefight in an Afghan village called Ab Khail, an enemy fighter hurled a grenade at Sgt. First Class Christopher Speer, causing fatal injuries. For more than a year, Maj. Jeffrey Groharing, a Marine Corps prosecutor, has been trying to bring the alleged killer to justice.

Winning a conviction should have been easy. The suspect, Omar Ahmed Khadr, a Toronto-born teenager whose relatives have ties to al Qaeda, was captured after the July 2002 skirmish and taken to Guantánamo Bay. Under an order President Bush issued in November 2001, Mr. Khadr could claim few of the rights afforded defendants in civilian courts or courts-martial.

But for Maj. Groharing, the case of U.S. v. Omar Khadr, slated for an American military commission at Guantánamo, has been a headache. Intelligence agencies refused to share their files with the prosecutor, fearing their methods or sources might be disclosed. Soldiers who witnessed the incident are scattered across the globe. Defense attorneys hurled a series of legal challenges that paralyzed proceedings. And the crime scene -- a remote village still contested by Taliban fighters -- was all but obliterated by American bombs, making it nearly impossible to conduct an independent investigation.

Such challenges help explain why the Bush administration failed to complete a single Guantánamo trial in the five years before the Supreme Court struck the system down in June. The decision threw into limbo the prosecution of Mr. Khadr and nine other Guantánamo prisoners who were charged prior to the high court ruling. Congress has since passed the Military Commissions Act, which grants defendants some of the rights President Bush previously had sought to deny. But even when the deck was stacked in the government's favor, prosecutors struggled to convict fighters captured overseas amid a continuing conflict.

"At the end of the day, the question is: Can you actually try a case under these conditions?" says Prof. Robert Chesney, a specialist in national-security law at Wake Forest University.

Maj. Groharing acknowledges that the Guantánamo cases have had "some fits and starts," and presented challenges that few other prosecutors face. He says the effort is nonetheless worthwhile.

"What's the alternative? To not hold him accountable? We are certainly not going to give him a pass for killing a U.S. service member and plotting to kill many more," the prosecutor says. "The difference between us and al Qaeda is that when we had him on the battlefield, we didn't summarily execute him," he says.

The U.S. has employed forms of military commissions in past conflicts, most recently World War II, when hundreds of Axis officials and soldiers were tried for offenses such as crimes against humanity and mistreatment of American prisoners of war. But those trials took place after fighting had ended and before the introduction of stricter courtroom and evidentiary standards, as laid out by the Geneva Conventions, the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and other laws.

Air Force Col. Moe Davis, the chief Guantánamo prosecutor, estimates that about 70 of some 435 Guantánamo prisoners will eventually face trial for specific war crimes; the rest will be held until the U.S. determines they no longer pose a threat. Those expected to face military trial include Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh, alleged plotters of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. President Bush transferred them in September from a secret Central Intelligence Agency prison to Guantánamo.

The majority of the defendants are relative unknowns whose alleged crimes fall short of the catastrophic hijacking attacks. Mr. Khadr was selected as an early prosecution target precisely because his case seemed so simple. Of the prisoners previously charged, Mr. Khadr is the only one accused of killing anybody. Sgt. Speer's combat death, alone of the 194 American military personnel killed by enemy fire in and around Afghanistan, is the only one that has prompted a murder charge.

In contrast to some other cases, "we have a crime scene, we have facts, we have witnesses," says Maj. Groharing.

Defense attorneys say the allegations against Mr. Khadr amount to nothing other than taking part in a battle he didn't start.

The Marine attorney assigned to represent Mr. Khadr, Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, initially was barred by his commander from communicating with reporters after filing an affidavit accusing Guantánamo prison guards of abusing detainees.

Muneer Ahmad, an American University law professor helping represent Mr. Khadr, says: "It's hard to think this is a case prosecuted solely on its merits without regard to the political benefits to the administration."

Mr. Khadr, he adds, "has been punished for the perceived sins of his family."

Mr. Khadr's father, Ahmed Said Khadr, an Egyptian-born Canadian citizen, was closely identified with extremist Islamic causes. In the 1980s, Ahmed Khadr traveled to Pakistan and Afghanistan, where he became a confidant of Osama bin Laden. In 1993, Mr. Khadr moved his family to Afghanistan, where U.S. authorities say he funneled money to al Qaeda under cover of charity work.

Mr. Khadr's boys trained at al Qaeda-run camps and played with Mr. bin Laden's children, Khadr family members said in interviews with the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. According to Pentagon charges, "while traveling with his father, Omar Khadr saw or personally met senior al Qaeda leaders," including Mr. bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahiri and Muhammed Atef.

After the U.S. invaded Afghanistan to topple the Taliban regime in October 2001, the Khadrs scattered. Ahmed Khadr was killed by Pakistani forces in an October 2003 battle that also left his youngest son paralyzed.

Omar, meanwhile, "received approximately one month of one-on-one, private al Qaeda basic training" arranged by his father, Pentagon charges say, including "the use of rocket-propelled grenades, rifles, pistols, grenades and explosives."

In late July 2002, U.S. forces picked up satellite telephone transmissions from a village about seven miles outside Khost, Afghanistan, says retired Army Sgt. First Class Layne Morris, part of the unit sent to reconnoiter. Mr. Morris's account of the day is corroborated by contemporary news reports, charging documents and other court papers, including a successful civil suit filed by Mr. Morris and the widow of Sgt. Speer in U.S. District Court in Utah.

The Khadr family's Canadian lawyer, Dennis Edney, contends that suit was illegitimate and that it may color Mr. Morris's credibility.

According to Mr. Morris and press accounts, a detachment of about 40 U.S. soldiers, along with a few allied Afghan militiamen, headed to Ab Khail. Mr. Morris recalls leading a five-man squad to a compound outside the main village, with a mud wall surrounding a homestead with buildings and animal pens.

The sergeant peered through the compound's green metal gate, spotting what he says were well-dressed Arabs with AK-47 machine guns sitting around a fire. "They looked at me and I looked at them," Mr. Morris says.

Mr. Morris backed up, ordered his soldiers into position and called for reinforcements. About 100 villagers were hanging around watching events unfold. About 45 minutes later, the rest of the detachment arrived, including Sgt. Speer. The Americans took cover and sent the Afghans into the compound to inquire further, Mr. Morris says.

The men inside immediately shot the Afghans dead and began firing guns and throwing grenades at the U.S. soldiers, Mr. Morris says. The ensuing battle was ferocious, costing Mr. Morris his right eye, wounding four other Americans and ending only after U.S. F-18s dropped two 500-pound bombs on the compound, destroying it.

U.S. soldiers, assuming the enemy fighters were all dead, advanced on the compound, Mr. Morris says. That's when Mr. Khadr, then 15, allegedly rose and threw a grenade that wounded Sgt. Speer, a 28-year-old medic.

The soldiers shot Mr. Khadr. When they got to his prone body, he begged them, in English, to finish him off, Mr. Morris says. U.S. soldiers said at the time in press interviews they restrained their desire to do so and instead ordered medical treatment. Mr. Khadr survived, but lost most sight in his left eye. His three companions, all Arabs, were dead.

Sgt. Speer, shrapnel lodged in his head, was taken to an Army hospital in Germany, where he died on Aug. 7. Mr. Khadr was sent to Guantánamo Bay.

Maj. Groharing, 36, had long nursed dreams of becoming a Marine. He didn't join the Corps until 1996 after graduating from the University of Nebraska law school and a brief but unexciting exposure to private practice. For most of his career, he worked as a defense attorney representing Marines accused of crimes. He sometimes found the role uncomfortable, he says, partly because it involved standing up to commanders who want the offenders punished.

In 2002, he was transferred from San Diego to Washington, D.C., for a job with the Marine Corps commandant's legal counsel. Eager for experience at the prosecution table, he next sought appointment to the Office of Military Commissions.

"I wanted to do something that needed to be done," says Maj. Groharing. After he arrived in June 2005, Guantánamo reporters nicknamed him "Kevin Bacon," after his resemblance to the actor who played a Marine prosecutor in the picture, "A Few Good Men."

Prosecutors had already requested that President Bush authorize charges against Mr. Khadr based on the voluminous array of potential evidence. Over three years of detention, Mr. Khadr had told interrogators about his father's activities and connections, shedding light on al Qaeda's organizational structure, military officials say.

Soldiers who took part in the battle could be called to testify, along with relatives of Sgt. Speer. Both would likely hold weight with the seven U.S. officers appointed as judges. To top it off, soldiers had recovered a video tape from Ab Khail, which the Pentagon says shows a smiling Mr. Khadr building and planting bombs.

In November 2005, the administration formally charged Mr. Khadr with conspiracy, murder by an unprivileged belligerent, attempted murder by an unprivileged belligerent and aiding the enemy. The charges stem from Mr. Khadr's classification as an unlawful combatant, or a person who has no right to commit acts of war; if he was adjudged to be part of a regular army, his actions likely would be considered legal under the rules of war.

Maj. Groharing went to Guantánamo to personally deliver the news. He recalls thinking that Mr. Khadr looked "somewhat hardened, far from a typical teenager" and "a bit arrogant, cocky."

Mr. Khadr didn't appear know who the Marine was. "He advised me he didn't want me to be his lawyer. I said, 'I'm not your lawyer,' " and handed him the charges.

Mr. Khadr already had an impressive legal team. His family in Canada had hired counsel. In addition, Prof. Ahmad and a faculty colleague, Richard Wilson, represented him in civil litigation challenging his detention at Guantánamo. To these were added an Army lawyer and Col. Vokey, an experienced military defense counsel.

Mr. Khadr's lawyers say none of the charges are crimes, citing a variety of legal arguments. They note the Supreme Court plurality has found that conspiracy is not a war crime, based on post-World War II precedents that considered the charge too vague.

Prof. Ahmed says murder by an unprivileged belligerent "has never been recognized as a violation of the laws of war," and was instead "invented" by the Bush administration. The other charge, aiding the enemy, makes no sense, the law professor adds, because Mr. Khadr owes no allegiance to the U.S. Lastly, because Mr. Khadr was 15 at the time of the alleged crime, he should be treated as a juvenile, says Prof. Ahmad, following historic precedent.

His attorneys allege Mr. Khadr was subjected to years of abuse, including being used as a "human mop" to clean up urine, being shackled until he soiled himself, and being threatened with deportation to Egypt, where he would be raped.

Col. Davis, the chief Guantánamo prosecutor, says the allegations are under review and have not to date been substantiated. Maj. Groharing says if he ever gets his case into a courtroom, he can deal with such objections by citing evidence collected prior to the interrogation.

That wasn't the only problem. The prosecution needed help from other Pentagon offices but instead found uneven support for the commission plan. The tribunals had originated with Bush political appointees rather than professional military lawyers, many of whom thought existing court-martial procedures were more than adequate. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had little time for the commissions, officials say, since administration lawyers concluded prisoners could be held indefinitely, regardless of whether they were tried or even acquitted.

In the Pentagon bureaucracy, ambivalence translated into inertia, if not outright resistance. Intelligence agents refused to make key material available. Maj. Groharing tacked over his desk an intelligence report he received whose entire contents had been blacked out.

"There's an inherent conflict between what they're doing and what we're doing," Maj. Groharing says he realized. And the intelligence mission "trumps what we're doing."

Maj. Groharing says he was prepared to try his case based on the paper files and interviews with surviving U.S. servicemen. But Col. Vokey, the defense attorney, wanted to interview witnesses and gather evidence himself. Because that meant a trip to contested areas of Afghanistan and regions of Pakistan unfriendly to Americans, Maj. Groharing had to make arrangements for his adversary's travel, something the prosecutor considered "awkward."

Col. Vokey agrees, saying he didn't want to conduct his investigation with the prosecutor "looking over my shoulder." (Shortly before this article's publication, Col. Vokey said the ban on his communication with journalists had been lifted.)

By chance, lawyers in other military commission cases had business of their own in the region and the office planned a group trip. Maj. Groharing decided to go, too, so he could attend Col. Vokey's depositions and hunt down additional witnesses of his own.

The group flew to Islamabad, Pakistan, in May. Col. Vokey immediately came down with food poisoning "and that put him down for a week," the prosecutor says. "From that day on, he never had another kebab or naan."

After a stop in Peshawar, a border city where Ahmed Khadr once volunteered for a charity called Human Concern International, the group flew to Bagram air base in Afghanistan. From there, they took a helicopter to Khost, where an Army unit was assembled to escort the lawyers, now wearing Kevlar battle gear, to the crime scene.

At first, they couldn't find the village. When the convoy of six Humvees and some 25 soldiers finally rumbled into Ab Khail, villagers surrounded the U.S. group. The prosecutor wanted to find witnesses who would say that foreign fighters had been in the compound.

Several villagers "clearly remembered" the incident, Maj. Groharing says, before the village elder showed up and took charge of the encounter. "Anyone we tried to talk to, he would always jump in and answer for everyone else," the prosecutor says. The elder denied the very essence of the prosecution case: that al Qaeda fighters had fought U.S. soldiers in the village.

"There wasn't going to be a 'Perry Mason' moment where all of a sudden he admitted everything when I confronted him with the evidence," Maj. Groharing says.

Both the prosecutor and the defense attorney tried various feints to distract the elder. "We did talk to some folks on the side without him, but we also didn't want to upset the apple cart," Maj. Groharing says. "We wouldn't be doing a very good job of winning hearts and minds" by offending the local establishment.

The Americans examined the new compound, which had been built over the rubble of the previous buildings, noting a few reused bricks with bullet holes and spotting the shrapnel-damaged green metal gate, leaning unused against the compound's mud wall. After about three frustrating hours, they gave up and returned to Khost, Maj. Groharing says.

Their last stop was Jalalabad, a southern Afghan city where Ahmed Khadr ran an organization called Health and Education Project International. The U.S. says it was a front for financing al Qaeda. Col. Vokey wanted to interview the organization's current director.

Narrow streets and congested traffic made it impossible for their Humvees to maneuver, forcing the uniformed U.S. lawyers to walk the last few blocks. As they approached, explosions went off, Maj. Groharing recalls. Arriving at the address, they found a crowd watching the entire city block in flames.

"We were looking at the map and the grid coordinates and, no kidding, it's the place Col. Vokey wanted to see," Maj. Groharing says. The two lawyers, fearing for their safety, quickly left the scene.

The case against Mr. Khadr is now one of many held up by the Supreme Court's decision to strike down the Bush administration's original commission plan. Maj. Groharing says he expects to refile charges after the Pentagon draws up rules and procedures implementing the new system of military commissions, to be completed as soon as January. The Bush administration, meanwhile, plans to build a courtroom complex at Guantánamo by July 2007 at a cost of up to $125 million.

But lawmakers of both parties have questioned the courtroom project, and the ultimate fate of military commission trials remains unclear. Last week a federal judge found Guantánamo prisoners had no right to challenge the Military Commissions Act, but the outgoing and incoming chairmen of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sens. Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) and Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.), have said they plan to revisit the legislation.

U.S. Military Rehearses Terror Hearings (AP)

By Michael Melia

The U.S. military is rehearsing for hearings on whether 14 top terror suspects can be held indefinitely without charge as enemy combatants, but defense lawyers say the outcome is preordained.

Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and the 13 others will be the highest-profile detainees to undergo the so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, and the first to do so in two years. The proceedings, expected early next year, are open to the media.

At the hearings, a military panel will evaluate whether the men should be classified as "enemy combatants," a designation which allows them to be held indefinitely and prevents them from challenging their detention in the U.S. court system.

"The biggest thing we're doing is opening up the books, reviewing procedures and conducting rehearsals so that we do it correctly," Navy Capt. Philip Waddingham told reporters who recently visited Guantanamo. He is the lead officer at Guantanamo for the Pentagon-based office in charge of determining detainees' status.

It is unclear whether Mohammed and the others — who until recently were being held in secret CIA prisons — will agree to attend the hearings. If they do, the military says they will remain shackled and would be forbidden to talk to reporters.

The rehearsals are being conducted inside the same space reserved for the hearings — a small room inside a trailer equipped with a few leather chairs, one plastic seat for the detainee, and little else.

Combatant Status Review Tribunals were held for 558 detainees between July 2004 and January 2005. All but 38 were deemed enemy combatants.

Defense attorneys have condemned the hearings as shams because classified evidence is withheld from the detainees and they are not afforded defense lawyers.

"There is no question that these 14 have no chance," said Brent Mickum, an attorney who represents two Britons at Guantanamo. "The decision has (already) been made that they are enemy combatants."

At the hearings, a panel of three officers will evaluate whether detainees merit the designation. A military "personal representative" will help prisoners prepare for the proceedings.

Bush announced on Sept. 6 that the 14 detainees had been transferred to Guantanamo.

Mohammed, who was believed to be the No. 3 al-Qaida leader, has not been seen in public since he was captured in Pakistan in 2003. The others include the alleged architects of the USS Cole bombing in Yemen in 2000 and the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The 14 are in a maximum-security section of the prison, which sprawls over a cactus-studded patch of arid ground overlooking the Caribbean. Officials say they are treated like other detainees, and can receive reading materials and have access to mail censored by the military.

Waddingham said in September that he expected the hearings for the 14 new detainees to be held within three months. That timeframe has been pushed back to early 2007 as top officials at the Pentagon, the Justice Department and the military Joint Task Force in charge of the prison camps coordinate the proceedings, he said.

About 380 men have been transferred from Guantanamo to other countries since the detention center opened in January 2002. About 395 detainees remain, most of them held for nearly five years without charge on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

U.S. authorities repatriated a 28-year-old Bangladeshi man on Sunday after years of imprisonment in Guantanamo, a police official at the airport in Bangladesh's capital Dhaka said. The official, Tahera Banu, said the man was being interrogated.

Give Habeas A Chance (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER (R-Pa.), who has often complained about judicial second-guessing of congressional reasoning, practically pleaded with the Supreme Court recently to substitute its judgment for that of the legislative branch. Specter believes that prisoners at Guantanamo Bay should be able to file habeas corpus petitions challenging their confinement, and he offered legislation that would have allowed them to do so. It failed, and Specter ended up voting for a bill that denies them that right, later expressing confidence that the Supreme Court would "clean it up."

Now Specter is having second — or is it third? — thoughts. Earlier this month, he joined with his successor as Judiciary Committee chairman, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), in introducing the Habeas Corpus Restoration Act of 2006. The bill, which presumably will be reintroduced in January, would repeal provisions of the Military Commissions Act that withheld habeas protection from foreigners deemed "enemy combatants."

That law has already resulted in a legal defeat for Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the former driver for Osama bin Laden who won a victory in the Supreme Court in June. Last week, a federal judge ruled that the law barred Hamdan, who is imprisoned at Guantanamo, from challenging his confinement in court. But the judge also ruled that the law was unconstitutional because it denied habeas rights to foreigners living in the U.S.

Of the 51 senators who voted against affording habeas protection to present and future enemy combatants, six will be missing from the next Congress. Prospects for remedial legislation would seem equally bright in the new House of Representatives, where Democrats will have a majority of 233 to 202. Even if the majorities for passage weren't veto-proof, President Bush might think twice about rejecting legislation restoring a privilege with roots in the Magna Carta.

As Specter points out, the Constitution allows for the suspension of the writ only in times of invasion or rebellion, and "we are suffering neither of those alternatives at the present time." Habeas protection for enemy combatants — not just those at Guantanamo but other aliens who might be detained in the future — is not just a legal nicety. Without such protection, real injustices could be suffered by flesh-and-blood individuals.

Mark Denbeaux, a Seton Hall University law professor who studied transcripts of proceedings in which Guantanamo inmates were classified as enemy combatants, has said that the process afforded prisoners little opportunity to contest the allegations against them. "These were not hearings," he said. "These were shams." Even if he's wrong, the military has nothing to fear from the ancient safeguard of habeas corpus.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New Twist On Government Control Of Data: Use Of Subpoenas (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, December 18, 2006

When Anthony Romero finally read the document marked "secret" that the Justice Department was subpoenaing "any and all copies of," he scratched his head.

"It simply had nothing to do with national security. If anything, it might be mildly embarrassing to the government," he says.

And so Mr. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, decided to fight. That kicked off the latest battle in one key arena of the Bush administration's war on terror - the information front.

Both sides agree that nothing less than the nature of American society is at stake, although each side sees different threats. The administration says the danger comes from technically savvy terrorists who are out to exploit the nation's open society in order to undermine it. Critics contend that the real peril comes from the administration itself, which, they charge, is abusing the classification system to shield its activities from public scrutiny, thus undermining the workings of democracy.

This struggle between the needs to protect national security and civil liberties goes back to the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798, which were passed to silence critics of the war with France. Such practices became more formalized in 1940, when the Roosevelt administration issued the first executive order creating a classification system. But since 9/11, the struggle has intensified.

"Democracy cannot give you a perfectly clear line between the balance of transparency and secrecy," says James Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank in Washington. "That will always create natural tensions, particularly at a time when we see we do have a lot of enemies." Revised approach after 9/11

Since 9/11, the Bush administration has sought to keep secret any and all information that it believes could potentially be used by terrorists. In March 2003, it issued a broad executive order that extended the authority to classify information from agencies like the Department of Agriculture, Health and Human Services, and the Environmental Protection Agency. It's also extended the time information could be kept secret, from 10 years to 25 years. Moreover, it began a campaign to reclassify millions of documents from earlier administrations that had previously been declassified.

In 2005, more than 15 million additional documents were classified, a record amount, according to the Information Security Oversight Office of the National Archives. It cost the United States an estimated $7.7 billion to keep all the nation's information under wraps, according to the ISOO - an increase of more than 50 percent since 2001.

Critics say this is a significant overclassification of information. They say it's denied the public access to crucial policy debates about the fight against terrorism as well as the way the war in Iraq has been waged.

In addition, they contend, this administration has used the rubric of national security to cover up controversial activities - from the Abu Ghraib prison abuses to the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping.

"[National security has] been abused to shield high-level political leadership on the torture issue. It's been used as a way to intimate the press [and] create a climate of fear and intimidation about government employees to dissuade whistle-blowers," says Romero of the ACLU.

Some academics also argue that large amounts of information that have nothing to do with national security have been reclassified - which has undermined their ability to do basic historical as well as scientific research.

"It's an unprecedented situation," says Larry Berman, a professor of political science at the University of California at Davis, who is suing the CIA for access to documents from the Johnson administration. "This current administration has set back freedom on information and access to knowledge for generations." How the government sees it

From the administration's point of view, however, the problem is not so much secrecy but the Internet and computer-savvy terrorists, who can use the free flow of information within the nation's open, democratic system to invent creative ways to attack it.

"This isn't the same world we lived in 10 years ago," says William Banks, director of the Institute for National Security and Counterterrorism at Syracuse University in New York. "The dynamics of information have changed dramatically because of the Internet and the ease of data collection and transference."

To address that new technical reality, the administration has tried to prevent access to information that, if cobbled together properly, could give terrorists clues as to how the government functions. It's become known as the "mosaic theory" - that one piece of information on its own may seem harmless, but together with others, it can result in a larger picture that enemies could use. This has created a new paradigm that has allowed the administration to expand its definition of what should be kept secret.

"It basically says, 'Just trust us that even though this piece may seem innocuous, we know that if it's connected to other pieces of information that it can be dangerous,' " says Professor Banks.

That brings the issue back to the ACLU document, which the Justice Department has subpoenaed from the ACLU. Neither the Justice Department nor the US Attorney's Office would comment on it. The ACLU will not reveal its contents either, awaiting the outcome of its effort to quash the subpoena. But Romero says the document is a "classic example of overclassification." He also says the US Attorney's Office is abusing the grand-jury system, which is set up as an investigative body.

"The government's attempt to suppress information using the grand-jury process is truly chilling and is unprecedented," said Romero in a statement. "This subpoena serves no legitimate investigative purpose."

Mr. Carafano of the Heritage Foundation says that overclassification is a problem in every administration, and he does not believe the current one has particularly abused the process.

"Is overclassification a problem? Absolutely," he says. "Are there people who try to cover up their mistakes using it? Absolutely. Is there's going to be a constant tension around this issue? Absolutely. But if somebody thinks that if they vote the bums out of office this will change, they're wrong."

Our Own Nuremberg Trials (VV)

By Nat Hentoff

Village Voice, December 18, 2006

The new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, warden of the "worst of the worst" in Guantánamo.

photo: www.defenselink.mil/During the mutual-admiration hearing before the Senate Committee on Armed Services—which led to the unanimous confirmation of former CIA chief Robert Gates to be Donald Rumsfeld's successor—no senator asked Gates if he approves of the Pentagon's "extreme . . . emergency" insistence on a $125 million appropriation to construct a permanent compound for a war-crimes court at Guantánamo. There, in 2007, war-crimes trials will be held for dozens of Guantánamo "detainees." The facilities will accommodate simultaneous proceedings.

Unlike the Nuremberg war-crimes trials of the Nazis, there will be no government officials in the dock, but rather—as detailed in my last column—prisoners against whom the United States has itself committed war crimes under the Geneva Conventions and our own War Crimes act. These crimes include their conditions of confinement and a total lack of the due process that the Supreme Court ordered in Rasul v. Bush (2004) and Hamdan v. Rumsfeld (2006).

Each of the defendants will have already been designated as an "enemy combatant" by previous "administrative" Combatant Status Review Tribunals at Guantánamo. At these sham hearings they were presumed guilty before any of the "evidence" against them (which they were not permitted to see) was aired. That means the presumption of guilt will continue at the war-crimes trials.

The world will watch the total transmogrification of America's much self-praised "rule of law." There are objections to this rush for funds to house the American Nuremberg trials. On December 3, Republican congressman James Walsh, chair of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs, and Related Agencies—which is in charge of military construction projects—refused to authorize the Pentagon's "national security" appropriation.

Walsh is angry at the absence of any public debate on this expenditure and, he cogently adds, "The issue of the tribunals is very controversial. For them to move this fast makes me wonder why."

Congressman Walsh will no longer chair that crucial committee in January. But in view of the Democratic congressional leadership's enveloping embrace of the new defense secretary, Robert Gates, will lawmakers prevent him from going ahead with the compound at Guantánamo? And if the Democrats hold up the appropriation, will Gates proceed with the trials in more cramped quarters? (On December 10, the Pentagon suddenly postponed its proposal—leaving it to be decided by the next Congress.)

Our rampant lawlessness during the past four years at Guantánamo has long been "controversial" in the international press and among human rights groups. But the extent and depth of our abuse of these prisoners—resulting in a number of desperation suicides—have been illuminated with damning clarity in a series of reports by New Jersey's Seton Hall University School of Law, the most recent of which, "No-Hearing Hearings," I reported on last week.

The Seton Hall revelations have reached beyond the metropolitan press to, for example, the Anniston Star in Alabama. A December 1 editorial, "The Gitmo Games," quotes from the Seton Hall findings, and concludes:

"The military is holding something less than a kangaroo court that results in putting people away—without charging them with any specific wrongdoing—for an indefinite period of time . . . History will be very unkind to the rulers who constructed this very unjust, un-American system.

"Those un-American rulers, of course, include George W. Bush, Dick Cheney, John Ashcroft and Alberto Gonzales, a coven of lawyers at the Defense Department and the White House, and Donald Rumsfeld. Will Robert Gates take his place among them?"

The Anniston Star's indictment-editorial ends: "[History] also will be unkind to people who tolerated [this un-American system.]" That means us.

A Seton Hall Law School report from February 8, which I did not cite last week, by professor Mark Denbeaux and Joshua Denbeaux and law students at this exemplary school, presents the case against the United States in anticipation of the war-crimes trials at Guantánamo next year. "A Profile of 517 Detainees Through Analysis of Department of Defense

Data" provides "a window into the Government's detaining only those the President has called 'the worst of the worst.' " You can now determine for yourself how dangerous the great majority of the defendants are in the forthcoming American Nuremberg trials:

"Only 8 percent of the detainees were characterized as al Qaeda fighters. Of the remaining detainees, 40 percent have no definitive connection with al Qaeda at all and 18 percent have no definitive affiliation with either al Qaeda or the Taliban."

The report continues: "The Government has detained numerous persons based on mere affiliations with a large number of groups that are, in fact, not on the Department of Homeland Security terrorist watchlist . . . A large majority—60 percent—are detained merely because they are 'associated with' a group or groups the Government asserts are terrorist organizations. (And members of almost 72 percent of those groups are allowed into the U.S.)"

Remember, these findings are based entirely on Department of Defense records. (Robert Gates can fact-check them.) Also, among "the worst of the worst":

"Only 5 percent of the detainees were captured by United States forces. Eighty-six percent of the detainees were arrested by either Pakistan or the Northern Alliance and turned over to United States custody. This 86 percent of the detainees captured by Pakistan or the Northern Alliance were handed over to the United States at a time when the United States offered large bounties for capture of suspected enemies." No questions asked.

Remember, too, that in the 2006 Military Commissions Act, Congress stripped from all these prisoners any meaningful right to utilize our federal courts, thereby defying our own Supreme Court.

Co-author Joshua Denbeaux tells me: "The government's own documents proved that the government's claims that the prisoners were the 'worst of the worst' was a false and shameful public relations ploy . . . We hope that our reports will convince Congress to amend the Military Commissions Act and restore federal jurisdiction." If that happens, the prisoners could contest their conditions of confinement, their imprisonment, and their sentences.

Should the new Democrat-controlled Congress not do that, the American Nuremberg trials could begin—and later, the defendants' last resort may be the John Roberts Supreme Court. But however Congress or the high court eventually decides, we will again be disgraced around the world.

WAR NEWS:

Reid Backs 'Surge' Of Troops In Iraq With '08 Pullout (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 18, 2006

The Senate's incoming majority leader said he would support a temporary increase of U.S. military forces in Iraq, so long as any such act was tied to a withdrawal by 2008.

"If it's for a surge -- that is, for two or three months -- and it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year, then, sure, I'll go along with it," Sen. Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said on ABC's "This Week."

However, other Democrats and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said such an increase in troop levels would not make much of a difference.

"Over this summer, the United States and Iraqi forces launched Operation Forward Together. It began in June, and then phase two began in August with thousands of American troops going into Baghdad to try to stabilize the situation," Mr. Powell said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

"They haven't stabilized the situation. So we have tried this surge of troops over the summer. I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purposes of suppressing this communitarian violence, this civil war, will work," he said.

Mr. Powell, whose so-called Powell Doctrine calls for the use of overwhelming force in military conflicts, said he thinks force levels should have been increased after the fall of Saddam Hussein in order to fill the security vacuum that led to the Iraq insurgency.

During his interview, Mr. Powell said he supports many of the proposals contained in the Iraq Study Group's 79 policy recommendations recently submitted to President Bush.

The bipartisan panel rejected a call for increased troop levels, which have been made most vocally by Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, who is weighing a possible 2008 presidential campaign.

A short-term increase in troop levels was also rejected by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"Well, I respect Harry Reid on it, but that's not where I am," Mr. Kennedy told "Fox News Sunday." "The generals who have testified before the Armed Services Committee think that we would add to being a crutch for the Iraqi civilian government in not making the right judgments and decisions. I think that is a persuasive case and is one that I support."

Although Mr. Reid said he would support a short-term troop increase, it was pointed out by "This Week" moderator George Stephanopoulos that one of the troop-increase proposals being considered by Mr. Bush would take place over 18 to 24 months.

"All I can do is shake my head," Mr. Reid said in response. "I have no military experience, but I have political experience. The American people will not allow this war to go on as it has. It simply is a war that will not be won militarily. It can only be won politically."

Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, also appeared to reject the idea of sending more troops to Baghdad.

"I'd be very skeptical," Mr. Reed, who also sits on the Armed Services Committee, told CNN's "Late Edition." "General Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, pointed out that surging troops without a purpose doesn't make any sense. So I think we'd all have to understand what the purpose of this increase would be."

Powell Says Troops Stretched Too Thin (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin,

USA Today, December 18, 2006

Former secretary of State Colin Powell said Sunday that the U.S. Army "is about broken" and could not support sending a significant increase of soldiers to Iraq.

"That surge cannot be sustained," Powell said. "The current active Army … and the Marine Corps is not large enough for the kinds of missions they're being asked to perform."

Powell, a 35-year Army veteran and former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said he doubted a temporary increase in U.S. forces in Iraq now would change the outcome of the war. The United States was "losing" but had not yet lost, he said.

Speaking on the CBS program, Face the Nation, Powell said that increasing the number of U.S. troops in Iraq from 140,000 to 160,000 or more would force the military to keep soldiers currently in Iraq there longer and to accelerate the arrival of others. That would hurt a force already strained by repeated and extended deployments since 9/11. The White House has said it is considering a number of options that would alter U.S. strategy in Iraq, including a temporary surge of U.S. forces.

Several Iraq war supporters, including Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., have called for a major increase in U.S. troops in Iraq and criticized the administration for not sending more soldiers there in 2003.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., told ABC's This Week that he could back a brief increase in forces if "it's part of a program to get us out of there."

However, U.S. commanders are worried about the impact of such a plan. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, told the House Armed Services Committee on Friday that the active duty Army of 507,000 "will break" unless the force is expanded by 7,000 or more soldiers a year.

He also called for increased deployment of the Army National Guard and Reserves, which have already seen record call-ups since the 9/11 attacks.

As a military leader, Powell articulated a philosophy that came to be known as the Powell doctrine. It rejected the use of U.S. military force without a clear mission and overwhelming numbers deployed against an enemy.

DOJ_NMG_0107042

The conflict in Iraq, Powell said, has become a civil war that requires an Iraqi political solution. "It's very difficult to see how the American Army can impose its will in this sort of conflict," he said.

Powell Doubts Need To Raise Troop Levels (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON. Dec. 17 — Colin L. Powell, the former secretary of state and former chairman of the Joints Chiefs of Staff, said Sunday that the Army was "about broken" and that he saw nothing to justify an increase in troops in Iraq.

"I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purposes of suppression of this communitarian violence, this civil war, will work," he said in an interview on the CBS News program "Face the Nation."

"But if somebody proposes that additional troops be sent," Mr. Powell said, "if I were still chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, my first question to whoever is proposing it: what mission is it that these troops are to accomplish?"

Mr. Powell said heavy demands on the Army had meant "a backlog of equipment that is not being repaired" and "repetitive tours" for soldiers assigned to Iraq. "So if you surge now," he said, "you're going to be bringing in troops from the United States who have already been kept there even longer."

Mr. Powell said the United States should be talking directly with the governments of Syria and Iran in an effort to stabilize the region — a contrast to the policy of the Bush administration, which has not engaged in such talks.

In a separate interview on the ABC News program "This Week," Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming Democratic majority leader, said he could support a troop increase only if it were temporary. "If it's for a surge, that is, for two or three months, and it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year, then, sure, I'll go along with it."

Mr. Reid added: "The American people will not allow this war to go on as it has. It simply is a war that will not be won militarily. It can only be won politically."

Powell Says U.S. Losing In Iraq, Calls For Drawdown By Mid-2007 (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Former secretary of state Colin L. Powell said yesterday that the United States is losing what he described as a "civil war" in Iraq and that he is not persuaded that an increase in U.S. troops there would reverse the situation. Instead, he called for a new strategy that would relinquish responsibility for Iraqi security to the government in Baghdad sooner rather than later, with a U.S. drawdown to begin by the middle of next year.

Powell's comments broke his long public silence on the issue and placed him at odds with the administration. President Bush is considering options for a new military strategy -- among them a "surge" of 15,000 to 30,000 troops added to the current 140,000 in Iraq, to secure Baghdad and to accelerate the training of Iraqi forces, as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and others have proposed; or a redirection of the U.S. military away from the insurgency to focus mainly on hunting al-Qaeda terrorists, as the nation's top military leaders proposed last week in a meeting with the president.

But Bush has rejected the dire conclusions of the Iraq Study Group and its recommendations to set parameters for a phased withdrawal to begin next year, and he has insisted that the violence in Iraq is not a civil war.

"I agree with the assessment of Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton," Powell said, referring to the study group's leaders, former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Indiana congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D). The situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating, and we're not winning, we are losing. We haven't lost. And this is the time, now, to start to put in place the kinds of strategies that will turn this situation around."

Speaking on CBS's "Face the Nation," Powell seemed to draw as much from his 35-year Army career, including four years as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as from his more recent and difficult tenure as Bush's chief diplomat.

The summer's surge of U.S. troops to try to stabilize Baghdad failed, he said, and any new attempt is unlikely to succeed. "If somebody proposes that additional troops be sent, if I was still chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, my first question . . . is what mission is it these troops are supposed to accomplish? . . . Is it something that is really accomplishable? . . . Do we have enough troops to accomplish it?"

Although he said he agrees with Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, that there should be an increase in U.S. advisers to the Iraqi military, he said that "sooner or later, you have to begin the baton pass, passing it off to the Iraqis for their security and to begin the drawdown of U.S. forces. I think that's got to happen sometime before the middle of next year."

Before any decision to increase troops, he said, "I'd want to have a clear understanding of what it is they're going for, how long they're going for. And let's be clear about something else. . . . There really are no additional troops. All we would be doing is keeping some of the troops who were there, there longer and escalating or accelerating the arrival of other troops."

He added: "That's how you surge. And that surge cannot be sustained."

The "active Army is about broken," Powell said. Even beyond Iraq, the Army and Marines have to "grow in size, in my military judgment," he said, adding that Congress must provide significant additional funding to sustain them.

Powell also agreed with the study group's recommendation that the administration open talks with Syria and Iran as it seeks a solution to the Iraq problem. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have explicitly rejected talks until Syria ends its destabilizing influence in Lebanon and its support for anti-Israel militants, and until Iran suspends its nuclear enrichment program. The administration has charged both countries with aiding the Iraqi insurgency.

"Do they get marginal support from Iran and Syria? You bet they do," Powell said of the Iraq militants. "I have no illusions that either Syria or Iran want to help us in Iraq. I am also quite confident that what is happening in Iraq is self-generated for the most part. The money, the resources, the weapons are in Iraq already."

He added: "Are Iran and Syria regimes that I look down upon? I certainly do. But at the same time, I've looked down on many people over the years, in the course of my military and diplomatic career, and I still had to talk to them."

During Bush's first term, Powell was often on the losing side of disagreements with then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Vice President Cheney and the president over a range of foreign policy issues, including the Arab-Israeli peace process, North Korea and Iraq. Although he ultimately supported the 2003 invasion of Iraq -- and played a major role in building public backing for war when he delivered a U.N. Security Council speech saying Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction -- he objected to the administration's detention and interrogation policies for "enemy combatants" and privately questioned the lack of planning and troop strength for postwar Iraq.

His low-key departure from office in January 2005, after Bush's request for his resignation, stood in contrast to Friday's ceremonial farewell to Rumsfeld, whose retirement festivities at the Pentagon were attended by Bush and Cheney. Asked yesterday whether he agreed with Cheney's assessment that Rumsfeld was "the finest defense secretary this nation has ever had," Powell demurred.

"Well, that's the vice president's judgment," he said. "I've known many fine secretaries of defense. . . . But it's history that will judge the performance of all of us in this troubling time . . . and it is a history that I think will ultimately be written as a result of what happens in Iraq."

Biden Opposes Iraq Troop Surge (BOS)

The Boston Globe, December 18, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. --Likely presidential hopeful Sen. Joe Biden said Sunday that he opposes sending additional troops to Iraq, even as the idea seemed to gain support from the Senate's leading Democrat, incoming majority leader Harry Reid.

"I will not to support a surge of troops unless it's tied to some reason for me to believe that they have a political solution," said Biden, incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Biden, D-Del., said any proposal to send about 30,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq should only follow a political solution that will end sectarian violence and civil unrest.

Earlier, Reid said he would be open only to a short-term increase.

"If the commanders on the ground said this is just for a short period of time, we'll go along with that," said Reid, citing a time frame such as two months to three months. But a period of 18 months to 24 months would be too long, he said.

"The American people will not allow this war to go on as it has. It simply is a war that will not be won militarily. It can only be won politically," Reid said.

Biden spoke at Southern New Hampshire University to about 100 people Sunday afternoon, in an appearance sponsored by the World Affairs Council of New Hampshire.

His speech was part a weekend swing through New Hampshire, aimed at boosting his chances in the state's first-in-the-nation presidential primary.

"The president and others who support the surge have it exactly backwards," Biden said.

He added that Iraqis should construct and hold to a political settlement for peace before the United States sends additional support.

Biden, however, held out little hope that a Democrat-controlled Congress would be able to force President Bush's hand on Iraq. Although Congress could withhold spending for military efforts in Iraq, Biden said such a move would only deny needed supplies to troops and would not speed a pullout.

Instead, Biden said it will be up to Republicans to join Democrats in convincing Bush to change course on Iraq.

Biden said the main challenge in Iraq is a cycle of sectarian violence and revenge killings. He said any peace initiatives must give each ethnic group an incentive to support a united Iraq, including a share of oil revenues.

Biden proposes that the Iraqis set up three semi-autonomous regions, one each to be overseen by the Suunis, Shiites and Kurds, with a central government having limited federal powers.

He would also include countries neighboring Iraq in peace talks, including Syria, Iran and Turkey.

A War That Abhors A Vacuum (NYT)

By Ben Connable

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

Washington

THE niceties are up for debate: phased or partial withdrawal from Iraq would entail pulling troops back to their bases across the country, or leapfrogging backward to the nearest international border, or redeploying to bases in nearby countries.

But whatever the final prescription, the debate must include a sober look at the street-level impact of withdrawal. What will become of Iraqi villages, towns and cities as we pull out? Although past is not necessarily prologue, recent experience in Anbar Province may be instructive.

American units have already withdrawn from the western Euphrates River valley — twice, in fact. As the insurgency heated up in early 2004, the Seventh Marine Regiment pulled up stakes and went to fight insurgents in eastern Anbar, leaving the rest of the province in the hands of a battalion of troops. The Marines balanced obvious risk against the possible reward of overwhelming some of the insurgent groups in the east.

The consequences were immediate and bloody. Insurgents assumed control of several towns and villages. They tortured and executed police officers, local politicians, friendly tribal leaders and informants. They murdered contractors who had worked with the Americans or the Iraqi government. They tore down American-financed reconstruction projects and in a few cases imposed an extreme version of Islamic law. Many Iraqi military units collapsed in the absence of United States support.

The insurgents celebrated their self-described victory and exploited the withdrawal for propaganda purposes. Baathist-led insurgents used the opportunity to establish training camps and weapons caches in the farmland and along the river banks while other groups, including Al Qaeda, smuggled in fighters, suicide bombers and money to support operations in Ramadi, Falluja and Baghdad. Western Iraq became a temporary haven for criminals, terrorists and thousands of local thugs who made up de facto mini-regimes in the absence of a stabilizing force.

When the Seventh Marines returned to western Anbar it was essentially forced to retake some of the towns it once controlled. Many local Iraqis were openly hostile; the battle for the hearts and minds of the population was set back months, if not years. With the politicians murdered, local civil administration was almost nonexistent and any influence held by the central government was lost.

The Seventh Marine Regiment pulled up stakes again in November 2004 to join the second fight for Falluja. Conscious of the damage done by the earlier withdrawal, the Marines left behind more troops in an effort to stem the inevitable surge of insurgent and criminal gangs; Iraqi forces were not yet ready to assume control.

Despite this Marine presence, the results were similar. What had been rebuilt in the summer crumbled in the fall.

The two withdrawals left the western Euphrates River valley in a shambles. At the end of 2005 the Marines were forced to conduct sweep and clear operations from Anbar's capital, Ramadi, to the Syrian border town of Husayba. As they pushed west they uncovered hundreds of weapons caches, elaborate insurgent propaganda centers, carefully camouflaged training camps, suicide vehicle factories and complex criminal networks that were feeding a steady stream of money to insurgents and terrorists across the country. Marine units settled back in, spread out and brought attack levels to unprecedented lows.

Since 2005, the situation in Anbar has significantly deteriorated. But as bad as things have become, American and Iraqi forces retain some degree of control in even the most turbulent areas. The border cities of Husayba and Qaim are relatively stable and have effective security and government. Falluja, also stable, is a model for Iraqi-American military cooperation. Advisers are embedded with Iraqi units across the province. American-supported tribes are beginning to combat Al Qaeda in Iraq in the east. Anbar is down but not out, thanks to the American troops along the Euphrates River.

American presence might be likened to a control rod in a nuclear reactor: Leave it in place and the potential energy of the insurgents and criminals is mostly kept in check; remove it and the energy becomes kinetic. Withdrawal of United States presence from any town or city in Anbar will almost certainly lead to the creation of safe havens for western Iraq's impenetrable snarl of foreign fighters, nationalist insurgents and local thugs. Many abandoned cities and towns would come to closely resemble the Falluja of mid-2004.

If American forces conduct even a phased withdrawal before the full certification of Iraqi Army battalions, those units incapable of sustaining independent operations would be forced to pull back alongside their minders, or collapse as their logistics and fire support lifelines disappeared. Most local police forces would scatter, be co-opted or slaughtered wholesale, as they were in 2004.

Insurgents of all stripes would make the most of the combined American and Iraqi withdrawal, harassing the departing convoys with homemade bombs and small-arms fire. Videos of insurgents dancing in the streets would become prevalent on the Internet and international television. No public relations campaign could succeed in painting an early phased withdrawal as anything but a strategic defeat.

"Redeployed" in large bases far from the enemy centers of gravity, American troops wouldn't be able to keep insurgent groups from forming semi-conventional units. This pattern has repeated itself countless times across Iraq and follows historic guerrilla-warfare models: insurgents exploit any safe haven to strengthen and train their forces. The longer they are left alone, the stronger they become. As our presence in the countryside diminishes, our ability to gather intelligence and to protect valuable infrastructure, communications lines and friendly tribal areas will deteriorate rapidly.

Should the Iraqi Army stay in place as American units withdraw, the American advisers embedded within these units probably would have to be removed, leaving nobody to control air support, coordinate unit pay from Baghdad, supervise the monthly convoys to take troops home on leave, prevent gross violations of the Geneva Convention or shore up shaky leadership. Given patient support, most of these units eventually will develop the capacity to conduct independent operations. However, some adviser teams already report that their Iraqi counterparts have said they intend to desert if the Americans leave too soon.

Although Anbar may be the most violent province in Iraq per capita, it is relatively free of the sectarian tensions found in Baghdad and the center. The confusion caused by withdrawal would be compounded as religious, militia and political loyalties divided inadequately prepared military and police units. Full-scale ethnic killing would become a very real possibility.

For some, the collapse of Iraqi society into Hobbesian mayhem is inevitable no matter how many American troops remain on the ground. A few argue that disintegration of the Iraqi state actually would bring about the national catharsis that seems so elusive today — that absolute civil war would be a greater good.

This cold calculus ignores the very real impact of an American withdrawal on the people we now protect. Any debate that does not consider the bloody reality we would leave in our wake does a disservice to the people of Iraq and the troops who have fought so hard to defend them.

Stretched Too Thin (WP)

By Kevin Ryan

When America's top general in charge of Iraq, John Abizaid, told Congress last month that our Army was unable to increase the number of troops deployed in Iraq, it was a first-of-its-kind admission from a senior defense official: that our ground forces had reached their capacity for military action. "This is not an Army that was built to sustain a 'long war,' " Abizaid told students at a Harvard lecture two days later. This is an Army built to achieve victory with speed and precision. This is a short-war Army fighting a long war.

On Dec. 6, the day after Robert Gates told Congress that he is "open to the possibility of an increase" in the size of our ground forces, the Iraq Study Group released its report, which declared that "America's military capacity is stretched thin." And last week the Army's chief of staff, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, told Congress that the Army is prepared to add up to 7,000 soldiers per year to its ranks if authorized.

The stage has been set for a serious discussion about the appropriate size for our Army: a discussion that should balance resources with demands. Today the 37 combat brigades of the active Army are almost totally consumed by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. With all units either deployed, returning from deployment or preparing to deploy, there are none left to prepare for other contingencies. Active brigades have only 14 months at home before they are recalled for their next 12-month deployment. The National Guard can muster only two or three of its 15 enhanced brigades at any given time, largely because of crippling equipment shortages.

The lack of ground forces has an impact beyond the ability to commit more troops to Iraq. Our published defense strategy requires a military that can defend our homeland, sustain two major wars, be present in key regions abroad and fight a global war on terrorism. With Marine and Army ground forces barely large enough to fight the two major wars, the other security tasks are left to flyovers and ship visits from our Air Force and Navy. According to Schoomaker, America is "on a dangerous path that dictates we must increase our strategic depth, increase readiness and reduce our operational risk." If Afghanistan and Iraq are typical of the two-war capability called for in our defense strategy, our Army must be able to sustain a deployment of 14 brigades. To do this and achieve the Defense Department goal of two years at home for every year in combat, the Army would need 56 brigades in its structure. To meet the demands of homeland defense, foreign presence and a global war on terrorism, one could make a good case that America must be able to sustain an additional five to seven brigades in deployment, which would require 20 to 28 more brigades in the structure.

A rough estimate therefore of active and Guard brigades needed for our defense strategy would be between 76 and 84. And these numbers assume that America's other ground force, the Marine Corps, continues to provide the forces it already does in the Middle East and around the globe. Currently the Army has 52 brigades (37 active and 15 enhanced Guard) and has authority to build to 70 brigades (42 active and 28 Guard), but Congress has not authorized enough troops to man these units.

The 2007 defense budget pays for only 512,000 active-duty soldiers. The Army needs a minimum of 575,000 to man the brigades our defense strategy requires. America must bring its military capabilities back in balance with its strategic demands.

Support is building to correct this mismatch. Colin Powell, the former secretary of state and chairman of the Joint Chiefs, said yesterday that both the Army and Marine Corps need to grow in size. Former Army chief of staff Gordon Sullivan has called for the active Army to have between 560,000 and 600,000 soldiers. Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona has called for the active Army and Marine Corps to increase by 100,000 troops. The United States Army Relief Act, sponsored by Democratic senators Jack Reed, Hillary Clinton, Joe Lieberman and Bill Nelson, calls for an increase in end strength of 20,000 per year over the next four years. These recommendations all bring us closer to the mark.

Throughout the 1980s we recruited an Army of more than 750,000 entirely from volunteers: the same Army that won the Persian Gulf War. It will take several years to recruit additional troops and build the organizations and facilities to house them, but these numbers are well within our reach.

Gunmen Kidnap Aid Workers In Baghdad (AP)

By Christopher Torchia

AP, December 18, 2006

Gunmen in Iraqi army uniforms burst into Red Crescent offices on Sunday and kidnapped more than two dozen people at the humanitarian organization in the latest sign of the country's growing lawlessness.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, in Iraq on his sixth visit since the 2003 invasion, appealed for international support for Iraq's fragile government, saying the bloodshed was being carried out "by the very forces worldwide who are trying to prevent moderation."

Blair and his Iraqi counterpart, Nouri al-Maliki, discussed preparations by British military units in Basra, the main city in southern Iraq, to turn over security to Iraqi forces. Britain expects to withdraw several thousand troops from Iraq next year, despite concerns that Iraqi forces are not ready to keep order on their own.

"Our task — ours, the Americans, the whole of the coalition, the international community and the Iraqis themselves — is to make sure that the forces of terrorism don't defeat the will of the people to have a democracy," Blair said.

In the latest violence, gunmen in five pickup trucks pulled up at the office of the Iraqi Red Crescent in downtown Baghdad and abducted 25 employees, police said. A Red Crescent official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of safety concerns, said the gunmen left women behind.

Pierre Kraehenbuehl, director of operations of the International Committee of the Red Cross, said in Geneva that seven abductees were released. The Dutch Foreign Ministry said three Iraqi security guards at its embassy building in Baghdad — adjacent to the Red Crescent offices — were also kidnapped, but were later released.

The Red Crescent, which is part of the international Red Cross movement, has around 1,000 staff and some 200,000 volunteers in Iraq. It works closely with the International Committee of the Red Cross, which visits detainees and tries to provide food, water and medicine to Iraqis.

"We don't know who they are. We don't know why they did this," said Antonella Notari, a Red Cross spokeswoman in Geneva.

She also said the organization was in contact with the Iraqi Interior Ministry, which denied any involvement and had assured that they were searching for the abductees.

Mazin Abdellaha, secretary-general of the Iraqi Red Crescent, appealed to the kidnappers to release the captives.

"They represent a humanitarian agency that works for the general good, and this agency helps all people regardless of their sect or ethnicity," Abdellaha said.

At least half a dozen mass kidnappings have been carried out in the Iraqi capital this year, possibly by armed groups linked to the sectarian conflict between Sunnis and Shiites.

The abduction comes just days after the organization's vice president, Dr. Jamal al-Karbouli, said American forces represented a greater danger to its work than insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0107048

"The insurgents, they are Iraqis, a lot of them are Iraqis, and they respect the Iraqis. And they respect our (the Red Crescent's) identity, which is neutrality," al-Karbouli said Friday.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, said in response that the U.S.-led coalition forces "strive to ensure they are respectful when they conduct interaction with the local population."

On Thursday, gunmen in military uniforms kidnapped dozens of people in central Baghdad, police said. The attackers drove up to the busy Sanak area in about 10 sport utility vehicles and began rounding up shop owners and bystanders. Police said 50 to 70 people were abducted, but at least two dozen were later released.

On Sunday, the U.S. military said a roadside bomb killed three American soldiers and injured a fourth serviceman north of Baghdad. The soldiers were clearing a route so another unit could move through the area on Saturday, the military said in a statement.

The toll raised to 57 the number of Americans killed in Iraq in December. At least 2,945 members of the U.S. military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

British and Iraqi troops in Basra are conducting a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep aimed at rooting out weapons and militants and launching reconstruction projects. Its completion in the new year will likely trigger an announcement that Britain is slashing its troop numbers.

Britain has some 7,000 troops in Iraq, most based around the city of Basra in the south — the largest commitment of any country after the United States. More than 120 British personnel have died in the country since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 that ousted Saddam Hussein.

"The operation there for the Iraqi forces to take control of security of the city is going well," Blair said.

Late on Sunday afternoon, Blair flew to Basra to visit some of the troops stationed there.

"Our country and other countries like it are having to rediscover what it means to fight for what you believe in," Blair told the soldiers.

"You are not fighting a state, but fighting a set of ideas and ideologies, a group of extremists who share the same perspective," he said.

Among those killed in violence were two policeman, an Iraqi soldier and a municipal official in Baghdad; and a police officer in Kut, southeast of the capital.

Baghdad Red Crescent Workers Abducted (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

— Gunmen wearing Iraqi army uniforms kidnapped more than two dozen people from the Baghdad offices of the Red Crescent humanitarian group on Sunday, and the U.S. military announced the deaths of three more American soldiers.

The gunmen pulled up to the Red Crescent building near downtown Baghdad's Andalus Square about 11:30 a.m. in two police cars and 20 other cars, a spokesman for the aid organization said. Staff members thought the men were police and allowed them to enter the building, he said.

Once inside, the kidnappers separated men from women and abducted an estimated 28 men, according to the spokesman. The victims included Red Crescent staff, visitors and three guards from the Dutch Embassy, which has been vacated but still shares the office, he said.

Red Crescent staff called the Iraqi Interior and Defense ministries and were told neither had troops in the area, said the spokesman, who requested anonymity because of concerns for his safety.

"We do not suspect anyone, as we are a humanitarian organization that does no harm to any bloc," he said.

The Red Crescent, which is affiliated with the International Committee of the Red Cross, has about 1,000 staffers and 200,000 volunteers in Iraq, providing food, water and medicine.

The U.S. military announced Sunday that three U.S. soldiers stationed in Baghdad were killed Saturday by a roadside bomb while on a combat mission north of the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0107049

Their deaths bring the U.S. military toll so far this month to at least 57, on pace to surpass the 69 tallied in November, according to www.icasualties.org, which tracks casualties in the conflict. In October, 106 American soldiers were killed, according to the website.

So far, the website shows, 2,946 American troops have been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion began in March 2003.

Commenting on the dire situation in the war-torn country, former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation" that a temporary increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, an idea under serious consideration by the White House, would probably not quell sectarian violence in Baghdad because U.S. forces are already overextended.

"The American army isn't large enough to secure Baghdad," said Powell, a retired Army general who served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the 1991 Persian Gulf War. "I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purposes of suppressing this communitarian violence, this civil war, will work."

But Tariq Hashimi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents, argued on CNN's "Late Edition" that more U.S. forces were needed in the Iraqi capital. "Iraqi troops, across the board, they are insufficient, incompetent and many of them [are] corrupted," said Hashimi, who met last week with President Bush.

The incoming Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said on ABC's "This Week" that he would support a U.S. troop increase "for two or three months ... [if] it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year."

Also on Sunday, British Prime Minister Tony Blair met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in Baghdad and then with British troops in the southern city of Basra. It was Blair's sixth visit to Iraq since 2003.

Blair commended Maliki's efforts to end sectarian violence and added that British troops would continue to train Iraqi soldiers and police "so that in time the Iraqi people can take full responsibility for their affairs." More than 7,000 British troops are in Iraq, primarily in the south.

During the 24 hours ending Sunday night, meanwhile, Baghdad police found 36 bodies. All of the victims had been shot several times; some had been handcuffed, blindfolded and tortured, according to the Interior Ministry.

Sunni Muslim militias killed at least one woman in attacks on two villages near Taji, about 12 miles north of Baghdad, Taji police said.

Militia members, mainly former fighters loyal to Saddam Hussein, had been sniping and firing mortar shells into the area for the last four days, the police said.

The insurgents set up makeshift checkpoints and burned a house in an effort to evict residents, police said, adding that the woman who was killed had refused to leave.

In the city of Iskandariya, about 25 miles south of Baghdad, two men were killed late Saturday after gunmen opened fire at them, according to a relative who delivered the victims' bodies to police Sunday.

In Hillah, a roadside bomb killed a soldier and injured another Sunday. The U.S. Consulate and an American base in the southern city were hit in a mortar attack, according to police.

Kidnappers Strike Red Crescent's Iraq Office (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 17 -- The kidnappers had left his father's cellphone on a wooden desk in the Iraqi Red Crescent Society office Sunday morning. But Wathiq Adnan did not know that as he stood in the front yard, his face as gloomy as the cold, rain-soaked sky.

Outside the compound, a cluster of police vehicles and four U.S. military Humvees were parked. They had arrived too late to stop the gunmen, who had worn police uniforms and carried police-issued guns, witnesses said.

Inside, a police intelligence officer was questioning Ayad al-Ikabi, a Red Crescent official.

"Were those who were kidnapped from different sects?" asked the official, who wore a dark suit.

"We are all mixed," replied Ikabi, who wore a black leather jacket and had a black pistol tucked into his belt.

Moments later, Ikabi and other officials walked into the two-story, oatmeal-colored office in an affluent section of Karrada, a neighborhood in central Baghdad. Adnan, who works at a different Red Crescent office, followed them.

It has become a familiar story in Baghdad. Gangs of gunmen, dressed in camouflage uniforms and driving official police vehicles, abduct dozens of employees in broad daylight, motivated by sectarian tensions, a bid for ransom or merely a desire to undermine a weak government unable to provide security for its citizens. They leave the women but take the men, then calmly drive off without firing a shot.

Almost the only difference Sunday was the target: a humanitarian organization, linked to the International Committee of the Red Cross, that has helped Iraqis cope in a nation that offers little comfort. The kidnappers took about 25 employees and a few visitors, employees said. The assault began at 11:30 a.m. and ended 15 minutes later.

The office is located in a part of the capital that is surrounded by checkpoints and concrete barriers largely because the Dutch Embassy is nearby. The gunmen also seized three embassy guards as they left.

"I don't know why this happened," Ikabi said before going into the office. "We are not connected to any sect or any political party."

The kidnappings took place less than a mile from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri-al Maliki's residence in the fortified Green Zone, where al-Maliki met with British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Sunday. Blair, who made an unannounced visit to Baghdad, pledged to keep his country's troops in Iraq "until the job is done."

"Don't be under any doubt at all, British troops will remain until the job is done, and that job is building up the Iraqi capability," Blair said, echoing statements by President Bush about U.S. troops.

"I reiterated our determination to stand foursquare behind you and the Iraqi people in ensuring that your democracy is not destroyed by terrorism, by sectarianism, by those who wish to live in hatred rather than peace," Blair said.

Asked about Sunday's kidnapping, and whether the United States and Britain were responsible for the security breakdown, Blair responded testily.

"Who is creating the difficulty in Iraq today?" he asked. "Who is creating the challenges? Who is creating the bloodshed? Terrorists and former supporters of Hussein who are trying to destroy Iraq's new democracy."

The mass abduction Sunday was the third in Baghdad in just over a month. On Thursday, gunmen rounded up about 25 shopkeepers in a busy commercial district. And on Nov. 15, 150 employees were seized from a Ministry of Higher Education agency in Karrada. In both cases, the gunmen wore police or military uniforms, witnesses said.

Abu Kara, whose shop is near the Red Crescent office, said several dusty sedans and pickup trucks with tinted black windows pulled up Sunday morning. Some of the gunmen wore camouflage uniforms while others were in civilian clothes, he said. He quickly stepped into his shop, he recalled, but a couple of gunmen ordered him and three other employees outside and told him to sit on a small white chair outside his store.

"They placed a Kalashnikov to my head," he said. "They were afraid we would use our cellphones to call for help."

The gunmen passed the tall walls of the compound and entered the office through a glass door. They broke down locked doors and sought out the men. According to Ikabi, they stole nothing. Then they left.

"They didn't fire a single shot," Abu Kara said.

Down a short corridor on the first floor, Adnan caught a glimpse of what he considers the important part of what had happened. He walked into the office used by his father, who was in charge of distributing the charity's drugs. On his desk were papers and orange folders, the signs of a busy day interrupted.

That's when Adnan spotted the gray-and-black cellphone with the silver key chain. It showed 12 missed calls.

He picked it up and stared at it. Then it rang.

Adnan answered.

The caller's voice was unfamiliar.

"Who are you? Whom have you called? Abu Wathiq?" Adnan asked.

DOJ_NMG_0107051

The man said he was calling for his father.

"Tell me who you are." Adnan pressed, his voice growing frantic. "I am his son."

The man told him he was a friend of his father's.

Adnan said he would talk to him later. It wasn't the kidnappers.

Then his own phone started to ring. It was a relative. Adnan gave him directions to the Red Crescent office, then walked outside again in a daze.

"I have no idea who would do this," he said. "Only God knows."

"This is not personal," he added. "This is a general thing. It happens all the time in Iraq. There is no security. If there was security, would there be kidnappings?"

His phone rang again. Another relative. More directions.

Clutching his father's cellphone, Adnan walked to the road. Qasim Mahdi had arrived to search for his nephew, Falah, also kidnapped. Falah's sister, who had come with Mahdi, began to scream, then wail and beat her chest. Some local residents took her into their house to comfort her.

Outside, Mahdi raised his hands to the sky.

"Is there a government?" he asked, addressing no one in particular.

Down the street, past the police vehicles, Adnan's phone rang again.

'Unanswered Questions' Cloud Decisions On Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 18, 2006

The chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence says he has traveled to Iraq eight times to assess U.S. intelligence collection, and each time he returns to Washington struck by the lack of knowledge about the insurgency that is killing hundreds of American troops.

"When I come back from Iraq, or even a briefing here, you learn how tough intelligence is," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican. "I don't walk out of there believing that I've got a crystal-clear picture of what the insurgency is, what the scope of it is, what the magnitude is, what the capabilities are. How much is international? How much is external? How much is al Qaeda? How much is Iranian? How much is Syrian? I walk out with lots of unanswered questions."

The fact that U.S. command lacks broad knowledge about the enemy in Iraq, in the opinion of Mr. Hoekstra and others, has brought a steady stream of criticism.

Most recently, the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, reported, "Our government still does not understand very well either the insurgency in Iraq or the role of the militias."

The Iraq Study Group report said intelligence agencies "are not doing enough to map the insurgency, dissect it and understand it on a national and provincial level. The analytic community's knowledge of the organization, leadership, financing and operations of militias, as well as their relationship to government security forces, also falls far short of what policy-makers need to know."

Defense sources have told The Washington Times that when field commanders return to the U.S. from Iraq, one of their chief complaints is a lack on information about the enemy.

Michael Ledeen, a military analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, said the U.S. will never gain the full support of the Iraqi people, and thus better tips, until the locals are confident of a U.S. victory.

"For people to think we have a good chance to win, they have to see us beating Iran and Syria," said Mr. Ledeen, referring to the two countries supporting the insurgency. "We will never have the full cooperation of the people of Iraq until people see we are waging war against Iran and Syria."

He said the Bush administration, which is reviewing Iraq strategy, should start by helping foment insurrection against Iran's hard-line Islamic leaders and provide support to dissidents in Syria.

The Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency labeled as "inaccurate" the Iraq Study Group's assertion that the DIA had fewer than 10 analysts with more than two years of experience examining the insurgency. The agency said it has more than 300 analysts focused on Iraq, 49 of whom look exclusively at the insurgency.

"DIA is committed to providing the best possible military intelligence to the men and women in uniform and to the nation in its ongoing war against terrorism and extremism," the agency said.

Mr. Hoekstra is sympathetic toward the intelligence community's challenge in Iraq.

"I think you have to take a look at it two ways," he said. "You have to take a look at it and say, 'The intelligence may be terrible, but does that mean the intelligence capability is terrible?' It just may be very, very hard."

He added, "This is one of the things I do have an appreciation with the intelligence community on, is that the standard has been, the information you give us has to be as clear as 'two plus two is four.' Anything less than that gold standard of giving us perfect information means that the intelligence is terrible. ... Sometimes I sense that policy-makers believe if they get perfect information from intelligence, it gives them the answer as to what to do. That is not going to happen. You'll only have more or less information with which to make a decision."

Blair Urges Support For Iraq Government (AP)

By Jill Lawless

AP, December 18, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair took his Middle East peace tour to Iraq on Sunday, urging support for its fragile government and seeking to draw the violence-wracked country into his vision of a global battle against extremism.

Standing in front of a Lynx helicopter in a cavernous hangar, Blair told some of the 7,000 British troops serving in southern Iraq they were fighting on behalf of "people of tolerance and moderation" around the world.

"This is real conflict, real battle, and it is a different kind of enemy — not fighting a state, but fighting a set of ideas and ideologies, a group of extremists who share the same perspectives," Blair said. "What we need to try to do is build an alliance of moderate people against the extreme."

Blair is President Bush's staunchest ally in the Iraq war, and Britain has some 7,000 troops in Iraq, most based around Basra in the south. It's the largest troop commitment of any country after the United States.

During what has become an annual holiday-season visit to the region, Blair told troops that extremism was causing havoc in neighborhoods from Basra to London — a reference to the July 2005 transit bombings in the British capital that killed 52 people.

"The crazy thing about today's world is it actually comes back to our own streets," he said. "All over the world the same struggle is going on, and if we don't stand up and fight for the people of tolerance and moderation who want to live together, whatever their fate, then the people of hatred and sectarianism will triumph."

Battling extremism has been the theme of Blair's trip to the region, which has included stops in Turkey and Egypt. He arrived in Israel Sunday night, and will later travel to the Palestinian territories and the United Arab Emirates.

Blair's visit to Baghdad early Sunday was a surprise stop on his tour, designed to demonstrate support for the fragile attempts to halt Iraq's seemingly unstoppable bloodshed.

After meetings with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Blair urged the international community to ensure that democracy is not defeated by terrorism. But as he flew into the heavily fortified Green Zone aboard a military helicopter, news broke of the latest violent episode — a mass kidnapping carried out by gunmen in Iraqi army uniforms at the office of the Iraqi Red Crescent aid organization.

Blair insisted Iraq has made progress since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

"The first time I arrived in this country there was no proper functioning democracy. Today there is," Blair said at a joint news conference with al-Maliki. "Our task — ours, the Americans, the whole of the coalition, the international community and the Iraqis themselves — is to make sure that the forces of terrorism don't defeat the will of the people to have a democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0107053

The trip — Blair's sixth to Iraq since the U.S.-led 2003 invasion — was not announced in advance for security reasons. The British leader also met with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and senior U.S. officials in Baghdad.

Iraq's Sunnis 'risk Ethnic Cleansing' (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, December 18, 2006

Vice-president Tariq al-Hashimi, Iraq's most senior politician from the Sunni Arab minority, said on Sunday that more US troops were needed in Baghdad to stop the "systematic cleansing" of the Sunni community by Shia militias.

Some 3,000 Iraqis were fleeing the country daily and Iraqi forces were insufficient, incompetent and corrupted, he said. There is intense speculation in Washington that President George W. Bush will propose "surging" some 30,000 more US troops into Iraq in a last-ditch effort to secure the city and Anbar province.

However, in an interview broadcast by CNN, Mr Hashimi said there was "no consensus" between the US and Iraq on how to tackle security. He also said the Bush administration had told him last week that US troops were "insufficient to handle the security as required in Baghdad".

Colin Powell, former secretary of state, agreed. "We have tried this surge of troops over the summer. I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purposes of suppressing this communitarian violence, this civil war, will work."

Saudis Report Shi'ite 'State' Inside Of Iraq (WT)

By Sharon Behn, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 18, 2006

Iran has effectively created a Shi'ite "state within a state" in neighboring Iraq, defying both Iraqi Sunnis and neighboring Sunni nations, according to a Saudi security report.

Iranian military forces are providing Shi'ite militias with weapons and training, Iranian charities are pouring funds into schools and hospitals, and Tehran is actively supporting pro-Iranian Iraqi politicians, the report said.

"Where the Americans have failed, the Iranians have stepped in," said the report by the Saudi National Security Assessment Project, a Riyadh-based consultancy commissioned by the Saudi government to provide security and intelligence assessments.

The report, submitted to the Saudi government in March, has not been publicly distributed.

Citing interviews with intelligence and military officials in Iraq and surrounding region, the report states that the Sunni insurgency numbers about 77,000, while the Shi'ite militia forces total about 35,000.

According to the report, Iran also is infiltrating Iraq through its al Quds forces -- the special command division of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) -- which specialize in intelligence operations in unconventional warfare.

RAND Corp. senior defense analyst Ed O'Connell said the Iranian intelligence was trying to counter Saddam Hussein's former formidable spy network, Iraqi Intelligence Service (IIS), or the Mukhabarat. Under Saddam's regime, he said, roughly one of every six Iraqi adults was a paid or unpaid informant -- a network that did not disappear with the arrival of the U.S.-led coalition.

"The real story in Iraq is this below-the-surface 'unconventional war' between the old IIS, which could become a more overt Saudi proxy -- and the al Quds special directorate intelligence-counterintelligence," Mr. O'Connell said.

The Saudi security report was directed by Nawaf Obaid -- who recently was fired for writing an article in The Washington Post warning that Saudi Arabia would not stand idly by and allow Iraq's Shi'ites to destroy its Sunni population.

Washington diplomats and analysts say Mr. Obaid's dismissal was more window-dressing than a real punitive action.

The report states that the Iranian levers of influence in Iraq include a broad network of informants, military and logistical support of armed groups, and social welfare campaigns.

It adds that Tehran has "sought to influence Iraq's political process by giving support to new various parties, in particular, to the SCIRI," or Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the leading Shi'ite party.

DOJ_NMG_0107054

Analysts say some Saudi citizens are raising funds for Sunni insurgents.

"I have heard them say it is not hard to line up a couple hundred thousand dollars and send it to the insurgents across the border," said Isobel Coleman, a senior fellow at the Council for Foreign Relations.

Despite claims by SCIRI leader that the party's private militia, the Iran-backed Badr Organization, formerly known as the Badr Brigade, has surrendered its weapons, gun-toting Badr members are still visible on the streets of Baghdad.

The Saudi study says the Badr Organization is still about 25,000-strong, and the party has roughly 3 million supporters. Anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, is thought to number just under 10,000, while his party has the support of about 1.5 million Shi'ites.

"Each of these groups is beholden in some way to Iran and has ties to its intelligence and security services," the report says.

It adds: "Recent intelligence indicates that IRGC officers are currently operating in Iraq certain Shi'ite militias and actual army and police units."

U.S. officials have acknowledged that Shi'ite militias have infiltrated the police, but stopped short of saying that there is direct Iranian involvement in the security forces.

Mrs. Coleman cautions that the report, while not necessarily inaccurate, is not impartial.

"It is alarmist about the Iranians, and Mr. Obaid comes with a bias. Not that it is wrong, but it is not unbiased," she said.

The Saudi study was the result of five months of cooperation with Iraq and neighboring countries and dozens of interviews with current military and intelligence officials in the region, Mr. Obaid wrote in the preface to the 40-page report.

"Ordinary police and military officers now have a stronger allegiance to the Badr Organization or the Mahdi Army than to their own units," the report says, adding that the Badr Organization is the "key vehicle Iran is using to achieve its military, security and intelligence aims."

The study also provides details on the Sunni insurgency. It cites Iraqi tribal leaders as saying that the insurgency is run mainly by former commanders and high-level military officers of the Ba'athist regime. Only a smaller group is religiously inspired and includes foreign fighters.

Of the 77,000 active members of the insurgency, the "jihadis" number about 17,000, of which some 5,000 are from North Africa, Sudan, Yemen, Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

The remaining 60,000 are members of the former military or Saddam's paramilitary Fedayeen forces. The officer corps of the insurgency has "command and control facilities in Syria as well as bases in strategic locations, where Sunnis constitute the majority of the urban population."

Given the centuries-old tribal, familial and religious ties between Iraq's Sunnis and Saudi Arabia, the assessment concludes that "Saudi Arabia has a special responsibility to ensure the continued welfare and security of Sunnis in Iraq."

Its recommendations to the Saudi government included a comprehensive strategy that would include overt and covert components to deal with the worst-case scenario of full-blown civil war.

It also calls on the government to communicate the assessment to the United States; make it clear to Iran that if its covert activities did not stop the Saudi leadership would counter them; and extend an invitation to the highest Iraqi Shi'ite leader, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, to reassure the Shi'ite community.

Clandestine Military Teams Clash With CIA, Allies (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Special Forces teams sent overseas on secret spying missions have clashed with the CIA and carried out operations in countries that are staunch U.S. allies, prompting a new effort by the agency and the Pentagon to tighten the rules for military units engaged in espionage, according to senior U.S. intelligence and military officials.

DOJ_NMG_0107055

The spy missions are part of a highly classified program that officials say has better positioned the United States to track terrorist networks and capture or kill enemy operatives in regions such as the Horn of Africa, where weak governments are unable to respond to emerging threats.

But the initiative has also led to several embarrassing incidents for the United States, including a shootout in Paraguay and the exposure of a sensitive intelligence operation in East Africa, according to current and former officials familiar with the matter. And to date, the Special Forces espionage effort has not led to the capture of a significant terrorism suspect.

Some intelligence officials have complained that Special Forces teams have sometimes launched missions without informing the CIA, duplicating or even jeopardizing existing operations. And they questioned deploying military teams in friendly nations -- including in Europe -- at a time when combat units are in short supply in war zones.

The program was approved in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks by Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, and is expected to get close scrutiny by his successor, Robert M. Gates, who takes over Monday and has been critical of the expansion of the military's intelligence operations.

Senior officials at the CIA and the Pentagon defended the program and said they would urge Gates to support it. But they acknowledged risks for the United States in its growing reliance on Special Forces troops and other military units for espionage.

"We are at war out there and frankly we need all the help that we can get," said Marine Maj. Gen. Michael E. Ennis, who since February has served as a senior CIA official in charge of coordinating human intelligence operations with the military. "But at the same time we have to be very careful that we don't disrupt established relationships with other governments, with their liaison services, or [do] anything that would embarrass the United States."

Ennis acknowledged "really egregious mistakes" in the program, but said collaboration has improved between the CIA and the military.

"What we are seeing now, primarily, are coordination problems," Ennis said in an interview with the Los Angeles Times. "And really, they are fewer and fewer."

The issue underscores the sensitivity of using elite combat forces for espionage missions that have traditionally been the domain of the CIA.

After Sept. 11, the Bush administration gave expanded authority to the Special Operations Command, which oversees the Army Green Berets, Navy SEALs and other elite units, in the fight against terrorism. At the same time, Rumsfeld, who lacked confidence in the CIA, directed a major expansion of the military's involvement in intelligence gathering to make the Pentagon less dependent on the agency.

Officials said this led to the secret deployment of small teams of Special Forces troops, known as military liaison elements, or MLEs, to American embassies to serve as intelligence operatives. Members of the teams undergo special training in espionage at Ft. Bragg and other facilities, according to officials familiar with the program.

The troops typically work in civilian clothes and function much like CIA case officers, cultivating sources in other governments or Islamic organizations. One objective, officials said, is to generate information that could be used to plan clandestine operations such as capturing or killing terrorism suspects.

In a written response to questions from the Times, a spokesman for the Special Operations Command in Tampa, Fla., described MLEs as "individuals or small teams that deploy in support of (regional military commanders) in select countries, and always with the U.S. ambassador and country team's concurrence and support."

But critics point to a series of incidents in recent years that have caused diplomatic problems for the United States.

In 2004, members of an MLE team operating in Paraguay shot and killed an armed assailant who tried to rob them outside a bar, said former intelligence officials familiar with the incident. U.S. officials removed the members of the team from the country, the officials said.

In another incident, members of a team in East Africa were arrested by the local government after their espionage activity was discovered.

"It was a compromised surveillance activity," said a former senior CIA official familiar with the incident. The official said members of the unit "got rolled up by locals and we got them out." The former official declined to name the country or provide other details.

He said it was an isolated example of an operation that was exposed, but that coordination problems were frequent.

"They're pretty freewheeling," the former CIA official said of the military teams. It was not uncommon, he said, for CIA station chiefs to learn of military intelligence operations only after they were underway, and that many conflicted with existing operations being carried out by the CIA or the foreign country's intelligence service.

Such problems "really are quite costly," said John Brennan, who was director of the National Counterterrorism Center before retiring from government last year. "It can cost peoples' lives, can cost sensitive programs and can set back foreign policy interests."

Brennan declined to comment on specific incidents.

There have also been questions about where teams have been sent. Although conceived to bolster the U.S. presence in global trouble spots, the units have carried out operations in friendly nations in Europe and Southeast Asia where it is more difficult to justify, officials said.

On at least one occasion, a team tracked an Islamic militant in Europe. "They were trying to acquire certain information about a certain individual," said a former high-ranking U.S. intelligence official who spoke on condition of anonymity. The official declined to name the country, but said it was a NATO ally and that the host government was unaware of the mission.

Critics said such operations risk angering U.S. allies with a dubious prospect for payoff. In some countries where MLE teams are located, "There's not a chance ... we're going to send somebody in there to snatch somebody unilaterally," said a government official familiar with the program.

At a time when the military is stretched thin, the official questioned the priority of using Special Forces for espionage, noting that the MLE program has not produced a significant success in terms of disrupting a plot or capturing a terrorist suspect.

"These are a highly trained, short-supply resource of the U.S. government," the official said. "What ... are they doing there instead of Pakistan or Afghanistan?"

Gates, the former director of the CIA poised to run the Pentagon, has voiced concern over the military's encroachment on CIA missions. In an opinion piece published this year, Gates said that "more than a few CIA veterans, including me, are unhappy about the dominance of the Defense Dept. in the intelligence arena and the decline in the CIA's central role."

In response to such conflicts, the administration previously designated the CIA director as the head of all U.S. human-spying operations overseas, with CIA station chiefs serving as coordinators in specific countries.

Ennis, whose position at the CIA was created last year, said the agency and the Pentagon are developing a more rigorous system for screening proposed military intelligence operations.

"Like a pilot with a checklist," CIA station chiefs will be required to sign off on all aspects of a proposed military intelligence operation before it is allowed to proceed, Ennis said. The CIA station chief, he added, "would look at the risk in terms of embarrassment to the government. Do they have the right level of training to do what they claim that they want to do, and is this already being done somewhere else?"

Col. Samuel Taylor, director of public affairs for the Special Operations Command, dismissed the suggestion of coordination problems with other agencies, saying, "We have an excellent, effective and productive working relationship with the CIA."

France To Pull Troops Fighting Against Taliban In Afghanistan (NYT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0107057

PARIS, Dec. 17 (AP) — France announced on Sunday that it intended to withdraw its approximately 200 troops, all of them special forces, from a southern Afghan city, where they are taking part with NATO troops in a counterinsurgency operation.

Despite the strong engagement by 32,800 NATO troops, fighters allied with the country's former Taliban rulers have been gaining strength.

France has been reluctant to have its forces in Afghanistan, a total of 1,100 troops, serve outside the relatively safe Afghan capital, Kabul. The decision would remove elite troops based in the southeastern city of Jalalabad.

"There is a general reorganization" of the French troops, Defense Minister Michèle Alliot-Marie said during a visit to Afghanistan. Her remarks were broadcast on France-Info radio.

Among planned changes is a "withdrawal of special forces from Jalalabad in the coming weeks," she said.

The NATO contingent will remain in Afghanistan, Capt. Sébastien Caron, the Defense Ministry press officer, said in Paris.

On Saturday, Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said that Afghan, American, Canadian, British and Dutch forces had done most of the fighting in Afghanistan over the past year at a time when ambushes, suicide bombings and other attacks had multiplied. Those nations have also borne the brunt of the casualties. Senator McCain called on NATO nations to send troops into more dangerous areas of Afghanistan.

The violence in Afghanistan this year has been the heaviest since the fall of the Taliban, in late 2001, with especially heavy fighting in the southern part of the country, and suicide attacks and roadside bombs.

The elite French troops have been deployed in southeastern Afghanistan since July 2003 to help in the fight against fighters believed to be linked to Al Qaeda and the Taliban and to help search for Al Qaeda's leader, Osama bin Laden.

Captain Caron said the decision to withdraw the special forces was made "in concert with our partners, notably the Americans."

Ms. Alliot-Marie said that France intended to maintain its air power, "which has backed up coalition forces numerous times," and that it was adding two helicopters in the zone between Jalalabad and Kabul.

She said that France also planned to train Afghan special forces "because it appears important to us that the Afghans see that it is their own forces which are retaking the theater" of war.

French Unit To Leave Afghanistan (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

PARIS, Dec. 17 -- France on Sunday announced the withdrawal of its 200-member contingent of elite special forces from Afghanistan -- all of its ground forces directly engaged in anti-terrorism operations in the country.

The elite troops have been deployed in Afghanistan since July 2003 to help bolster the fight against al-Qaeda and the Taliban militia.

A contingent of 1,100 French troops deployed under NATO command will remain in the capital, Kabul, Capt. Sebastien Caron, press officer for the French Defense Ministry, said in Paris.

Defense Minister Michele Alliot-Marie, on a visit to Afghanistan, announced "a general reorganization" of troops that includes a "withdrawal of special forces from Jalalabad in the coming weeks." Her remarks were aired on France-Info radio.

The decision comes during a resurgence by the Taliban, which has stepped up its attacks on NATO's International Security Assistance Force in recent months.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said Saturday that Afghan, U.S., Canadian, British and Dutch forces have done most of the fighting over the past year, as ambushes, suicide bombings and other attacks have multiplied.

At a large gathering with Afghan President Hamid Karzai in this southern city last Tuesday, Abdul Ghafar sat among hundreds in the audience, clutching a piece of paper. On it were the names of 20 members of his family killed two months ago in a NATO airstrike.

"This was my uncle's family. Eleven children, six women, and three innocent men were killed. He lost everyone but one small girl," he said. Mr. Ghafar was hoping to receive compensation from the Afghan government. "We got nothing," he said.

Ghafar's extended family in the southern Panjwai district are among the nearly 4,000 people killed since the beginning of 2006 in a Taliban resurgence that is using civilians as human shields against escalating NATO air attacks.

The US-based Human Rights Watch estimates that more than 1,000 of those killed were civilians. A recent spate of suicide bombings here has stoked public anger even further.

The increased violence has left NATO generals begging for more troop contributions from reluctant member nations. Just Sunday, the French defense minister announced plans to withdraw the 200 special forces troops deployed under US command in southeastern Afghanistan.

But with so few boots on the ground, the increased reliance on air power has led to thousands of civilian deaths. The devastating air offenses are undermining support for the Afghan government, say human rights workers and Afghan officials, and are turning public opinion in the four southern provinces of Afghanistan against NATO forces, who took command of the south from the US in August.

The US Air Force dropped 987 bombs between June and November and fired some 146,000 cannon rounds as air support for NATO allies in the south. US aircraft fired more bombs in the first six months of this year than in the first three years of its campaign against the Taliban, according to figures released by the Pentagon.

President Karzai's meeting last Tuesday of NATO and US generals, ambassadors, and Afghan ministers in Kandahar - southern Afghanistan's largest city and a former Taliban stronghold - was an attempt to examine better methods for tackling the insurgency and curbing civilian deaths.

But even as top military officials met, NATO troops posted at a checkpoint in Kandahar shot and killed a local tribal elder who was driving a motorbike. The man had failed to heed warning signals as he drove to the meeting with Karzai.

The Tuesday visit came three days after Karzai wept openly on national television about his helplessness to protect the Afghan people from US, NATO, and Taliban violence.

"We can't prevent the coalition from bombing the terrorists, and our children are dying because of that," he said with tears in his eyes during a speech to mark International Human Rights Day, Dec. 10. At the Kandahar meeting, Karzai saved some of his harshest criticism for his Pakistani neighbors, a country he says has been actively helping the Taliban.

"The problem is not Taliban, we don't see it that way," Karzai told reporters. "The problem is with Pakistan."

"NATO's strategy has eroded support for its mission as well as for Karzai - nothing could be more telling than Karzai weeping and complaining about NATO killing Afghan civilians," says Sam Zia-Zarifi, Asia research director for Human Rights Watch.

"We are extremely worried - it hurts us, it hurts Afghan civilians. We are worried by it, NATO is also worried by it, and we are working together to reduce such casualties," President Karzai told reporters in Kandahar. "We know that is damaging to our image, and more importantly we do not want to harm innocent people."

In contrast to the US, NATO has no unified approach to compensating civilians killed during fighting, instead placing the financial burden on the individual nations engaged in the fiercest fighting in the south: Canada, Britain, the Netherlands, and Romania.

By providing much-needed financial aid for the families of victims killed by airstrikes, the Taliban has been able to garner support in the southern provinces, says Sarah Holewinski of the Campaign for Innocent Victims in Conflict (CIVIC), a Washington-based human rights group.

"If NATO doesn't find a way to win the trust and support of the Afghan people, the Taliban will," she says. "In fact they already are."

Fighting against Taliban insurgents who are dressed in civilian clothes and hidden among the civilian population is a difficult task. But the sharp escalation in violence has many southern Afghans asking whether NATO troops are making their lives safer or, ultimately, more dangerous.

Many Afghans in Kandahar say that they would prefer NATO convoys to avoid the city, because they act as magnets for suicide bombs and the NATO soldiers tend to shoot indiscriminately into crowds.

"When we see a military convoy coming we stop our car and leave it where it is. We run and we hide," says Neamatullah, who fled his village in the nearby Panjwai suburb after NATO airstrikes in May killed dozens of civilians. "Both sides are fighting each other for power," he says. "But our lives and homes are ruined."

Conservatives' Grip On Key Virginia Court Is At Risk (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

A growing list of vacancies on the federal appeals court in Richmond is heightening concern among Republicans that one of the nation's most conservative and influential courts could soon come under moderate or even liberal control, Republicans and legal scholars say.

A number of prominent Republican appointees have left or announced plans to leave the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which has played a key role in terrorism cases and has long been known for forceful conservative rulings and judicial personalities.

Republican concerns also are fueled by the pending Democratic takeover of Congress, as several of President Bush's 4th Circuit nominees were already bottled up in the Senate when Republicans ran it. From the GOP's perspective, the situation now will worsen.

The 4th Circuit's rulings affect everyone who lives, works or owns a business in the area, which encompasses Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and the Carolinas. The court's influence also has been widely felt nationally, and the emerging battle over it is part of a broader struggle for control of the federal judiciary.

"I think everyone is concerned because the 4th Circuit literally hangs in the balance here," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative American Center for Law and Justice, who has advised the White House on judicial nominees. "With the nature of the cases the court has been taking, especially on the terrorism issue, its direction is really critical."

Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice, said the new political landscape will force Bush to work closely with Democrats "to pick fair and open-minded judges who don't lean either to the right or the left" if he wants to get the administration's nominees confirmed. "If there were any way to appoint judges to move the 4th Circuit in a more moderate direction, that would be beneficial to both the circuit and to the country," she said.

The 15-member court has three vacancies, and a fourth judgeship will open in July. That would leave the bench with six Republican and five Democratic appointees by summer. In addition, one of those six Republican appointees has announced plans to take senior status as soon as a replacement can be confirmed. Senior judges receive full pay and hear cases but can take a reduced workload and are not considered active-service members of the court.

Some of the 4th Circuit's best-known rulings, upheld by the Supreme Court, include striking down a law allowing rape victims to sue their attackers in federal court and preventing the Food and Drug Administration from regulating tobacco.

In 1999, the 4th Circuit overturned the requirement that police read suspects their rights before interrogating them. The Supreme Court later reaffirmed the Miranda rights.

During the Bush administration, the 4th Circuit has been the court of choice on national security, issuing key rulings that backed the government on the detention of enemy combatants and the prosecution of Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator

Zacarias Moussaoui. The court's conservative majority has included some of the nation's most prominent judges, including J. Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson III.

Jan LaRue, chief counsel for Concerned Women for America, said she and other conservatives are disappointed with Bush and Senate Republicans for not pushing harder to fill the vacancies before losing control of the Senate.

"Now all they've done is managed to kick the can down the road, and we've lost the majority," said LaRue, whose group advocates for conservative jurists. "That circuit in the wrong hands could certainly move toward the center-left."

White House officials blamed Senate Democrats for the logjam. "The president has nominated several highly qualified people to fill vacancies on the 4th Circuit, and the Democrats have succeeded in each instance in blocking them," White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said. "We will continue to work to find highly qualified nominees and look forward to their confirmations."

The overall struggle for control of the federal courts is expected to grow even fiercer as Democrats take charge of the Senate with a razor-thin majority, assuming that Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), who has been hospitalized in recent days, continues in office. Although some conservatives blame Bush for failing to reshape the lower courts as effectively as he has the Supreme Court, others are joining him in aiming frustration at Democrats, who have used their minority power to block 4th Circuit and other appointments.

A victory by a Democrat in the 2008 presidential election, Republicans and legal experts say, could accelerate a philosophical shift in the court. "Imagine the people Hillary Clinton would appoint to the 4th Circuit," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond.

The first of the current 4th Circuit vacancies has lingered since 1994, when Judge J. Dickson Phillips Jr. took senior status. Bush's nominee, U.S. District Judge Terrence W. Boyle Jr., has not overcome strong Democratic opposition.

In 2000, Judge Francis D. Murnaghan Jr. died. Bush nominated Virginia conservative Claude A. Allen in 2003, but he also was blocked by Democrats. Allen later resigned as Bush's top domestic policy adviser and pleaded guilty to shoplifting charges. Bush has not nominated anyone else for that vacancy.

Conservatives were then shocked when Luttig resigned in May to take a top corporate job at Boeing Co. Bush has nominated no one to replace him. Chief Judge William W. Wilkins Jr., a Ronald Reagan appointee who was the first chairman of the U.S. Sentencing Commission, recently announced that he will take senior status in July, creating a fourth vacancy. The new chief judge will be Karen Williams of South Carolina, the court's first female chief judge. She was appointed by President George H.W. Bush.

Another Republican appointee, H. Emory Widener Jr., 83, is planning to take senior status when his successor is confirmed. But Bush's nominee, Pentagon general counsel William J. Haynes II, has drawn strong opposition from Democrats and even from Republican Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.).

Even though the 11 judges who would remain by summer are split 6-5 in favor of Republican appointees, some court observers say that Democrats might gain effective control because Judge Allyson K. Duncan often votes with the court's moderate-to-liberal bloc. She was appointed by Bush in 2003, with strong support from John Edwards, a former Democratic senator from North Carolina and vice presidential candidate.

Yet predicting the court's precise direction is difficult. University of Pittsburgh law professor Arthur Hellman, for example, said two Clinton appointees -- judges William B. Traxler Jr. and Robert B. King -- are "fairly conservative." Hellman and some Republicans expressed surprise that Bush has not moved to fill Luttig's seat and keeps renominating Boyle and Haynes when they couldn't win confirmation in a Republican-led Senate.

Federal Rules Make Storing E-mail Mandatory (MH)

By Thomas J. Meeks

The Miami Herald, December 18, 2006

If your business is sued for copyright infringement, restraint of trade or employment discrimination, having a means in place to track electronic data is critical to successfully defending the case. Otherwise, you're likely to lose -- and pay hefty damages -- even before stepping into a federal courtroom.

DOJ_NMG_0107061

On Dec. 1, new federal rules went into effect creating a legal obligation for Florida business owners to store their e-mail messages and other electronic documents for use on demand. The rules are mandatory in all federal cases, including copyright or trademark infringement matters, securities or antitrust claims, cases involving the Americans with Disabilities Act and other employment lawsuits.

Under the new rules, both parties in a lawsuit must disclose their electronically stored information, along with any other materials they plan to use to prove their cases.

That means Florida business owners need to know exactly what information is stored on their networks, individual computers and electronic archives -- and how that information can be used to support their legal position.

Small-business owners can no longer use the excuse that they have not been able to go through their e-mail archives in time for the initial disclosures.

Therefore, the failure to produce information may prevent business owners from using that information, which may be the best evidence in their favor at the trial.

What should you do as a small-business owner? Consult with legal counsel in advance rather than waiting to respond to a lawsuit and risk having important evidence excluded from your case. A lawyer will institute litigation hold procedures to preserve relevant electronic information if your business becomes the target of a lawsuit or if you file a lawsuit as the plaintiff. Holding and reviewing electronic data does not necessarily mean every file is delivered to the opposing attorney. That depends on the legal strategy in the case. But preserving electronic data prevents the opposing attorney from arguing that the business owner allowed vital evidence to be destroyed.

Florida's small-business owners must understand that all the e-mails and electronic files transmitted through their company's network and the Internet are now potential evidence in a federal lawsuit. Having effective processes in place to preserve and access this data is now one of the fundamental elements of any successful courtroom strategy.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ethics Hurdle Corruption Scandal At Siemens May Derail Restructuring Drive (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

FRANKFURT -- When turnaround artist Klaus Kleinfeld became chief executive of storied German conglomerate Siemens AG in early 2005, he vowed to shake things up.

Nearly two years later, Mr. Kleinfeld finds himself under intense pressure, haunted by his company's past. A widening money-laundering and bribery investigation is shining a harsh spotlight on management and threatening to unravel his aggressive restructuring drive.

Europe's largest engineering company said last week it has found about half a billion dollars in suspicious transactions spanning the past seven years -- twice the amount German authorities flagged in November after more than 200 police raided the offices and homes of employees. Prosecutors in Germany, Italy and Switzerland suspect company officials were running an elaborate network of secret bank accounts and sham consulting contracts to bribe potential customers, and more managers and employers could face arrest as the investigation continues. If authorities find that Siemens didn't do enough to thwart the alleged scheme -- or that senior management condoned it -- the company could face costly lawsuits and bans on lucrative public-sector contracts.

The cross-border investigation is focusing on alleged wrongdoing at the financially troubled telecommunications unit, the same unit Mr. Kleinfeld has been trying to dismantle rapidly to boost profits. That effort was thrown further into doubt last week after Siemens and Nokia Corp. of Finland, citing the criminal probe, said they would delay the planned merger1 of their network carrier businesses, which will have combined revenue of $12.23 billion.

Prosecutors say Mr. Kleinfeld is a witness in the fraud investigation, not a suspect. But the scandal represents the latest and biggest distraction for the 49-year-old executive. He spent much of the autumn wrestling with fallout from an ill-timed salary hike and a messy divestment that brought a barrage of criticism from unions and politicians. It also raises serious questions about oversight at the company, which books more than $100 billion in annual revenue.

The mounting challenges for Mr. Kleinfeld at the helm of the 159-year-old concern highlight how tough it is to push through radical change in corporate Germany, where a manager's hands often are tied by a culture of consensus and traditions don't die easily. The challenge may be particularly acute at Siemens, which is involved in huge infrastructure projects around the world and has faced a series of corruption allegations involving overseas sales practices.

Mr. Kleinfeld told investors in a conference call last week that Siemens had beefed up its compliance procedures in recent years. Still, he acknowledged the suspicious transactions that have been uncovered thus far are "quite staggering" and that Siemens needs to do more. "I want to make one thing crystal clear here: There is a zero tolerance policy by the management," he said.

Though his job is not seen to be in immediate jeopardy, Mr. Kleinfeld has been increasingly subjected to public criticism in recent weeks -- a far cry from two years ago, when a German magazine christened him "Wonder Boy" on its cover.

Mr. Kleinfeld, who declined to be interviewed for this article, was raised in working-class surroundings of the Bremen shipyards in northern Germany. He made his biggest mark in New York City, where he headed Siemens's U.S. unit from 2002 until the end of 2003 and quickly brought the huge, money-losing operation into the black by shuttering divisions and slashing more than 10,000 jobs. "It was kind of brutal, but it was exciting," recalls Scott Moyer, a former Siemens executive in the U.S. "We really wonder if he slept."

Mr. Kleinfeld didn't slow down when he returned to the head office in Munich in January of 2005 to succeed Heinrich von Pierer. He vowed that each of the company's dozen units -- which make everything from medical scanners and steam turbines to high-speed trains and light bulbs -- would meet ambitious profit margin targets by the spring of 2007 to finally bring them in line with top industry peers. Soon after, Mr. Kleinfeld announced that 5,400 jobs at the information-technology unit -- more than 10% of the unit's work force -- would be cut, including 2,400 jobs in Germany.

He moved quickly to reshape the company's portfolio to better capitalize on what he calls "megatrends" of the 21st century: growing urbanization, dwindling resources and aging populations. The company made a string of acquisitions in areas like medical diagnostics, water-filtration systems and clean-energy technologies.

At the same time Mr. Kleinfeld brought the ax down on the sacred -- if sickly -- cow of Siemens: its money-losing telecom-equipment unit. The division, Siemens's biggest, was embedded in the DNA of a company that started out making telegraphs. Shutting down entire divisions in Germany, where workers enjoy strong protections and can demand hefty severance packages, also is difficult and costly. He paid Taiwan's BenQ Corp. to take the struggling wireless-handset business off his hands last year.

He took an even bigger step in June of this year, agreeing to fold most of the remainder of the telecom business into a 50-50 joint venture with Nokia. After that deal and the planned sale of its enterprise networks business, which supplies telecom equipment to corporate clients, the rest of Siemens's telecom operations will be absorbed by other parts of the company.

In the process, Mr. Kleinfeld, who reports to a supervisory board of shareholder and labor representatives, antagonized workers at a company that is one of Germany's biggest employers. He sent emails in English to workers who quickly came to regard him as a ruthless American-style capitalist only interested in the company's bottom line and its share price. "Morale is very low," says Wolfgang Müller, a union representative on Siemens's supervisory board. "A lot of workers feel that no job, no business within the company is safe anymore."

Dissatisfaction bubbled over in September, when workers learned that Mr. Kleinfeld and other members of the management board would receive a 30% salary increase. A few days later, BenQ Mobile, the handset unit that Siemens had unloaded a year earlier, filed for bankruptcy. Labor leaders accused Siemens of not having done enough to protect the unit's 3,000 German workers during the sale process.

The political firestorm quickly spread. The country's best-selling tabloid published a picture of a grinning Mr. Kleinfeld on its cover alongside the headline "The Ruinator." Chancellor Angela Merkel urged Siemens to step in with help. Trying to quell the criticism, Siemens announced it would set up a $26.75 million fund to benefit workers at the unit -- even though the unit no longer belonged to Siemens.

Mr. Kleinfeld, acknowledging executives had been "put in a corner," said the management board also would forgo its salary increase. Siemens has set aside another $26.75 million for the fund since then -- and could be on the hook for more.

At the company's annual news conference in November, Mr. Kleinfeld complained of being "attacked from left and right" in the German media over the pay hike and BenQ. "It's clearly a German phenomenon we have," Mr. Kleinfeld said.

He also delivered some good news: Net profit in the fiscal quarter ended Sept. 30 soared eightfold to $469.3 million as restructuring costs eased and signs of a turnaround surfaced. "2007 will be a good year for Siemens," he predicted. Investors were pleased with the result. The company's share price, long an underperformer among Germany's blue-chip stocks, rose 3% that day.

The following week, German police, responding to information gathered by authorities in other countries, raided about 30 offices and homes of current and former Siemens employees. Police seized 36,000 documents. Prosecutors have since arrested more than half a dozen suspects as they try to determine the scope of the alleged wrongdoing and how far up the corporate ladder it traveled. Siemens says it is cooperating fully with authorities. It attributes the alleged wrongdoing to "individual acts," adding that it appears confined to the telecom unit.

Prosecutors in Italy and Liechtenstein say Siemens tried to halt their inquiries in 2004, when they approached the company about suspicious transactions. Cuno Tarfusser, an Italian prosecutor, says Siemens filed repeated motions to block the review of bank data from an account in Austria involving about $75 million in transactions. On the company's balance sheet, the payments appeared to be for consulting fees -- but no consulting work was done, according to prosecutors.

Police searched Mr. Kleinfeld's office as part of the broader raid. He recently hired a high-profile lawyer to advise him on the investigation. Among those jailed thus far are Thomas Ganswindt, a former management board member who left Siemens at the end of September, and Michael Kutschenreuter, a former chief financial officer at the telecom unit who was heading Siemens's real-estate division at the time of his arrest.

Lawyers for the two men would not make them available for comment. Michael Rosenthal, a lawyer for Mr. Ganswindt, said his client is in jail "because he refuses to tell prosecutors what they wanted to hear." Mr. Rosenthal said his plans to appeal the detention could take months.

Mr. von Pierer, who became chairman of the supervisory board after running Siemens for nearly 13 years, is also feeling the heat. Some corporate-governance advocates have called on him to resign, citing a conflict of interest between his oversight role on the supervisory board and his position as chief executive when much of the alleged fraud occurred. Mr. von Pierer has rejected those calls2.

Siemens is no stranger to corruption scandals. In March, German prosecutors charged two former employees of the power-generation unit of offering $4.6 million in bribes to win Italian natural-gas contracts. U.S. authorities indicted a medical unit of Siemens in January, accusing the subsidiary of forming a sham business with a minority firm to win a $49 million contract from an Illinois hospital system. Last year, a United Nations-appointed panel accused three Siemens subsidiaries of paying $1.6 million in kickbacks tied to the U.N.'s oil-for-food program in Iraq.

The German case is pending after Siemens reached a financial settlement in Milan earlier this year without admitting or denying guilt. A Siemens spokesman said that the company hasn't uncovered any wrongdoing in the oil-for-food program, and that the indictment in Illinois is unjustified.

The current investigation dwarfs earlier accusations of wrongdoing -- and threatens to damage Germany's reputation as a clean place to do business. Corruption allegations recently have hit other corporate titans such as auto maker DaimlerChrysler AG, which is being investigated by U.S. authorities for alleged bribes and has acknowledged making "improper payments." German authorities say documented cases of white-collar crimes rose 10% in 2005.

The German chapter of corruption watchdog Transparency International suspended Siemens's membership two years ago and last week moved to expel the company, an unusual step. While the U.S. outlawed the bribing of foreign officials in 1978, German companies were allowed to write off bribes as expenses until as recently as 1999. "I think Siemens is deficient," says Joachim Schwalbach, a professor at Humboldt University's Institute of Management in Berlin. "They're not best in class."

One complicating factor for Mr. Kleinfeld was his role at the telecom business at the center of the scandal. After returning to Munich from the U.S. in 2004, he was given special oversight of the telecom business. He held that role for nine months, before handing it over to Mr. Ganswindt, who earlier had been responsible for day-to-day operations of the unit.

In a conference call with investors last week, Mr. Kleinfeld was asked how such large suspicious payments could have been missed. He said the alleged fraud at the unit started a few years before his arrival and that he was focused in 2004 on the strategic restructuring of the business, which he described as "a colossal task."

Still, he acknowledged the suspicious transactions uncovered thus far are "quite staggering" and that Siemens needs to do more.

Siemens recently hired an ombudsman and retained a law firm to conduct an independent inquiry into the company's financial controls. KPMG, Siemens's longtime auditor, is cooperating with prosecutors as a witness. Siemens also has hired Michael Hershman, a co-founder of Transparency International, as a compliance adviser. He is acting as a private consultant.

The scandal could have serious financial repercussions for Siemens, which lists its shares in Frankfurt and on the New York Stock Exchange. In a regulatory filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission last week, the company warned that the SEC and U.S. Department of Justice may launch investigations of their own to determine if the company broke U.S. laws. It also warned that proof of wrongdoing could have "a material adverse effect" on its business if foreign governments ban Siemens from competing for public-sector contracts.

As a result of the scandal, Siemens announced $128.4 million in deferred and current income-tax charges for the past seven years and restated its net income for the most recent fiscal year ended September, lowering it by $55.8 million, to $2.29 billion.

A tie-up between Siemens and Nokia to create the world's third-largest supplier of equipment to telecom carriers behind Alcatel-Lucent of France and Telefon AB LM Ericsson of Sweden will have to wait. The companies said last week they now expect to close the transaction in the first quarter of 2007 instead of Jan. 1 as originally planned. The merger is subject to a follow-up agreement based "on the results and consequences" of a compliance review by Siemens, they added.

The scandal also complicates Siemens's recent efforts to sell a majority stake in its unprofitable enterprise networks business. That business isn't included in the planned venture with Nokia and has a bit more than $2.29 billion in annual revenue.

Despite the uncertainty, investors haven't jumped ship. Many still believe that Mr. Kleinfeld is making the right moves and that the company's net income should keep climbing on the back of recent restructuring steps. Safa Muhtaseb, a portfolio manager at Brandywine Global Investment Management in Philadelphia, believes the investigation is likely contained and that the turnaround is progressing. But he also recognizes it could take time. "You can't unwind some of the decisions that took years, and in some cases decades, to make," says Mr. Muhtaseb, whose firm owns shares in Siemens.

The share price of Siemens has climbed 20% since Mr. Kleinfeld became chief executive -- far less than the 56% surge in Germany's blue-chip DAX stock index over the same period.

Did Ann Baskins See No Evil At HP? (LAW)

By Sue Reisinger

Law.com, December 18, 2006

A disheveled Ann Baskins stood on Sept. 28 before a congressional committee investigating the Hewlett-Packard Co. spying scandal. Baskins' eyes were puffy, her face wan, her forehead deeply lined, and her usually neatly kept hair was pulled back and askew. Just hours earlier she had made the painful decision to resign as general counsel of the giant computer company.

Standing before the committee, she held her right hand in the air and swore to tell the truth. Then, on the first question, Baskins exercised her Fifth Amendment right to remain silent and refused to tell anything.

While Baskins sat quietly, former HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and CEO Mark Hurd told the committee that Baskins was to blame for the mess. They said that she had given them bad legal advice, and that she knew about and permitted the use of "pretexting" -- using false pretenses to obtain personal information about others. Even Baskins' longtime friend and HP's outside counsel, Larry Sonsini of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, told Congress: "I think the record has become quite clear that who was in charge [of the spying] was the HP internal legal department. They took the responsibility on, rightly or wrongly."

THE TROUBLES BASKINS MAY STILL FACE

So far, that was the public low for Baskins' career. In private, the due bills keep rolling in. By mid-November, Baskins and Palo Alto, Calif.-based HP were facing investigations by the California attorney general's office, the U.S. Attorney in San Francisco, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Federal Communications Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission. (As yet, Baskins has not been charged with any crimes.)

At least one of five shareholder suits against HP accuses Baskins of insider trading and damaging the corporation. There are potential invasion of privacy suits from individuals whose phone records were stolen. And two phone companies have sued the detective agencies used in the pretexting; one of the suits also names as defendants "unidentified companies" and individuals that conspired with the agency to do the pretexting.

By some measure, Baskins has dodged the worst of the fallout. HP ousted Dunn and Kevin Hunsaker, the senior counsel in Baskins' office who oversaw the spying efforts. The California attorney general has indicted the pair, along with three private investigators, on four criminal counts related to the spying. The AG alleges that Dunn and Hunsaker personally provided home and cell phone numbers to the private investigators. All five defendants pled not guilty and await trial. If convicted on all counts, they each face a maximum of 12 years in prison and $55,000 in fines.

HER ROLE IN THE SCANDAL

Little has been written about Baskins' role in the spying efforts, but an in-depth analysis of more than 1,500 pages of documents, as well as interviews with people close to the investigation, offers insights into how she let the spying probe spin out of control. The records, which include HP e-mails and interviews conducted by lawyers at Palo Alto-based Wilson Sonsini as part of the company's internal investigation, were made public by the House committee.

In the end, the HP scandal comes down to this: The spying probe became a runaway train. And Ann Baskins was the person in the best position to recognize the danger and stop it. But she didn't. In fact, the records show that from June 2005 to April 2006, Baskins raised legal questions about the tactics at least six times. But she never pushed for a definitive answer about whether the methods used were, in fact, lawful. Or, more importantly, whether they were unwise and dangerous to the company. In retrospect she could have, and should have, shut down the throttle on this train long before it crashed.

"Part of your responsibility as general counsel is to ask hard questions about whether conduct is just technically legal, or arguably illegal, or beyond the fringes of fraud," says Deborah Rhode, a professor of legal ethics and professional responsibility at Stanford Law School. "She was in the best position to see it and stop it."

Even Baskins concedes that she should have done more. Her attorney, K. Lee Blalack II, says Baskins would not comment for this story. But Blalack says that Baskins fully recognizes that instead of solely focusing on whether the investigation was legal, Baskins also should have questioned whether it was ethical. "She regrets that she did not do so," says Blalack, a partner in the Washington, D.C., office of O'Melveny & Myers.

BLEEDING HEWLETT-PACKARD BLUE

According to those close to her, it wasn't like Baskins to fail to ask the right questions. She had deftly managed the legal issues that arose in HP's $8 billion spin-off of Agilent Technologies Inc. in 1999. And she won praise in 2002 for her handling of the controversial $22 billion merger with Compaq Computer Corp., including the sensitive civil suit brought by the heirs of HP's founders, who tried to block the deal. Baskins was both a survivor of corporate politics and the very model of a good company soldier. Even during the congressional hearing, Dunn praised Baskins' commitment to the tech giant, adding, "Ann Baskins bleeds Hewlett-Packard blue ink."

A 1980 graduate of University of California, Los Angeles School of Law, Baskins spent only about a year in private practice. She joined HP in 1982 and slowly worked her way up the ranks. She was named vice president and corporate secretary in 1999 and general counsel in early 2000. Along the way she married Thomas DeFilipps, a Wilson Sonsini partner.

Philadelphia attorney Michael Holston, a longtime friend of Baskins, whose firm Morgan, Lewis & Bockius was brought in by HP execs to investigate the spying probe, calls Baskins "a terrific lawyer who did a great job for HP for nearly 25 years. And she is a woman of the highest ethical standards."

But the praise isn't universal. A former HP in-house lawyer, who requested anonymity because the attorney started a new job, is not surprised that the GC didn't step in to stop the spying. "Baskins was indecisive and disconnected as a manager," says the attorney, who declined to elaborate.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END: DUNN'S PROJECT KONA

The beginning of the end for Baskins, 51, came in February of 2005, when Dunn and her allies on the board forced out then-CEO and Chairwoman Carleton "Carly" Fiorina. The directors chose Dunn to chair the board.

On April 1 Hurd became CEO, but someone had leaked news of his appointment to the press a few days earlier. An irate Dunn hired a Boston-based private investigator named Ron DeLia to search for the leaker. (The California attorney general later accused Dunn of providing DeLia with the home, office and cell phone numbers of various HP directors and managers.) Records show that Dunn initiated those first spying efforts -- without Baskins' knowledge -- on April 19.

Dunn named the spy probe Project Kona because she was vacationing in Hawaii at the time. (Neither Dunn nor her lawyer, James Brosnahan, a senior partner at Morrison & Foerster in San Francisco, returned calls for this story. DeLia also declined to comment through his attorney, John Williams, of Manchester, Williams & Seibert in San Jose.)

Why did Dunn act on her own at first? Records suggest she may have done so because HP's internal corporate politics were roiling. Dunn suspected everyone, including Baskins, as a possible leaker. And Baskins noted in the Wilson Sonsini interviews that her working relationship with Dunn and the board was "strained" by all the distrust at that time.

Dunn brought Baskins into the loop two months later. On June 14, according to e-mails and congressional testimony, DeLia e-mailed a seven-page report to Dunn that discussed the phone record searches and used the word "pretexting." Dunn forwarded a copy to Baskins the same day. This e-mail is the earliest mention of Baskins' involvement in any document that has so far been made public.

Dunn told DeLia that Baskins would join them in a teleconference call the next day to discuss the report. During that June 15 call, DeLia told the two women that telephone records were obtained by ruse from a telecommunications carrier, and he explained the word "pretexting" to them, according to the complaint filed by the attorney general's office. Baskins made sketchy, handwritten notes referring to "pretexting."

According to an affidavit attached to the AG's complaint, "DeLia recalled that Baskins was curious about pretexting and concerned about its legality, and had asked DeLia whether it was lawful. DeLia replied that he was aware of no laws that made pretexting illegal, and was aware of no criminal prosecutions for such activities." Asked in later interviews why she didn't challenge the pretexting when she first learned it involved acts of deceit, Baskins said that Dunn hadn't asked for her opinion. Her relationship with Dunn was such, Baskins added, that "you answered what you were asked" and no more.

E-mails show that pretexting continued through August 2005. That's when Anthony "Tony" Gentilucci, the manager of HP Global Security investigations and a member of the spy team, reported that the probe still could not find the leaker. But his final report offered helpful suggestions for future spying efforts. He advised engaging "HP legal [department in order] to invoke the attorney-client privilege"; assigning an attorney to direct the investigation; and conducting all future briefings "verbally and keeping written work product to a minimum." With that advice, Baskins put the issue behind her -- or so she thought.

BASKINS LAUNCHES KONA II, RELIES ON HUNSAKER

A new leak occurred in January 2006. A story on CNET Networks Inc., a technology news service, reported confidential information about a potential HP acquisition. At Hurd's and Dunn's urging, Baskins quickly launched a new spy probe, dubbed Kona II. Baskins assigned Hunsaker, a six-year HP veteran and her senior counsel, to run it. He reported back to Baskins every other day, and to Dunn and Baskins together once a week, according to records. On Jan. 23, Hunsaker e-mailed HP security that he was heading the new leak probe, at Baskins' request, "in order to protect the attorney-client privilege in the event there is litigation or a government inquiry of some sort."

Baskins also asked Hunsaker to further explore the legality of pretexting. This was the second opportunity, after initially learning about the technique from DeLia six months earlier, that Baskins had to demand in-depth research by an expert in criminal law. But that didn't happen. Instead, on Jan. 30 Hunsaker sent the now-infamous e-mail to Gentilucci, asking, "How does Ron [DeLia] get cell and home phone records? Is it all aboveboard?"

Gentilucci replied that ruses are common in investigations. He said pretexting has been used in a number of probes, and "has not been challenged," although phone company employees could be held liable. His e-mail concluded: "I think it's on the edge, but aboveboard."

Hunsaker responded with four words that have haunted him ever since: "I shouldn't have asked." Then Hunsaker, in an e-mail, sought DeLia's assurances about the spying tactics. Again DeLia, as he had done in Kona I, insisted in e-mails that pretexting was lawful.

Michael Pancer, Hunsaker's attorney, says Baskins did nothing illegal here, and neither did his client. Pancer, a solo practitioner in San Diego, says Hunsaker would not comment for this story. But Pancer defends pretexting. "This [board leak] was a serious problem, and Kevin's ethical duty was to take every legal step necessary to help his client," Pancer says.

HUNSAKER'S RESEARCH ON PRETEXTING

In interviews with the Wilson Sonsini lawyers, Hunsaker explained how, at Baskins' urging, he researched the issue of pretexting. He said he did about an hour's worth of online reading. If he had looked at the Web sites of the Federal Trade Commission or FCC -- and there is no record that he did -- Hunsaker would have seen that those agencies have a serious problem with pretexting and consider it illegal. In fact, the FTC at the time was investigating five private eye companies for pretexting. FTC lawyers sued the five companies for "unfair and deceptive practices" in May. In addition, more than 10 states, as well as Congress, were considering specific legislation to outlaw pretexting. Several states have since made pretexting a crime.

Hunsaker admitted in the Wilson Sonsini interviews that he knew about a Verizon Communications Inc. privacy suit against an online company for pretexting. Actually, Verizon had filed two such privacy suits in 2005 against pretexters, and that fact also was available online. There is no record that anyone at HP thought to call the GC of Verizon or any other phone company to ask them about pretexting. Ironically, the president of Verizon is Lawrence Babbio Jr., who sits on HP's board of directors. But no one asked Babbio for his thoughts on pretexting. (Hunsaker would later say they did not pretext Babbio's phone records.)

So, steeped in blissful ignorance, the HP spy team kept on pretexting until Feb. 7, when the method faced its only real challenge. That's when two HP security employees, who were members of Hunsaker's spy team, saw some of the detailed phone records being collected. Former law enforcement officers, they went to their supervisor and questioned the legality and ethics of obtaining personal phone records. The supervisor confronted Hunsaker, who promised to relay their concerns to the "executives sponsoring this investigation" before proceeding or using the data.

There is no record available of whether Hunsaker kept his promise.

BASKINS HAS ANOTHER CHANCE TO ASK THE TOUGH QUESTIONS

Whether spurred by her own doubts or others', Baskins in early February ordered Hunsaker to undertake "a full process check" on the investigation, including the legality of its methods. This was yet another chance to ask the tough questions and to demand an outside counsel's opinion. Instead, she again turned to Hunsaker, who again merely asked DeLia to reassure them on the law.

To answer the question this time, DeLia, according to his Wilson Sonsini interview, turned to his outside attorney, John Kiernan, with whom he shared office space. Kiernan told DeLia that pretexting was not a crime. The attorney, a partner at Boston-based Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata, wouldn't comment for this story. But in the Wilson Sonsini interviews, Kiernan said that neither HP nor DeLia had ever hired him to research the issue. He had based his quick comments to DeLia on a study done a year earlier by a law student who was clerking in his office. The clerk, Valerie Kloecker, is now an associate with Kiernan's firm and also wouldn't comment.

But on the basis of Kiernan's snap opinion, DeLia e-mailed Hunsaker, saying that "right now" (February 2006) there were no state or federal laws prohibiting pretexting. DeLia's e-mail went on to say there "is a risk of litigation." And added: "Note: the Federal Trade Commission has jurisdiction."

There is no record available to show whether Hunsaker relayed this "risk of litigation" to Baskins, or whether he bothered to check with the FTC. Apparently satisfied with whatever Hunsaker did tell her, Baskins let the probe continue.

POSSIBLE SOURCE OF LEAK IS UNCOVERED

On March 10 Hunsaker sent an 18-page draft report to Dunn, Baskins and Hurd. It connected board member George "Jay" Keyworth II to the leaks, and said the investigation was still ongoing. It did not mention the word "pretexting," but said on page three that "the investigation team obtained, reviewed, and analyzed HP and third-party phone records to identify calls made to or from reporters or other individuals of interest." A footnote added: "It should be noted that, with respect to non-HP phone records, the investigation team utilized a lawful investigative methodology commonly utilized by entities such as law firms and licensed security firms in the United States to obtain such records."

Shortly before Dunn and Baskins were to discuss the report with Hurd at a March 15 meeting in Los Angeles, Baskins apparently grew uneasy. She asked Hunsaker to talk with outside counsel about pretexting in case Hurd had questions. Again, Baskins had a chance to demand a written opinion from an outside criminal lawyer. But once more, she relied on Hunsaker, who asked Gentilucci to call DeLia's lawyer, Kiernan.

This time Kiernan had a paralegal respond to HP. The paralegal gave Gentilucci an "update in which she said she could not find additional lawsuits or criminal charges to indicate that pretexting was (had become) illegal." Hunsaker reported back to Baskins that he had confirmed the legality of pretexting with outside counsel.

BASKINS, DUNN AND HURD CONSULT SONSINI

On March 15 Baskins and Dunn told Hurd that the probe concluded that Keyworth, a noted physicist, was the leaker. Before they confronted Keyworth, the executives decided to consult Larry Sonsini, who would later tell Congress that he was asked in mid-April only to look at "the sufficiency of evidence." Sonsini said he wasn't asked for, and didn't offer, any opinion about pretexting at this time.

E-mails between Baskins, Dunn and Hunsaker indicate that Baskins shared Sonsini's comments with them during an April 15 conference call. The records do not indicate what Sonsini said, but two incidents the following week suggest that Baskins was growing more cautious.

First, Hunsaker was moved out of HP's legal department to become director of ethics. His lawyer, Pancer, calls it a promotion for his hard work. In an e-mail to his spy team, Hunsaker says simply that he's "no longer a member of the HP legal department." His new title was "director of ethics and SBC [standards of business conduct] compliance," and he would report to a senior vice president in marketing.

In the other incident that hints at Baskins' fears, she asked Hunsaker once again to discuss the legality of pretexting, this time in a memo. On April 24 Hunsaker e-mailed a one-page copy of his note to Gentilucci and DeLia. The e-mail says it was prepared "per Ann Baskins' specific request."

The note explains that the phone records were obtained using pretexting. To confirm the legality of pretexting, the memo cites three efforts. First, Hunsaker "conducted some preliminary legal research and determined that [pretexting] is not unlawful." Second, DeLia contacted the agency he subcontracted to do the pretexting, and the company said its methods "were not unlawful." Third, Gentilucci contacted attorney John Kiernan, whose firm "had conducted extensive research on this issue, and that the practice of pretexting ... is not unlawful."

Hunsaker concludes: "As a result, the investigation team is confident that all phone records information ... was obtained in a lawful manner." After reading this memo, was Baskins as confident? If not, she could have tried to derail this runaway train a final time before the report went to the board. But she didn't.

At HP's May 18 board meeting, the directors were told that Keyworth was the leaker. When the board voted 6 to 3 to ask Keyworth to resign, director Thomas Perkins angrily quit in protest.

HP'S INTERNAL INVESTIGATIONS GO PUBLIC

Throughout June and July, Perkins, a high-profile Silicon Valley venture capitalist, challenged the legality of the investigation and demanded answers from Baskins and Sonsini. Sonsini replied with his now oft-quoted e-mail: "I am sure Ann Baskins looked into the legality of every step of the inquiry and was satisfied that it was conducted properly."

That wasn't enough for Perkins, who made the entire mess public in late July. He told the attorney general's office, the SEC and others about the investigation, including the pretexting. He also told the SEC he objected to how HP had portrayed his resignation in an 8-K filing.

Now facing a public outcry, HP in August asked Sonsini's firm to conduct an internal "investigation of the investigation." Partners Steven Schatz and David Berger conducted phone interviews of the participants -- including four separate interviews with Baskins, and seven with Hunsaker. (Schatz said that no one at the law firm would comment for this story.) Baskins was allowed to sit in on several of the interviews, and even to participate in Kiernan's interview.

By the time the interviews were finished in late August, Baskins had to know she was in trouble. In her interviews with the lawyers, she was often evasive. For example, when asked about a July 2005 meeting on Kona I, Baskins "reported that her calendar does not show any meeting in mid-July of 2005." Baskins used a lot of "I don't recall" answers, and contradicted herself several times in different interviews, especially about her knowledge of pretexting and about her role in Kona I and Kona II.

The Wilson Sonsini report on Aug. 30 concluded that "all persons involved" acted in good faith, but that "certain errors in judgment were made." While the use of pretexting at the time "was not generally unlawful," the report said the subcontractors may have used Social Security numbers while pretexting, "which more likely than not violates federal law." The report did not fault Baskins or Hurd, who "reasonably relied" on Hunsaker's assurances.

THE SCANDAL SNOWBALLS

But Baskins still wasn't off the hook. The scandal snowballed through September, and HP hired another outside law firm, Morgan Lewis, to do a second internal investigation. The company also filed a new document with the SEC, outlining the spy probe and admitting that it had spied on at least two HP employees, seven members of its board, nine reporters and their relatives.

That's when the dominoes started falling. Morgan Lewis came up with undisclosed, and what Hurd called "disturbing," findings about the spying operation. Dunn immediately resigned. Gentilucci and Hunsaker were also forced out. Baskins offered her resignation, but Hurd at first refused it.

Then the law enforcers and regulators opened their investigations. And Congress got into the act by demanding that Baskins and others at HP appear before the House subcommittee. The subcommittee had introduced a bill making pretexting a federal crime in January, and used HP to make its point for passage on national TV.

Baskins flew to the hearing on an HP corporate jet, along with her second attorney, Cristina Arguedas, a partner in Arguedas, Cassman & Headley in Berkeley, Calif. At the time, Baskins' lawyers were urging her to take the Fifth Amendment and not testify. But Baskins knew that the general counsel of HP could not refuse to answer Congress' questions and still keep her job.

Early on Sept. 28 Baskins made the agonizing decision to resign and not testify. In a letter to the congressional committee, Baskins' lawyers wrote, "Given the current environment, Ms. Baskins simply has no choice" but to refuse to testify. (Baskins left the company with a $3.6 million severance package.)

DID BASKINS ACT ETHICALLY THROUGHOUT HP'S INVESTIGATIONS?

Baskins may not be criminally liable for her role in Kona II. But some legal experts say that her ethical decisions were not beyond reproach. One critic is Rhode, the Stanford law professor, who looks at the psychology of what she calls "a moral meltdown." Rhode points out that this wasn't misconduct spurred by greed or self-dealing. In Baskins' case, she was reacting to what she viewed as unethical behavior -- a board member's leak -- and probably felt that she had a right to do whatever necessary to track down the leaker. "These [Baskins, et al.] were individuals who felt they were morally justified," according to Rhode.

One GC who has overseen investigations for his Fortune 500 media company says that beyond the legal and the ethical issues, Baskins failed to ask the crucial question: "How will all this affect the company if it shows up on page one of The New York Times?"

In Baskins' defense, Blalack argues that she was supervising more than 250 lawyers, and more than 600 employees globally. Under those circumstances, Blalack says, Baskins often had to rely on assurances from her subordinates. "Ms. Baskins asked for and received multiple assurances [from Hunsaker] that these investigative techniques were lawful," he insists.

In the end, Baskins' downfall came because of what she decided not to see. Susan Hackett, senior vice president and general counsel of the Association of Corporate Counsel, argues that it is unfair to expect GCs "to see around corners." But the unfortunate truth is, when it came to the legality of spying, Baskins had blinders on.

Study Finds Outside Directors Also Got Backdated Options (NYT)

By Eric Dash

Board members were not just blissfully ignorant or willfully blind bystanders when they backdated stock option grants for corporate executives, according to a new study. Some 1,400 outside directors themselves may have received manipulated grants over the past decade.

The research, to be released today, sheds new light on the stock options manipulation that has entangled more than 120 companies in a nationwide scandal. It suggests that what has been widely seen as a dot-com phenomenon to enrich managers in the executive suite probably extended to directors in the boardroom as well.

The study, sponsored by the Harvard Law School Program on Corporate Governance, also raises serious questions about corporate governance if the outside directors, who are supposed to act as a final backstop against bad practices, received — and in many cases may have even approved — fraudulent option grants.

“Opportunistic timing of directors’ grants is unlikely to have large dollar significance,” said Lucian A. Bebchuk, a Harvard Law School professor who is one of the study’s three authors. “But it has a large governance significance.”

The study is the latest in a series of papers by academic and governance research groups to explain the size and scope of the stock option scandal. More than 120 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, ranging from Apple to the United Health Group and dozens of technology companies. The Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service are conducting separate reviews. At least 60 executives and directors have been forced out or fired.

The study looked at about 30,000 directors at some 6,500 companies who were granted stock options from 1995 to 2005. By comparing the percentage of grants made at monthly low prices with the portion they expected had they been randomly assigned, the researchers were able to identify the proportion of the grants that appeared to have been manipulated.

They concluded that board members at about 460 companies, or seven percent of all publicly traded companies, probably received manipulated options. About 1,400 outside directors, or about 4.6 percent of board members, probably benefited from manipulated option grants.

However, the researchers attempted only to identify broad patterns in the data, not specific companies or board members. Nor did they calculate the potential dollar amount of the backdating benefit for the directors, which was probably far less than the potentially six- or seven- figure pay increase that the average executive received.

Backdating options is not necessarily illegal and the practice has been reduced by tougher reporting requirements introduced with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002. But even today, it can raise serious accounting, disclosure and tax issues. Most governance experts consider it bad practice.

The new research also helps debunk the common belief that outside directors would be immune to receiving manipulated stock options because their grants were typically awarded around the time of a company's annual meeting.

In fact, about 29 percent of the time, a company's directors were granted stock options on the same date as those given to executives, the study found. Those grants were much more likely to have been awarded at a favorable price than random chance might predict, and those odds increased when a grant was made at the same time as the chief executive's.

Other studies, such as one by the Corporate Library, has looked at whether directors on the boards at companies where stock option manipulation was commonplace may have passed along the practice to other boards. However, this appears to be the first study to measure the extent of outside directors who directly benefited from the practice.

The study comes at a time when the S.E.C. is indicating that it may take action against other so-called gatekeepers, including outside directors. One of the researchers, Yaniv Grinstein of Cornell, is working as a visiting scholar at the agency. And last summer, one of its commissioners publicly put board members on notice.

"If the facts permit, and I want to emphasize that all of our enforcement cases are very fact-specific, it wouldn't surprise me to see charges brought against outside directors," Roel C. Campos, an S.E.C. commissioner, said last August.

'Lucky' Stock Options Not Limited To Executives (WP)

By Terence O'Hara

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Chief executives weren't the only ones enjoying near-guaranteed profits from stock options in the past decade. Outside directors at hundreds of American companies also received option grants that are likely to have been manipulated, a new study found.

According to the study, 9 percent of 29,000 option grants to outside directors from 1996 to 2005 were granted on a day when the company stock price was at a monthly low. The likelihood of such a concentration of "lucky" grants is so low as to be statistically impossible, the study's authors said.

"It's like going to Vegas thousands of times and betting on red every time and winning more than half the time," said Lucian Bebchuk, the Harvard University professor who co-authored the report, titled "Lucky Directors," with Cornell University's Yaniv Grinstein and Urs Peyer, a professor at the French business school Insead. "From a numerical standpoint, it can't be random. There has to be some manipulation of the outcome."

The study found the "lucky grants" at about 460 firms, involving about 1,400 outside directors.

Outside directors are board members who aren't management, and they are the shareholders' chief representatives, responsible for overseeing management and making sure executives don't profit unnecessarily at shareholder expense. The Securities and Exchange Commission, following similar studies in recent years that focused on executive stock option grants, has been investigating options backdating.

More than 130 such companies have disclosed probes of their options-granting practices, and a handful of chief executives have lost their jobs because of backdating.

Options give the holder the right to buy company stock at a preset price, usually on the date the option is awarded.

When options are awarded to executives, they allow executives to profit from the rise in the stock price.

But when an option is priced at a date in the past when the price was low, it essentially guarantees a profit, thus negating the rationale for options.

Until this study, however, no one had focused on option grants to directors.

Bebchuk said the lack of attention was because the vast majority of options awarded to directors fall on the date of the annual meeting and are typically much smaller than executive options.

"In the data, we found that directors' grants are equally susceptible to manipulation," Bebchuk said.

DOJ_NMG_0107072

A lucky director grant was more likely at companies where executives received lucky grants, the study found. And firms with a higher incidence of lucky option grants were more likely to have governance practices considered unfriendly to shareholders, such as a minority of independent directors on the board.

The firms were also more likely to have "entrenching" bylaws, which make it difficult for shareholders to remove directors.

The study is not the first to raise questions about a possible link between options backdating practices and board governance practices. A study by the Corporate Library of 120 companies implicated in backdating found a high incidence of interlocking directors, or directors who served on more than one company that backdated.

The study suggested that backdating practices may have spread from company to company through these interlocking director relationships.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Executions Drop As States Debate Lethal Injection (USAT)

By Oren Dorell, Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 18, 2006

The questions over lethal injection that have led executions to be halted in Florida and California are likely to curb the use of the death penalty across the USA, according to analysts who support capital punishment and others who oppose it.

However, it's unclear whether the increasing focus on whether lethal injection is unconstitutionally painful represents a significant and lasting turn against the death penalty or a temporary slowdown in executions that will end once procedures for injections are improved.

"I think we're headed towards fewer executions," says Deborah Denno, a professor at Fordham University Law School who was on the U.S. Sentencing Commission from 1994 to 1997. She says a range of problems in the nation's death penalty system — unqualified public defenders, the need for more DNA testing and questions about lethal injections, for example — have prevented capital punishment from being applied fairly.

Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, which supports the death penalty, disagrees that the decline will last.

He calls the controversy over lethal injection — which is used in nearly all of the 38 states that have the death penalty — "a significant but temporary setback" for capital punishment that will lead to fewer executions only until problems with injections are resolved.

He notes that public opinion surveys consistently have shown that about two-thirds of Americans support the death penalty.

Scheidegger says the debate over injections is somewhat overblown. "Why are we that concerned about whether a convicted murderer feels some pain at death?" he asks. "It's supposed to be punishment."

For years, executions have declined and courts have been increasingly reluctant to issue death sentences as a range of issues have raised questions about how the death penalty is used. The wrangling over lethal injection is the latest battle front in that debate.

On Friday, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush suspended executions in that state and appointed a panel to examine whether lethal injections represent an unconstitutional "cruel and unusual punishment" under the Eighth Amendment. Bush's decision came after it took a state execution team two injections and 34 minutes — more than twice the usual time — to kill convicted murderer Angel Diaz.

A state medical examiner determined that needles used to administer a three-chemical mix in executions were not inserted directly into Diaz's veins.

Shortly after Bush's announcement, federal Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose ruled that California's lethal injection system violated the Eighth Amendment, although Fogel left open the possibility that the state could come up with a protocol for executions that would be acceptable.

The moves by Bush and Fogel came a few days after the Death Penalty Information Center, a group in Washington, D.C., that opposes capital punishment, linked a decline in executions to legal disputes in Florida, California, Maryland, Missouri and several other states. The lawsuits challenge the expertise of the teams that implant the intravenous lines into condemned inmates and regulate the flow of the lethal drugs.

In agreeing that convicted killer Michael Morales' execution should be put on hold, Fogel cited a "pervasive lack of professionalism" in California's lethal injection protocols.

Among other things, Fogel said, prison execution teams were poorly screened and the chemicals used in executions sometimes have not been prepared properly.

State protocols for lethal chemicals vary, but most involve a barbiturate to make the inmate unconscious, a paralyzing agent and potassium chloride to stop the heart.

Cybercrooks Hold PC Data Captive (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, December 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — For ransom: your sensitive computer files.

In the latest online scam, cybercrooks are breaking into the PCs of small businesses and individuals, locking up data and demanding money in return for freeing it.

So-called ransomware is the latest iteration of extortion on the Internet. Typically, hackers threaten to disrupt the websites of companies with a deluge of data unless they are paid.

With ransomware, however, online crooks implant malicious computer code on websites in hopes of breaking into the PCs of consumers and remotely encrypting a victim's files and photographs. The thieves demand a ransom through an online-payment service such as PayPal or e-gold.

According to security firm Websense, one recent victim was the tech administrator at a company in the Northeast. His PC was infected by malicious code, which scrambled company files. An e-mailed ransom note demanded $200 for the digital keys to unlock the files.

The victim did not pay because he doubted his data would be returned even if he paid, says Dan Hubbard, vice president of security and research at Websense. Most of the stolen files were recovered from a backup disk, Hubbard says.

Another recent ransomware case occurred at an Internet cafe in South America. The victims' e-mail accounts were held captive, and they received ransom notes in Spanish, according to Websense.

There are no known statistics on ransomware. But officials at Websense, McAfee and other security companies have noted more instances through their field operations in the last several months.

Employees or small businesses are the typical targets of the scam, security experts say. Ransoms are usually small so victims will pay and not report the crime.

Online crooks count on employees taking laptops home and, unprotected by a company firewall, inadvertently downloading ransomware code from infected websites onto their PCs, says John Thielens, vice president of security firm Tumbleweed Communications.

"Crooks may be toying with it to see if it's successful," Hubbard says. "They may be fishing for sensitive information at a Fortune 500 company for a big payday."

Security experts advise consumers to avoid unfamiliar websites and keep backups of important files on removable devices.

Nifong Probe Possible, U.S. Attorney General Says (WRAL)

WRAL-TV, December 18, 2006

Raleigh — The United States Attorney General suggested Sunday that his office might investigate the way District Attorney Mike Nifong has handled the Duke lacrosse rape case.

In an interview with Fox News on Sunday, United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales confirmed he received a letter asking for a federal probe into the investigation, in which an exotic dancer claims three lacrosse players raped her at a March 13 party.

"Well, that is a letter that we recently received," Gonzales told Fox News' Brian Wilson. "It's being evaluated at the (Department of Justice). I can't say anything -- anything beyond that."

Rep. Walter B. Jones, R-North Carolina, sent Gonzales the letter last week asking for a federal investigation into possible prosecutorial misconduct, and specifically, to determine whether the defendants' civil rights were violated.

"I was offended by the way (Nifong) has handled this case," Jones told WRAL last week. "I think he has been out of control."

Gonzales said that even though the case is a state and local matter, the federal government could still become involved "if an investigation is conducted in such a way that civil rights laws are violated, that would be something that we might look into," Gonzales said.

Last week, defense attorneys also filed several motions in the case. One, criticizing the way DNA evidence was revealed, indicated that no DNA from any of the defendants was found on the accuser's body but that there were numerous male matches.

"There was no attempt to hide anything from the way the report was done," Nifong told reporters on Friday. "If anything, we were trying to be fair to all the people who were not going to be involved in this case."

Other motions asked that a photographic lineup be dismissed as evidence, because it was slanted. A third motion asked for a change of venue, saying that Nifong has polarized the local community with comments he made during the initial stages of the investigation.

All three men charged in the case – David Evans, 23, Collin Finnerty, 20, and Reade Seligmann, 20 -- have maintained their innocence from the beginning.

The next hearing is scheduled for Feb. 5 when defense attorneys are expected to ask Judge Osmond Smith to throw out the photo identification lineup.

The accuser in this case is also expected to be in court.

Copyright Tool Will Scan Web For Violations (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

To deal with the mounting copyright issues swirling around video and other content online, a start-up founded by some respected Silicon Valley executives is taking a novel approach: combing the entire Web for unauthorized uses.

Privately held Attributor Corp. of Redwood City, Calif., has begun testing a system to scan the billions of pages on the Web for clients' audio, video, images and text -- potentially making it easier for owners to request that Web sites take content down or provide payment for its use.

The start-up, which was founded last year and has been in "stealth" mode, is emerging into the public eye today, at a time when some media and entertainment companies' frustration with difficulties identifying infringing uses of their content online is increasing. The problem has intensified with the proliferation and increasing usage of sites such as Google Inc.'s YouTube, which lets consumers post video clips.

Media and entertainment companies have so far relied on a combination of technology and their own scanning to protect their content online -- but with mixed results. Media companies have used digital-rights management technology designed to make it hard to copy or transfer files. But such measures have often proved to be clumsy, despised by consumers or quickly thwarted. That's the case for DRM technology built into DVDs to prevent them from being ripped onto computers, for example. Entertainment and media companies have also relied on their own staff to scan Web sites for infringing content. But even when such content is spotted and taken down, the companies often see the content pop up in the same places or elsewhere soon after.

"We all know that as soon as somebody comes up with a way to secure a piece of property, somebody else will come within days and crack it," says Lawrence Iser, a partner at law firm Kinsella Weitzman Iser Kump & Aldisert in Santa Monica, Calif., who represents musical artists and other entertainment industry clients.

Though its service isn't out yet, Attributor appears to go further than existing techniques for weeding out unauthorized uses of content online. While companies are tackling parts of the same problem -- Indigo Stream Technologies Ltd., based in Gibraltar, offers a free service called Copyscape that analyzes a Web page and then uses Google's search engine to see whether the text is duplicated elsewhere on the Web -- Attributor's approach is seemingly more comprehensive.

Its co-founders, former Yahoo Inc. executive Jim Brock, and Jim Pitkow, a Silicon Valley entrepreneur who has sold companies to Google and VeriSign Inc., claim to have cracked the thorny computer-science problem of scouring the entire Web by using undisclosed technology to efficiently process and comb through chunks of content. The company says it will have over 10 billion Web pages in its index before the end of this month.

"If it works, it's a fantastic invention," Mr. Iser says.

It's unclear whether such a service will be welcomed by Internet companies that allow users to post content. YouTube, News Corp.'s MySpace and others already face copyright lawsuits. In some cases, they're building systems to identify pirated materials consumers upload to their sites, and say they're open to sharing revenue with content owners.

Attributor plans to announce today that it has received about $10 million in funding to date from investors including Sigma Partners, Selby Venture Partners, Draper Richards, First Round Capital and Amicus Capital.

Attributor analyzes the content of clients, who could range from individuals to big media companies, using a technique known as "digital fingerprinting," which determines unique and identifying characteristics of content. It uses these digital fingerprints to search its index of the Web for the content. The company claims to be able to spot a customer's content based on the appearance of as little as a few sentences of text or a few seconds of audio or video. It will provide customers with alerts and a dashboard of identified uses of their content on the Web and the context in which it is used.

The content owners can then try to negotiate revenue from whoever is using it or request that it be taken down. In some cases, they may decide the content is being used fairly or to acceptable promotional ends. Attributor plans to help automate the interaction between content owners and those using their content on the Web, though it declines to specify how.

Company executives believe its system will provide transparency and accountability to encourage more owners to put their content online with confidence they'll be able to police its use, and share in any profits.

"We believe that we can provide an infrastructure that will support all kinds of outcomes and remedies, which will align the interests of content owners, content hosts and search engines around legitimate syndication and monetization," says Mr. Brock, Attributor's chief executive.

"We see this as a way to take us out of the course we've been on, which is more litigation," says Mr. Pitkow, who is chief technology officer.

Attributor has begun testing the system, and won't release it officially until the first quarter of next year. The co-founders' track records, however, lend credibility to their claims. As Yahoo's first outside counsel, Mr. Brock tackled Internet copyright issues for the Internet company as far back as 1994 and later oversaw some of its core businesses as a senior vice president. Mr. Pitkow is a computer science Ph.D. who worked at Xerox's legendary PARC research facility. In 2001, he helped to sell the intellectual property of Outride Inc., where he was president and chairman, to Google. Last year, he sold Moreover Technologies, where he was CEO and chairman, to VeriSign.

"They're real guys who have solved hard-core problems," says Ali Aydar, chief operating officer of Snocap Inc., a digital-music registry start-up. Snocap and Attributor share a backer in Silicon Valley investor Ron Conway. "Content owners I've talked to outside of the music business would love a system which tells them where their content is being utilized," Mr. Aydar adds.

Attributor executives decline to say how frequently they will update their Web index, a key factor in their ability to stay on top of postings. They also say they won't at least initially monitor peer-to-peer file swapping systems, where large amounts of pirated music, movies, TV shows and software are traded.

The YouTube World Opens An Untamed Frontier For Copyright Law (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, December 18, 2006

LOS ANGELES

Larry Richard is one of the millions to have discovered the world of YouTube, the free website that allows people to post, watch, and share video clips. When he receives a link to the site, usually via e-mail, he spends a few moments to click and watch a clip on his computer screen - sometimes a video of a friend's singing recital, other times a snippet of a foreign commercial or a monologue from late-night TV.

"It's entertaining, it's information, it's a community of people sharing things," says Mr. Richard, a marketing consultant in Santa Monica, Calif. But is it legal, given that at least some of what he's watching is copyrighted material being disseminated by individuals who clearly do not hold the copyright?

The law on this matter is murky, and likely to get murkier before it gets clearer, say experts in intellectual property law.

Several companies such as Time Warner have been threatening YouTube with copyright infringement lawsuits. Now that Internet giant Google has purchased YouTube, experts expect that the rampant disregard of copyright law shown by early YouTube users, at least, is likely to get resolved - but they caution that each successive new technology can put early users, in particular, on nebulous legal ground, especially if financial profit is involved.

"As more and more technology comes along, the legal underpinnings governing them are not becoming clearer," says Mark McCreary, a partner in the Technology and Venture Finance Group of Fox Rothschild, which handles intellectual property cases. Increasing ability to download video clips from YouTube and to watch videos on iPods and cellphones will present users with more opportunities to violate copyright - wittingly or unwittingly, he says.

Still, those who watch videos at YouTube - whether or not such content is copyrighted - are unlikely to be pursued with the same fervor with which the music industry prosecuted those who downloaded music free of charge via the file-sharing website Napster, say Mr. McCreary and other experts.

"The very big difference between today's YouTube and the music-sharing of MP3 files of several years ago is that you have to watch and you can't - absent the knowledge of advanced hackers - copy it for your own use," says David Axtell, an intellectual property specialist at the law firm Leonard, Street and Deinard in Minneapolis. "During Napster's heyday, people were making their own digital copies and using them on their own."

But concerns should be higher for those who actually submit videos for posting and watching, say Mr. Axtell and others. Because copying and distributing copyrighted material is illegal, people who post that material on YouTube without permission are more likely to be held liable.

"There certainly will be more litigation, and Google has set aside hundreds of millions in a war chest in recognition of this," says Kevin Parks, a copyright specialist with the law firm Leydig, Voit and Mayer in Chicago.

On the side of the YouTubites are those who argue that use of such copyrighted material falls into "fair use" provisions of the law.

"It's up to the courts to continually balance the rights of those who own copyrighted material with the need for society to adapt to emerging technology," says Perry Binder, assistant professor of legal studies at Georgia State University.

Copyright laws, which give exclusive legal right to a writer, editor, composer, publisher or distributor to publish, produce, sell, or distribute an artistic work are unambiguous, experts say. But how many copies of something a person may make for personal use is far more open to interpretation by judges and courts.

Mr. Binder says movie and TV industries are figuring out how to handle the more serious abuses, such as excessive downloading by casual users, profiting from the sale of a downloaded video, and having a website that links to copyrighted videos, particularly if the Web page profits from drawing traffic to the pages.

"These people should expect 'cease and desist' letters from attorneys and face the threat of a lawsuit if copyrighted material is not taken down immediately," says Binder.

For its part, YouTube directs users to common-sense "Dos and Don'ts" at its online help center. Users are asked not to send pornography, videos of dangerous or illegal acts (such as animal abuse or bombmaking), violence, and to avoid the malicious use of stereotypes.

"We ask our users to respect copyrighted material and to only upload videos they have made or obtained the rights to use," says Jenny Nielsen, marketing manager at YouTube. "Our policy prohibits inappropriate content.... Users can flag content they feel is inappropriate and once it is flagged, YouTube reviews the material and reserves the right to remove videos from the system."

Meanwhile, YouTube's power has prompted content creators to see how they can make money from the site's content that is copyrighted. Companies such as CBS and three major recording companies - Universal Music Group, Warner Music, and Sony BMG Music Entertainment - have inked deals with Google/YouTube to share revenues generated by copyrighted content on the site.

As part of an experimental "brand channel" at the site, CBS in October agreed to offer free video clips for downloading. By Thanksgiving, 300 such clips had drawn 30 million viewers. More than 35,000 have subscribed to the free channel and CBS claims its "Late Show with David Letterman" now boasts 200,000 more viewers and its "Late Late Show with Craig Ferguson" has 7 percent more viewers.

"YouTube has not only held the threats at bay, but also shown it can be a revenue boon for old media," says Chris Taylor, senior editor of Business 2.0 Magazine.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

In Houston, Questions Of Bias Over Tasers (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

HOUSTON -- Roiled by allegations of using unjustified deadly force against Latino suspects, the Houston Police Department began using stun guns two years ago so officers could avoid pulling the trigger of an automatic weapon.

Now officers are facing a new question: Are they using the high-voltage Taser -- what police call a less-than-lethal "intermediary" weapon -- indiscriminately against black suspects? The recent arrest and use of a Taser against a black professional football player has once again put the police department of the nation's fourth-largest city under scrutiny.

The incident occurred around 1 p.m. Nov. 14, when Houston Texans lineman Fred Weary was stopped by police for changing lanes without signaling. An officer said later that Weary "looked suspicious" inside the vehicle and that when the 6-foot-4, 308-pound National Football League player was asked to place his hands on his car, he became "verbally combative," failed to obey orders and made threatening moves toward police. Weary was zapped with a stun gun, which knocked him to the ground. He subsequently described the pain of the shock as worse than any he has experienced on a football field.

The arrest and Taser deployment might simply have been another number in police statistics, but for Weary's fame. Instead, the incident -- and a Houston judge's decision to dismiss charges of resisting arrest because of insufficient evidence -- have become a rallying point for black activists and some city officials who say police unjustly use stun guns against black suspects. Police data show that in almost 1,000 Taser deployments since December 2004, 63 percent of the suspects were black. Houston's population of 1.95 million is 25 percent black.

"If that brother was not a Texans football player, if that brother didn't have the resources that he has, he would have been another big brother that was Tased, and that's it," said New Black Panther Nation's Quanell X, who organized a community meeting with police officials earlier this month to discuss Taser policy and police treatment of blacks.

"Not until a high-profile African American football player was Tased did the city sit up and notice," he said. "We need a cease-and-desist order of those Tasers until there is a complete and independent study of their use."

For a year, Houston City Council member Ada Edwards, who is black, has sought a medical study on the effects of the Taser and also a moratorium on its use because "we have such a preponderance of minorities being Tased," she said. Now Houston Mayor Bill White has called for an independent review of Taser use.

City Council member Adrian Garcia, chairman of the council's public-safety committee, said an oversight group of civil rights advocates and residents had already been created to review Taser policy because of "concern about racial issues." But Garcia said he was convinced that Taser use had cut down on police shootings and saved lives.

In a letter published in the Dec. 2 Houston Chronicle, Police Chief Harold L. Hurtt said the department's Taser-training staff had identified 39 instances in which officers used Tasers against an armed suspect when they could have been justified in using deadly force. "That statistic easily could have translated into 39 more officer-involved shooting incidents," Hurtt wrote.

Facing a small, emotional crowd at the community meeting, Charles McClelland, executive assistant chief of police, said Taser use is minimal. About 3,500 police officers, who receive special training, carry stun guns. Tasers were deployed just under 1,000 times over the past two years -- against one-half of 1 percent of suspects arrested -- and half the people arrested in that period were black. During those two years, officers were assaulted 700 times.

"We're not Tasing 1 percent of the people that we arrest," McClelland said. "What this debate has sparked is a golden opportunity to move to the next level, and that's the Taser Cam."

Forty stun guns with tiny video and audio recorders in the handle are being tested by Houston officers. McClelland said the upgraded Taser would "protect the public from abuse, protect officers from frivolous complaints and . . . assist in court to sustain or exonerate suspects."

Michael Dirden, head of the police department's internal-affairs division, said 50 to 60 complaints have been filed against officers for inappropriate Taser use -- including against children. After investigations, one officer was fired, five officers were disciplined and almost two dozen officers were sent for additional training.

Although the resisting-arrest charge against Weary was dismissed, the Harris County district attorney's office is still reviewing the case to determine whether the NFL player should be charged with a crime such as interfering with the duties of an officer. Assistant District Attorney Paul Doyle said that the officers' radio-dispatch tapes had been subpoenaed and that his office is seeking video footage of the intersection where the arrest occurred.

Weary's attorney, Charley A. Davidson, said he has found two witnesses who will corroborate the player's account that, as he placed his hands atop the car, he asked officers why he was being arrested. "The way the two officers described the scene was different than the way everyone else described it," Davidson said.

Theory & Practice How Executives Are Pushed To Foster Diversity (WSJ)

By Phred Dvorak

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

TWO YEARS AGO, Rod Bond, an executive at a U.S. unit of French food-services company Sodexho Alliance SA, accompanied female colleagues to a meeting of the Women's Food Service Forum, where he was a rare man among roughly 1,500 women.

"That's a profound experience," says Mr. Bond, 57 years old. It prompted him to wonder how women managers of his generation had felt when they started their careers amid a sea of men. "I can begin to feel what it must have felt like to be different," Mr. Bond says.

That is the kind of reaction Sodexho and other companies hope to provoke in executives, as they try to help leaders -- still predominantly white and male -- come to grips with an increasingly diverse work force and customer base. Experts say such efforts can be a valuable addition to traditional diversity training because they can foster a deeper understanding of unfamiliar cultures and help executives see how they are perceived. "Dealing with difference is also dealing with how other people see you," says Hayward Bell, chief diversity officer at defense and aerospace manufacturer Raytheon Co.

Some companies, such as financial firm Wachovia Corp., urge executives to work with organizations representing other demographic groups. Wachovia's head of human resources, Shannon McFayden, who is white, serves on the board of the United Negro College Fund. John Cole, who heads banking for midsize businesses around New York, advises groups of women business owners and attends a year-end holiday gathering of one such group. "That puts me in quite the minority," says Mr. Cole.

Others encourage deeper immersion. Raytheon's missile-systems division in 2004 required managers to spend a day in a wheelchair in the office to better understand the concerns of disabled employees. Raytheon also asks executives to act as liaisons for employee "affinity groups," which bring together workers of specific races, genders, sexual orientations or religions.

"To really engage people, you have to create a series of epiphanies and take leaders through those epiphanies," says Rohini Anand, Sodexho's chief diversity officer.

Peter Bye, a consultant on diversity and former corporate diversity director for AT&T Inc., says working with people from other demographic groups can give executives insights that can't be learned in a class. However, he cautions executives need to mentally prepare themselves for the experience. Executives who have an "us versus them" attitude toward people who are different from themselves can get scared and defensive when suddenly thrown into a situation where they are in the minority, Mr. Bye says.

Experts say executives should be asked to do things that relate to their work, so they can see how diversity is relevant. "If it's a contrived experience, it's almost dismissible," says Anne McMahon, a management professor and workplace-diversity expert at the Williamson College of Business Administration in Youngstown, Ohio.

Sodexho's efforts complement an extensive diversity-training program that includes outside speakers. The company also encourages executives to mentor younger employees from different demographic groups. And it backs up the program with money: 25% of executives' bonuses are linked to diversity objectives independent of financial performance, such as hiring or training minority staff.

Ms. Anand asked Mr. Bond to sponsor the affinity group for women employees when it formed about four years ago. Mr. Bond, who runs the Sodexho division that serves public schools, says participating in the group helped him appreciate the concerns of women employees. One of the group's first requests was for a lactation room at headquarters, where new mothers could pump breast milk. "It's just one of those things I'd never thought about," says Mr. Bond.

Working with the group also made Mr. Bond more sensitive to women's feelings, he says. Recently, he found himself annoyed by a TV comedian making jokes about divorce, all at the wife's expense. Mr. Bond says he has also changed the social activities he plans for his colleagues, arranging excursions such as dinner cruises instead of golf outings, which he thinks appeal primarily to men.

Lorna Donatone, who ran a Sodexho unit that supplies food services for cruises, chaired the women's affinity group when Mr. Bond became its sponsor. She urged him to attend the Women's Food Service Forum event, arguing it would be a valuable experience, as well as a good networking opportunity. Ms. Donatone, who is of Swedish-German ancestry, later asked to sponsor Sodexho's Latino affinity group, to gain experience with a different culture.

Ms. Donatone says the experience of hearing a lot of Spanish spoken underscored for her the importance of language and prompted her to produce more bilingual promotional materials for her cruise services. Ms. Donatone says her work with the Latino group had an unexpected bonus: As she explored Latino culture, she started to reflect for the first time on her own roots.

"I grew up in Nebraska, and everyone looked exactly like me," says Ms. Donatone. "It was just never something I thought about much. Now I start thinking: 'That recipe from my mother was Swedish.'"

The Midas Touch (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0107080

By Marc Maurer

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

IN a ruling in a lawsuit last month, Judge James Robertson of Federal District Court said that United States currency discriminates against blind people because bills are all the same size and cannot be distinguished by touch. His decision was applauded by some advocates for the blind, including the American Council of the Blind, which brought the lawsuit. But as president of the National Federation of the Blind, the nation's oldest and largest organization of the blind, I believe that Judge Robertson's ruling is wrong.

Discrimination occurs when the blind are barred from enjoying benefits, goods or services. This definition of discrimination is what most people understand the word to mean. If a landlord refuses to rent an apartment to someone because of race, color, creed or disability, then discrimination occurs. Sometimes people with disabilities are barred from certain facilities or services because of the way they are designed. A person in a wheelchair cannot climb the steps of a public building; if the building does not have a wheelchair ramp, that person is prevented from entering it. In another example, my group is suing the Target Corporation because the company's Web site doesn't accommodate the special text-reading software that the blind use to surf the Internet. In both cases, a person with a disability is kept out of a public place or denied use of a service, just as African-Americans were not welcome at whites-only lunch counters.

But while blind people cannot identify paper currency by touch, that does not prevent us from spending money. When we hand merchants our money, they take it and provide us with the goods or services we have paid for, no questions asked. People with whom we transact business provide us with correct change if needed, and we then organize the money in a manner that allows us to identify it in the future. We transact business in this way every day.

There is no evidence that the blind are shortchanged more often than the sighted; if a question does arise about a particular transaction, it is the responsibility of the blind person to sort out the matter. Identifying money by feel, as the blind are often able to do in many other countries, may be more convenient, but inconvenience is not the same thing as discrimination.

While it is crucial that minorities have a voice in society, it is also the responsibility of every minority group to use that voice wisely and not to cry "discrimination" when no discrimination has occurred. The blind of America will fight discrimination wherever we find it, but we achieve nothing by falsely portraying ourselves as victims and engaging in frivolous litigation.

Blind Indifference (HC)

Houston Chronicle, December 18, 2006

When it comes right down to it, there is no way to sugarcoat the Bush administration's objection to revamping the nation's paper currency to make it distinguishable to the visually impaired. It's contrary to federal law banning discrimination against the disabled in government programs. And it's downright mean.

On Tuesday the administration, through the Justice Department, appealed a ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson, which requires the Treasury Department to develop paper money with features that would allow blind people to tell the difference between denominations. Robertson's order had been prompted by a lawsuit brought by the American Council for the Blind, which asked that bills be made in different sizes or that textured features be added to aid in differentiating bills.

Such changes would not be ground-breaking. Of 180 countries that use paper money, only the United States prints bills that are uniform in size, color and feel in every denomination.

Justice Department lawyers countered that blind people simply should use portable money reading devices to make purchases, or they should use credit cards. But the government has no plans to provide these machines, which cost around $350. Nor does it have a plan to deal with people who are not eligible for credit cards, including children and some of the large percentage of visually impaired Americans who are unemployed because of their disability.

Sight-impaired adults, like the rest of us, value their ability to live as independently as possible. According to their advocates, when it comes to distinguishing between denominations of currency, the blind use folding systems that help them distinguish, say, a $10 bill from a $20. But that only assists a person in knowing which bill to hand a clerk. A person who cannot see still has to rely on the honesty of the sales clerk to return the correct change.

This is not as it should be. Yes, it will cost money to redesign the nation's currency, but the Treasury Department has been in the process of adding new, anticounterfeit features to paper money for years. Officials should have taken the opportunity to deal with the issue of fairness to blind consumers during that process. It's late, but it's not too late to make this long-overdue change for the better.

ANTITRUST:

CVS-Caremark Deal Faces A $26 Billion Threat (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

Pharmacy-benefit manager Express Scripts Inc. was last night preparing a $26 billion cash and stock offer for Caremark Rx Inc., in an effort to break up the company's existing takeover deal with drug chain CVS Corp., people familiar with the matter said.

An offer could be launched as early as today, these people said. It could set off a back-and-forth struggle for Caremark, of Nashville, Tenn., at a time when the company's deal with CVS was gaining credibility in the market. That transaction -- which awarded no premium to Caremark's shareholders -- initially failed to convince investors, who pushed shares in both companies downward.

Further terms of the offer weren't clear. An Express Scripts spokesman declined to comment. A Caremark spokesman couldn't immediately be reached.

Friday, Caremark's shares ended at $50.30 in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Maryland Heights, Mo.-based Express Scripts is a far smaller company than Caremark, with a market capitalization of $9.3 billion, and debt of around $1.6 billion. The intended offer shows how the immense financings used to fund private-equity deals are also being used by corporate buyers trolling for acquisitions. In many ways, an Express Scripts offer would be akin to a leveraged buyout, with Express Scripts putting far more debt on its books than currently, while also accepting a lower credit rating.

Pharmacy-benefit managers such as Express Scripts and Caremark control the flow of medications through retail stores and health institutions.

Relatively smaller players such as Express have little choice but to act forcefully, as both macro-economic factors and street-level competition are reshaping the business.

Amid growing overall health costs, distribution is one of the expenses that insurers and the government are trying to squeeze. In the meantime, retail behemoth Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said it would begin charging $4 each for certain generic prescriptions, further pressuring both drug stores and the pharmacy managers.

It is likely that the cost-savings of the combination would be greater for the two than for Caremark and CVS, which owns a relatively small PBM of its own.

Those savings probably factor in heavily to the premium that Express Scripts plan to propose.

Putting together Express and Caremark would be an aggressive maneuver, given that the two rank as the third- and second-largest PBMs, respectively. It was unclear last night whether Express would propose any specific plans to address federal antitrust concerns, though such issues would surely be of prime concern for Caremark's board of directors.

Antitrust cases have been very rare during the Bush administration, especially after the Justice Department suffered a stinging defeat in its 2005 case against Oracle Corp., in its hostile bid for PeopleSoft Corp.

Health matters, however, are likely to receive greater scrutiny from federal authorities and state officials, who have for years lodged investigations into how the PBMs price and market their drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0107082

For the first six months of the year, Caremark reported net income of $483.9 million on revenue of $18.35 billion.

Drug Middleman Plans Hostile Bid For Rival (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

In an audacious takeover bid that could lead to lower drug prices for consumers, a company that manages employee drug plans will make a $26 billion hostile bid for a much larger rival, according to people briefed on the offer.

The bid by benefits manager Express Scripts for rival Caremark Rx tops a competing offer by the CVS drugstore chain in a bold move that evokes memories of the big buyout deals of the 1980s.

Pharmacy benefit managers act as the middleman between drug companies and employers that offer drug subsidies to their workers as part of health-care coverage. By acquiring Caremark Rx, which is double its size, Express Scripts would by far become the largest pharmacy benefits manager in the nation.

Together they would have even more clout when negotiating prices with drug makers for clients, typically big corporations and their employees. The deal would also save the combined company as much as $500 million a year by reducing overlapping costs.

Both pharmacy benefit managers and drug makers are under increasing pressure to keep drug prices low from all sides. Prices offered at the pharmacy counter have also come under threat in recent months by Wal-Mart, which said it would offer certain generic drugs for $4.

The takeover bid seeks to scuttle Caremark Rx's agreement last month to merge with CVS, the second-biggest drugstore chain in the country. That deal was expected to transform the drug industry.

Spokesmen for Express Scripts, Caremark and CVS could not be reached for comment.

The four largest prescription benefit mangers — Caremark, Medco Health Solutions, Wellpoint and Express Scripts — handle about 75 percent of the $235 billion spent on prescription medicines every year.

The takeover bid comes amid a record-setting year for mergers. As of the beginning of this month, there have been $3.3 trillion worth of deals in more than 32,000 transactions, according to Thomson Financial. Not since the days of the corporate raiders of the 1980's, as captured in films like "Wall Street" and books like "Barbarians at the Gate," have deal makers been so central in reshaping corporate America.

The bid will pit Express Scripts, with a market value of $9.3 billion, against the much-larger CVS, worth some $25 billion, in a battle over Caremark Rx. It is possible that a bidding war could ensue, with both suitors ratcheting up their offers. Any deal could face scrutiny from regulators in Washington.

The offer by Express Scripts is a throwback to the 1980's in two ways: it is a rare hostile bid that could spark a fierce bidding war, and it relies heavily on debt, some $14 billion.

Buyers do not like to get into bidding wars: they can get expensive quickly and they can drive away important employees and customers, eroding the value of the business they want. Even as merger activity has accelerated, the number of deals in the United States that had two or more bidders has fallen sharply this year, according to Thomson.

But companies are increasingly willing to use debt in deals. The $26 billion offer is a vivid illustration of the role that cheap credit is playing in fueling the explosion in takeovers. Historically, low interest rates and a flood of available cash have enabled private equity firms to buy out bigger and bigger companies.

In those cases, the firms typically put up a quarter or so of the value of the company and borrow the rest, planning to use the companies' revenues to pay off the loans. And even as the amount of debt used in these deals has risen to record levels, investors have stayed sanguine that the risks of default are low.

Now, Express Scripts is using the same weapon employed by private equity and leveraging itself or borrowing against the combined company to try to win Caremark. Other companies have also drunken deeply from the debt pool: the mining giant Freeport-McMoran Copper and Gold is essentially borrowing $15 billion to pursue its $25.9 billion takeover of Phelps Dodge.

The takeover bid by Express Scripts is being orchestrated by its chief executive, George Paz, who joined the company in 1998, as senior vice president and chief financial officer before becoming president in 2003 and then chief executive in 2005. Before Express Scripts, he was a partner at the accounting firm Coopers & Lybrand and then executive vice president and finance chief for Life Partners Group.

It is unclear how investors will react to Express Scripts' offer. Express Scripts had widely been considered a takeover target, not an acquirer, because of its small size. Indeed, its bid for Caremark could also put it into play. Kemp Dolliver, an analyst at Cowen & Company, wrote in a research note after the CVS-Caremark announcement that Express Scripts could be bought by Walgreen, Wal-Mart or Aetna.

The proposed merger between CVS and Caremark received a mixed reception by investors. When it was first announced, shares in both companies tumbled, but they have returned to close to where they started after the deal. In that deal, Caremark received no premium for its shares. Shares of Caremark closed Friday at $50.30.

Under the proposed offer by Express Scripts, Caremark shareholders would receive just shy of $58.50 a share in Express Scripts stock and cash, people briefed on the offer said, representing a 22 percent premium. Exact terms of the breakdown between stock and cash could not be learned.

Under Mr. Paz, Express Scripts has made several acquisitions, most recently acquiring Priority Healthcare Corporation for $1.3 billion in cash in July 2005.

Express Scripts, with some 13,000 employees, was formed in 1986 and went public in 1992. The company is based in Maryland Heights, Mo.

In 2003, New York's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, began an investigation into claims that Express Scripts had over billed the state's health care plans. In 2004, Mr. Spitzer sued the company in state court in Albany for breach of contract.

Latest Deal In Real Estate For $9 Billion (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Michael J. De La Merced

Realogy, the giant real estate franchisor that owns Coldwell Banker, Century 21 and Sotheby's International Realty agreed yesterday to be sold to Apollo Group, the private equity firm, for about $9 billion.

The deal marks the latest play by private equity firms to buy into the real estate business just as it appears to have peaked. Just two weeks ago, Blackstone Group led a $36 billion deal to acquire Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office building owner and manager, for about $36 billion, which was the biggest buyout in history.

The deal will be another huge payday for Henry R. Silverman, the architect behind Cendant, the conglomerate that Realogy was part of until it broke itself into four pieces earlier this year in an effort to revive its flagging stock price.

Mr. Silverman, who had been criticized for huge paydays while he was at Cendant, stands to make about $135 million by selling all of his shares and stock options as part of the deal. Mr. Silverman, who is now the chairman and chief executive of Realogy, is expected to stay on until his contract expires at the end of next year. However, Mr. Silverman will not be an equity participant with Apollo in the deal, and his out-of-the-money stock options (those below the strike price) will be canceled.

"I think it is a conflict to be the C.E.O. and to be the buyer," Mr. Silverman said in an interview, taking a swipe at management-led buyouts where the chief executive buys out his own company.

Realogy is among the biggest players in the real estate field, taking part in a fourth of all home sales nationally. It has more than 300,000 agents among its franchises, almost three times more than its closest rival, Re/Max International. It is also a player in commercial real estate through its Coldwell Banker Commercial arm.

Yet the company has seen its fortunes decline as the real estate market has slumped. Sales have dropped from 2005, a record year, and more homes are staying on the market longer. The rise in home prices has slackened to the slowest pace seen since 1998, according to government reports. And the National Association of Realtors said earlier this month that it expected home sales to continue to decline next year.

Moreover, Internet-based brokerages and discount shops may have dealt a further blow to traditional real estate brokerages. Commissions have fallen to an average of 5 percent from 6 percent a decade ago, although experts say that slide had begun before the entrance of the discounters.

For the quarter that ended Sept. 30, Realogy reported net revenue of $1.73 billion, a decline from the $2.08 billion it earned as a part of Cendant a year ago.

"Our earnings are going down," Mr. Silverman said. "We're probably not going to see a recovery until 2009. This deal is an insurance policy."

He said he had decided to pursue the deal with Apollo, which approached the company earlier this year, because, "we need to be owned by someone with a five-year time horizon," suggesting that many public shareholders, including hedge funds, have a "five-second horizon."

Under the terms of the deal, Realogy shareholders will receive $30 a share in cash, a premium over the stock's Friday closing price of $25.50. Apollo said it would commit $2 billion of equity to Realogy.

The deal is expected to close in the spring of 2007, but Realogy may solicit other buyout proposals until Feb. 14. in what is known as a "go shop" provision. Should it accept another offer, Realogy will pay Apollo a breakup fee.

Mr. Silverman said the company decided against a full auction because it could be "very destabilizing to the staff and customers." He said that the deal with Apollo meant "an outcome is guaranteed" that company would be sold and that a potential higher offer could still be sought.

Apollo, which said that it was strongly positioned to take Realogy forward, is no stranger to the company or the industry. In 1997, Apollo and Cendant formed NRT, or National Realty Trust, as a joint venture to consolidate various fragments in the residential real estate market. NRT revenues then grew to $3 billion by 2001, and it made 200 acquisitions and added $1.5 billion in annual commission revenues. Cendant bought out Apollo's stake in NRT in 2002.

"Realogy's powerful real estate brands and their long heritage of leadership in the industry serve as a strong platform for future growth and we are pleased to again have it as part of our investment portfolio," Marc Becker, a partner at Apollo, said in a statement.

Realogy, along with the rest of its former Cendant brethren, has long been seen as a potential target for a private equity buyer. Its $500 million in annual cash flow and relatively small debt were seen as attractive to such firms. And analysts have said that residential real estate companies like Realogy often find rough times on Wall Street, where the cyclical drops in the housing markets have taken a toll on such companies' share prices. Some of Realogy's competitors, like Re/Max, are already privately held.

Evercore Partners advised Realogy on the deal, while Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom served as legal counsel. J. P. Morgan Chase and Credit Suisse were Apollo's financial advisers, while Wachtell Lipton Rosen & Katz worked as its legal counsel. J. P. Morgan, Credit Suisse and Bears Stearns will provide Apollo with debt financing.

Realogy Agrees To $6.4-billion Sale (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, December 18, 2006

Realogy Corp., the largest U.S. residential real estate broker, agreed to be acquired by private equity firm Apollo Management for about $6.4 billion amid a slump in the U.S. housing market.

Residential brokers including Realogy have been hurt by a U.S. housing market slowdown.

Home prices fell in about a third of U.S. metropolitan areas in the third quarter as the slump forced sellers to accept lower bids, the National Assn. of Realtors said last month.

Although the company's takeover would allow stockholders "to realize the value of Realogy's fundamentally strong businesses," the purchase price "takes into account the substantial pressures and uncertainties facing the residential real estate markets that may well continue for some time," Chief Executive Henry R. Silverman said in a statement.

Realogy shareholders would receive $30 a share, Parsippany, N.J.-based Realogy said Sunday in a statement. That's 18% more than the stock's closing price Friday. Including debt, the deal is valued at about $9 billion, Realogy said.

The purchase must be approved by the holders of a majority of Realogy's shares and receive antitrust and insurance approvals. Realogy and Apollo plan to complete the purchase by the middle of next year.

Under the terms of the agreement, Realogy may solicit proposals from other potential buyers until Feb. 14. Any proposals would be considered by a special committee and independent advisors, Realogy said.

The company is the world's largest real estate franchisor. Its companies include Century 21, Coldwell Banker, Coldwell Banker Commercial, ERA and Southeby's International Realty. It has 15,000 employees worldwide and 320,000 brokers and sales associates.

Harrah's Close To Accepting $16.7 Billion Buyout (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

Gambling giant Harrah's Entertainment Inc. yesterday was poised to accept a bid valued at roughly $16.7 billion from two private-equity firms, which are expected to retain its current management and strategy, people familiar with the matter said.

If a deal with Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group is completed, Chairman and Chief Executive Gary Loveman is expected to stay at the helm of Las Vegas-based Harrah's, the world's largest casino operator by revenue. The company's plans -- including a redevelopment of its numerous properties and vast land holdings along the Las Vegas Strip -- also are expected to proceed, these people said.

The two sides continued last night to haggle over the final details, and it was unclear whether they would reach an agreement today. A deal, which would value Harrah's at $90 a share in cash, would be one of the largest private-equity buyouts.

Harrah's plan for Las Vegas, delayed for months but due to be announced early next year, is expected to include not just new hotel rooms, but also huge retail and restaurant offerings intended to keep visitors on Harrah's property as long as possible. Industry observers have speculated that a buyout by private-equity firms would let the plans proceed without pressure from Wall Street and public investors, who have worried that the Las Vegas construction market has grown increasingly crowded and expensive in recent years. The Harrah's redevelopment faces competition from a $7 billion MGM Mirage project and a proposed $4 billion complex from Boyd Gaming Corp., among others.

If a sale is reached, Harrah's could shed some of its 39 casinos around the nation in order to streamline an organization that ballooned with new employees and properties after its 2005 acquisition of rival Caesars Entertainment Inc.

On Friday, shares of Harrah's were up 40 cents in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading to $79.50, 13% below the final offer price. They had climbed as high as $83.33 after the initial unsolicited bid was announced more than two months ago. Harrah's had a market value on Friday of about $14.8 billion. Last year, the company earned $236.4 million on revenue of $7.1 billion. As of Sept. 30, Harrah's was carrying about $11 billion of debt.

A deal, which would require top executives from Apollo and Texas Pacific to undergo the lengthy casino-licensure process in every jurisdiction where Harrah's operates casinos, would be expected to close within 12 to 18 months, according to people with knowledge of the details. There will likely be a provision in the proposed deal that includes penalties for Apollo and Texas Pacific should the deal take longer to close.

Harrah's has been mum on the status of any deal since it first received an $81-a-share offer from the private-equity firms on Oct. 2. That bid was quickly raised to $83.50 a share in cash, but Harrah's never acknowledged the updated offer or any subsequent movement by potential bidders.

The company set a Dec. 12 deadline for any bids, and it received one for $87 a share from Apollo and Texas Pacific as well as an $87-a-share cash-and-stock offer from regional casino operator Penn National Gaming Inc., Wyomissing, Pa. Harrah's board began meeting last Wednesday and reviewed the offers through the weekend, according to people close to the matter. Officials from Harrah's and the private-equity firms declined to comment. An official from Penn National didn't immediately return a call for comment.

Harrah's is just the latest target in a private-equity buying binge this year that shows no sign of abating during 2007. With so much cash to spend, the buyout shops are plunging deeper into areas where they were once loathe to tread. Such areas include casinos, which deliver reliable cash flows but require the rigorous licensing process that delves into individuals' financial and personal backgrounds.

Earlier this month, Station Casinos Inc., a Las Vegas casino company that caters largely to the city's local gamblers, announced it had received an offer of $81 a share from a management-led consortium to take the company private. The company's board continues to evaluate that bid.

Consolidation Sweeps Through Chipmaking Industry (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, December 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Computer chip companies are in a dealmaking frenzy — gobbling up rivals or going private — as they attempt to adjust to a changing industry.

Nearly $40 billion worth of deals have been announced or closed since August, and chip analysts say more are on the way. The biggest so far:

•Freescale Semiconductor, the former chipmaking arm of Motorola, was bought out by a consortium of investors for $17.6 billion this month. A majority stake in Philips Semiconductor was similarly purchased for $11 billion in September. It is now named NXP.

•Computer processor-maker Advanced Micro Devices bought graphics chipmaker ATI Technologies in September for $5.4 billion. A few weeks later, ATI rival Nvidia bought PortalPlayer, best known for making chips for Apple's iPod media player, for $352 million.

•LSI Logic has announced plans to buy Agere Systems for $4 billion. Both make chips for consumer electronics and other devices.

Among smaller deals: SanDisk's $250 million purchase of Matrix Semiconductor and Cisco Systems' $12.5 million purchase of Nemo Systems. Cellphone chipmaker Qualcomm made two recent acquisitions: Airgo Networks and a division of RF Micro Devices. Terms were not disclosed.

"You're seeing consolidation," says LSI Logic CEO Abhi Talwalkar. "It offers you at least some immunity to this crazy market."

The semiconductor industry has always been competitive. But the tech boom of the 1990s created dozens of midsize chipmakers, says semiconductor analyst John Barber at researcher Gartner.

Many went after specialty markets, because there used to be big technical differences between products. A PC and a cellphone, for example, didn't share many parts.

Now, digital technology has eliminated many of the differences, says Michael Hara, a vice president at Nvidia. That's allowed bigger chipmakers such as Nvidia, best known for its PC chips, to push into phones, music players and other once-specialized markets.

At the same time, development costs are soaring as chips get tinier. In 2000, a typical chip cost between $5 million and $10 million to design, Barber says. Today, it's between $10 million and $20 million.

That makes it hard to be a midsize chipmaker. "You either need to niche yourself or get bigger," Talwalkar says.

Going private is another option, says chip analyst Jim Feldhan at Semico Research. Eliminating the day-to-day pressure of Wall Street can make it easier to do business in a tough market, he says.

Feldhan and others say they expect consolidation to continue. "Smaller companies are looking for help," says Hara.

But don't expect the industry to shrink to one or two big players, Feldhan says. Start-ups keep entering the market, because chipmaking can be lucrative, he says. Some will quickly be acquired or go out of business; others will likely become the next generation of major players, he says.

Congress Prepares For Hearings Over Airline Mergers (AZREP)

By Marilyn Geewax, Cox News Service

The Arizona Republic, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - Even though the new Congress won't convene until January, key lawmakers are preparing for hearings to examine the economic impact of possible airline mergers.

Many members of Congress are condemning the potential deals, while few, if any, are supporting the idea of industry consolidation.

Congress has no direct role to play in approving mergers, but it could help sway public perceptions and increase political pressure on the Department of Justice to reject the airline transactions on antitrust grounds.

advertisement

Perhaps the most controversial of the potential acquisitions involves US Airways Group Inc.'s unsolicited $8.7 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. The two carriers have routes that overlap significantly along the East Coast, and hubs relatively near each other in the West.

Congressmen representing Phoenix, Atlanta, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Salt Lake City, Charlotte, N.C., and other cities where the two airlines have major operations fear that a merger would wipe out jobs, diminish air service and drive up ticket prices, said Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga.

Concerns about a loss of competition grew dramatically last week when UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, and Continental Airlines Inc. announced they are considering a possible merger. In addition, AirTran Holdings Inc. offered to buy Midwest Air Group Inc. for about $290 million. With so many carriers now in play, the number of concerned congressmen is on the rise.

"We can voice our opinion," Lewis said, "and because we all represent different parts of the country, speaking out could have a tremendous impact on what happens."

James Oberstar, D-Minn., is incoming chairman of the House Transportation Committee. He said recently that if it appears that the US Airways takeover of Delta would be going forward in the new year, he would hold a hearing into the matter. Teri Rucker, a spokeswoman for Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the incoming chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, said that panel also plans to hold a hearing.

Oberstar said by publicly exposing the potential dangers of airline consolidation, his committee may be able to "throw cold water" on merger mania.

"We can nudge the Justice Department to take the action" it must to prevent a loss in competition, he said.

Oberstar also said opposition to consolidation is bipartisan.

"I've heard from members on both sides of the aisle," he said, as worries have grown about the economic impact on jobs and service.

"I haven't heard anyone come forward and say this is a really good deal," he said.

Michael Boyd, president of the Boyd Group Inc., an aviation consulting firm, agreed that Congress would become involved because so many lawmakers represent cities with huge stakes in the outcome.

"There are a lot of dogs in this fight," he said.

Delta management opposes the transaction with US Airways, but if it were to go forward, the two carriers would have to drop routes to avoid expensive redundancies and overcome antitrust concerns.

That could eliminate jobs and flights, especially in smaller cities, like Savannah, Ga., and West Palm Beach, Fla.

"Any Georgia legislator who doesn't stand up against this merger isn't doing his constituents any good," Boyd said.

Earlier this month, the two chief executives, Delta's Gerald Grinstein and US Airways' Doug Parker, each met with Oberstar to discuss their views.

Darryl Jenkins, an industry consultant based in northern Virginia, said that whether Congress gets deeply engaged in the issue of airline competition may depend on the views of creditors owed money by Delta, which is under the protection of Bankruptcy Court.

If by next month those creditors are in favor of the deal, then the bankruptcy judge may in turn support it, and the transaction could be completed. That would push the other deals forward, too.

"Everyone is interested in this (Delta deal) because if one merger goes through, then two or three other mergers will follow," Jenkins said.

Unfriendly Skies (WSJ)

By Robert W. Crandall And Clifford Winston

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

Almost on cue, members of Congress have responded to US Airways' interest in acquiring Delta Air Lines, and a possible deal between United Airlines and Continental Airlines, with predictions that fares will rise, service will be reduced, and more mergers will surely follow. Not to appear soft on threats to competition, the Justice Department has expressed its concern that the proposed mergers raise antitrust concerns and has vowed to conduct thorough investigations.

Mergers may harm consumers if they are the route to (or the root of) market power and ultimately allow the combined firm to increase consumer prices and reduce service. In such cases, enforcement of the antitrust laws could improve consumer welfare by blocking the mergers before they occur and by discouraging future harmful mergers. But our research suggests that government efforts to address such threats do little to improve consumer welfare and sometimes actually reduce it. More importantly, government often misses fruitful opportunities to benefit consumers because it eschews market-oriented policies.

The empirical evidence on the main factors that influence airlines to merge their operations does not suggest that these mergers are driven by a desire to obtain market power. In a 2000 paper, Steven Morrison and Clifford Winston analyzed the determinants of all the actual and attempted airline mergers since the 1978 deregulation. They found that carriers are generally not motivated to merge for anticompetitive reasons, but rather by the acquiring carriers' desire to expand their international routes -- which are far more profitable than most domestic routes due to government-to-government agreements that limit entry -- and by the acquired carriers' need to be rescued from financial distress.

Clearly, gaining access to additional international routes is an important consideration in the two mergers under discussion. US Airways would gain from having access to international routes currently served by Delta, and United and Continental could gain from expanding their portfolio of international routes. Because Delta is in the process of emerging from bankruptcy, it appears to have solved its financial problems on its own and is therefore not enthusiastic about a merger with US Airways.

What about evidence on the effects of previous mergers on travelers? In the aforementioned paper, the authors found that the USAir-Piedmont merger and the Northwest-Republic and TWA-Ozark mergers, which were opposed by the Justice Department but approved by the U.S. Department of Transportation (at the time DOT had jurisdiction in the matter), had benign effects on fares while increasing travelers' accumulation of frequent flier miles.

Today's airline industry has become very competitive because of the expansion of low-cost carriers such as Southwest, JetBlue and AirTran, whose combined market share currently approaches one-third of the domestic market. Any potential anticompetitive effects of a US Airways-Delta merger or a United-Continental merger would be quickly tempered by the responses of these low-cost carriers. The larger "legacy" (pre-deregulation) carriers now face competition from low-cost carriers on nearly three-quarters of their domestic routes. Low cost carriers have expanded their presence even to such markets as Philadelphia and Pittsburgh that had traditionally been dominated by legacy carriers, and they are poised to provide additional capacity in any markets that are adversely affected by any of the proposed mergers. Low-cost carriers can and do move very quickly to mitigate any increase in fares initiated by the legacy carriers -- whether caused by a merger or simply by unilateral action.

Ultimately, the effect on travelers of changes in airline market structure caused by mergers or other forces depends on the specific carriers that exit a market and the specific carriers that take their place. For example, a recent study found that in the year 2000 travelers would have been $20 billion worse off due to higher fares and less frequent service if Southwest Airlines did not exist at all. In contrast, consumers would actually have been better off during that year if US Airways had left the industry because more efficient carriers, such as Southwest, would have entered its routes. Because any initial contraction in service and increase in fares by merged legacy carriers is likely to attract entry by low-cost carriers, fares would quickly decline to or possibly below pre-merger levels and return service frequency to or possibly above pre-merger levels. Trustbusters would be prudent if they simply exercised a reasonable degree of patience in the wake of such combinations.

Rather than attempt to combat airline mergers, government policy makers could have a much more beneficial impact on the welfare of air travelers by pursuing policies that increase competition on international and domestic routes. With one swift stroke, deregulation of international markets would eliminate a major motivation for many of the mergers. The U.S. government has been negotiating so-called "Open Skies" agreements with other countries for several years, but negotiations have invariably stalled for a variety of reasons. One issue is the government-mandated limit on foreign ownership of U.S. carriers, currently capped at 49%. Ending any limits on foreign ownership would also make it easier for struggling U.S. carriers to attract foreign capital to help solve their financial problems and possibly eliminate another major reason that carriers seek a merger.

Allowing foreign carriers to serve U.S. domestic routes (cabotage) would provide another source of competition that would benefit air travelers. Think of how foreign transplants have transformed the automobile and steel industries to the benefit of consumers. Sir Richard Branson has expressed an interest in starting up a Virgin Airways operation in the U.S. but faces ownership issues, among other obstacles.

Still another way that policy makers could potentially stimulate airline competition is to privatize U.S. airports, thereby allowing them to compete aggressively for air carrier service. Competitive entry at some airports is constrained by insufficient gates and terminal space. Given the contractual relationship governing publicly owned airports and the incumbent airlines that help pay their bonds, some airports have limited incentives to attract additional carriers.

Federal policy makers' attempts to correct market failures, such as those deriving from monopoly power, have in practice frequently been an abject failure, and missed opportunities to improve market performance. The latest round of proposed airline mergers illustrates the problem: Policy makers will undoubtedly find it politically expedient to use the antitrust laws in an inappropriate manner, instead of standing up to the entrenched interests who oppose changes in current government policies that would have a far more beneficial impact on competition in the airline industry.

National Meddling Presents Serious Challenge To Brussels (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, December 18, 2006

The European Commission has regularly courted controversy by blocking mergers and takeovers. Last week, the Brussels-based regulator learnt that defending such deals can be just as hard.

The Commission could only look on in frustration as Spain's Abertis and Autostrade, the Italian motorway operator, abandoned a €25bn ($33bn) merger that would have created a new pan-European infrastructure group.

The deal was waved through by Brussels in September, but the groups came under such intense political and regulatory pressure from the Italian government that they decided to call off the deal on Wednesday.

Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, and Charlie McCreevy, the EU internal market commissioner, had warned Rome repeatedly to mind its own business. Both ruled that Italy's objections violated EU law and threatened to file a legal challenge - but their intervention still failed to save the deal.

Worryingly for Brussels, Abertis/Autostrade is noisolated case. While cross-border mergers and takeovers in the European Union have increased during recent years, a growing number of deals face stiff opposition from governments and national regulators.

To the Commission - which by law has the exclusive power to scrutinise and approve big pan-European mergers - such national meddling presents a serious challenge to its authority.

To business leaders, it serves as a powerful reminder that large cross-border deals can be torpedoed by political and national sensitivities - in spite of the regulatory and political backing from Brussels.

The first sign of trouble came last year, when the Commission fought a fierce battle with the Italian central bank governor over his attempt to derail two foreign takeovers of domestic banks.

After months of legal wrangling and political drama, Antonio Fazio was forced to leave office, clearing the way for ABN Amro's takeover of Banco Antonveneta.

The next clash over banking takeovers took place in Warsaw, after the Polish government tried to prevent Italy's UniCredit from winning control of the nation's second largest bank, BPH.

Brussels launched legal proceedings against the government in March this year, but was sidelined when UniCredit struck a deal with Warsaw that allowed the takeover to go ahead in return for selling 200 of BPH's 466 branches.

By far the biggest test of the Commission powers and ability, however, is still being played out. Eon, the German energy giant, has been waiting for almost a year for Spain to drop its objections to its €37bn take-over bid for Endesa, the Spanish utility. Brussels has already ruled the government's objections illegal under European law, and has opened infringement procedures against Spain.

The problem for the Commission is that Brussels lacks the instruments to bring recalcitrant governments into line.

Although the regulator enjoys sweeping powers to police the internal market and crack down on antitrust abuses and illegal subsidies, it usually takes several years for the Commission to bring its cases to an end.

Infringement cases - in which governments are prosecuted for breaking EU laws - require the Commission to send out a first warning, which is followed by a formal ruling and, eventually, a challenge before the European Court of Justice.

The court then takes two to three years to issue a final ruling.

As Mr McCreevy told the Financial Times in a recent interview: "Companies can't wait around forever. They can't wait for law to take its course. Some member states know that. They know that time is their friend."

While in the past the mere threat of Commission action could be enough to bring recalcitrant member states into line, many officials fear that a growing number of member states today have no qualms about ignoring Brussels' edicts.

The waiting game is made even easier, as one senior Commission officials pointed out last week, by the recent "proliferation of national regulators" in EU member states.

This means that many obstacles to cross-border takeovers are not directly thrown up by governments, but by more or less independent bodies not directly answerable to Brussels.

What Green Activists Don't Want You To Know (WSJ)

By Senator James Inhofe (R., Okla.)

Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

I write to applaud your Dec. 4 editorial "Global Warming Gag Order1." I also read with interest the responses from your readers ("Senators' 'Chill Out' Letter to Exxon Creates a Heated Reaction2," Letters to the Editor, Dec. 13). As chairman of the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works for the past four years, I have held several hearings examining the fears of manmade catastrophic global warming, and I have spoken publicly on this issue more than any other senator.

Those who wish to quell opposing viewpoints on manmade global warming do so because of a number of inconvenient facts about both the science of climate change and the economic harm their proposed "solutions" would cause the American people.

What the activists and special interest groups don't want you to know is that 60 scientists wrote an open letter to Canadian Prime Minister Harper this year stating, "If, back in the mid-1990s, we knew what we know today about climate, Kyoto would almost certainly not exist, because we would have concluded it was not necessary."

They don't want you to know that Claude Allegre, a leading French scientist who is a member of both the U.S. and French National Academies of Sciences, recently defected from the alarmist camp, and now says the cause of global warming is "unknown." They don't want you to know that the U.N.'s Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change is expected to revise downward significantly its estimate of man's contribution to global warming in its upcoming Fourth Assessment Report or that another U.N. report recently found that emissions from cows were more damaging to the planet than C02 from cars.

And they certainly don't want you to know that their favored solution, the Kyoto Protocol -- often referred to by supporters as merely a "first step" -- would cost the average American family more than $2,700 a year while having no measurable impact on global temperature.

Despite enjoying a huge advantage in funding over skeptics, liberal special interests groups have had almost no impact in convincing policymakers to pass economically destructive climate legislation in the U.S. Now it appears those same alarmists are panicking and adopting a new agenda: to silence those who disagree with their views. I find it troubling that two of my colleagues in the Senate would join the campaign to shut down the ongoing debate on the science of global warming.

Europe V. America On CO2 (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

Climate-change activists and Democrats on Capitol Hill are gearing up to push the U.S. to limit so-called greenhouse gases. In their telling, America must save mankind from an eco-Apocalypse by adopting the arbitrary targets popular with Europe and other Kyoto Protocol signatories.

Well, let's look at results in the real world, as opposed to this Kyoto spin. Recent data show that placing artificial limits on emissions hasn't done all that much to reduce emissions, and may even be counterproductive. Contrary to caricature, the American approach offers more promise than Europe's.

As the nearby chart shows, CO2 emissions growth in the U.S. far outpaced that of the 15 "old" members of the European Union from 1990-95 and especially from 1995-2000, when Mr. Climate Change himself, Al Gore, was the second-most powerful man in America. But, lo, the U.S. has outperformed the EU-15 since 2000, according to the latest U.N. data. America's rate of growth in CO2 emissions from 2000-04 was eight percentage points lower than from 1995-2000.

By comparison, the EU-15 saw an increase of 2.3 points. Only two EU states, Britain and Sweden, are on track to meet their Kyoto emissions commitments by 2010. Six more might meet their targets if they approve and implement new, as yet unspecified, policies to restrict carbon output, while seven of the 15 will miss their goals.

Cynics play down America's improvement, noting that its economy cooled from the earlier years to 2000-04. True, but the EU-15 also had lower economic growth in the latest period and still saw its emissions growth rate double. What's more, the U.S. economy expanded 38% faster than the EU-15 in 2000-04, and its population twice as fast. So the trend lines, for now, are reversing. That may frustrate the green lobby because so much of its fund raising depends on vilifying the U.S. But facts are facts, no matter how underreported they are.

Europe's dismal record is explained by its approach to reducing emissions. The centerpiece of the Continent's plan is a carbon-trading scheme in which companies in CO2-heavy industries receive tradable permits for a certain amount of emissions. If they emit more CO2, they must buy credits from firms that are under quota. The idea is to force companies to emit less CO2 by making it prohibitively expensive to keep the status quo.

All this scheme has done so far is provide further proof that government cannot replicate the wisdom of markets. A red-faced European Commission recently admitted that it allowed more permits than there were emissions in 2005-07, keeping permit prices low and undermining the entire system. When Brussels tried to make amends by ordering several member states to cut carbon permits by 7% more than expected for 2008-2012, industry and national capitals squealed. The market hadn't priced in such a dramatic reduction. With carbon permits trading relatively cheaply, firms have been able to get by with minimal changes to the way they do business. That has minimized Kyoto's economic impact.

Once the supply of permits is more in line with the eurocrats' ambitious environmental goals, though, expect European industry to take a big hit. The number of firms moving manufacturing work to countries without emissions caps, such as China and India, will only grow. That might make Europe's emissions data look good, but it will have zero net effect on the world's production of greenhouse gases.

Some companies may elect to purchase cleaner equipment, but the rising cost of compliance -- i.e., buying more carbon permits at higher prices once the supply is slashed -- will eat into the money available for developing the next generation of clean technology. In short, Europe offers no magic solution for capping greenhouse gases.

America may even have a few things to teach the Old World. The U.S. strategy has been to keep economic growth strong and provide incentives for private industry to develop cleaner technologies. For instance, the Bush Administration has proposed $1 billion in tax credits for nine new coal-fired power plants that will double efficiency and reduce pollution compared with older generations. China is picking up on these tactics. This year it bought $58 million in machines from Caterpillar Inc. that trap methane in coal mines and use it to power electric generators.

If global-warming activists were as interested in lowering air temperatures as they are in expanding the role of the state, they'd understand that the key to reducing carbon emissions lies in unleashing the private sector, not capping it. That's the real lesson from the policies -- and the results -- in Europe and the U.S.

Marin Changes Course In War On Marijuana Growers (MIJ)

By Joe Wolfcale

Marin Independent-Journal, December 18, 2006

The dope growers who ripped up Marin parkland to plant acres of marijuana valued at more than $100 million this summer, then got away as authorities moved in, might not be as lucky next year.

County sheriff, federal park rangers and other officials are planning a crackdown aimed at ensuring extensive growing operations don't take root again.

"There's no doubt we'll be intensifying our efforts next year," said Marin County sheriff's Lt. Scott Anderson, who coordinates county marijuana eradication efforts. "I don't think anyone thought we'd see the level of marijuana cultivation on public lands that we did this season."

Authorities say 43,356 marijuana plants were discovered in 24 plots, many on both sides of Bolinas Ridge, with most flourishing in elaborate, sophisticated grow sites on public land.

Marin County Sheriff Robert Doyle said deputies will coordinate plans with other Marin authorities to thwart the growers.

"Not only is it illegal, it's also a huge threat to the safety of our residents," Doyle said. "We'll do everything we can to eradicate the problem.

"We fully intend to flush it out."

DOJ_NMG_0107093

Point Reyes National Seashore Superintendent Don Neubacher wants federal aid so rangers can step up eradication efforts next season.

Neubacher said Point Reyes authorities have already met to discuss the problem.

"We need more aerial surveillance and more of a presence and adequate personnel to prohibit this from happening again," Neubacher said. "What happened this summer was shocking to us. These growers are bold. I'd say there's a good chance they will come back. I think the money will be well spent."

The grow sitesA total of 26,165 marijuana plants were found on Marin Municipal Water District land, 10,335 on national seashore land and 6,856 on private property between July 21 and Sept. 20.

In one grow site, plants more than 10 feet tall were so laden with plump sinsemilla buds, the stalks sagged parallel to the ground because of the weight.

Law enforcement agencies seized the plants in a series of raids that included agents of the National Park Service, U.S. Park Police, the Marin County Water District, Sonoma and Marin County sheriff's offices and the Marin Major Crimes Task Force. Aerial support was provided by the California Highway Patrol and Air National Guard.

No one was charged with growing the marijuana, although two Hispanic men from the East Bay were arrested for allegedly carrying a concealed weapon in a car and possession of cocaine and methamphetamine. They were found in a remote West Marin area during the harvest season.

Police did come close to nailing some of those tending the marijuana gardens, however - so close that officers found plates of steaming scrambling eggs left behind by the growers.

Another time, three Hispanic men were seen in the pot fields, but fled.

"Take a walk on Mount Tamalpais and see the vastness of the area and you can certainly see how someone could pull this off," Doyle said. "Growing and harvesting marijuana is big business. It's high-quality stuff. I know an exhaustive search was done and I think we made a significant dent."

In early September, authorities discovered 1,200 plants that were cut and stacked near Kent Lake waiting to be destroyed the next day, were stolen overnight. The pot was valued at $3 million.

Doyle said stationing deputies overnight at the remote site was not worth the risk of a confrontation with growers.

"It just wasn't worth it," Doyle said. "I don't know if there's any sense of embarrassment on our part," in light of the stolen pot, he said. "We just couldn't put deputies out in the middle of nowhere. If there had been some sort of shootout, people in the community would have vilified us."

Drug sophisticates

The growers used complex irrigation systems, sometimes running several hundred feet of plastic tubing through trees and shrubs to provide water. Some farms were discovered 30 to 40 yards from a trail, while others were accessible only after lengthy hikes in rugged terrain.

Some sites had man-made reservoirs that used water siphoned from streams and creeks. Remote hillsides were terraced. Trees were cut, pesticides and fertilizers used, and small game slaughtered. Piles of debris were found.

The camp sites providing shelter for the growers included propane stoves and sleeping quarters. Most grow sites were several years old - tree roots had begun to grow over camp structures.

Most camps had escape routes. Ammunition was found, but no guns.

"Putting a pricetag on the environmental damage is difficult," Point Reyes National Seashore spokesman John Dell'Osso said. "This type of large-scale planting threatens the very mission of the park service. We want to provide the natural resources of the area while providing safe recreational opportunities for our residents, both of which were threatened."

He noted the farms in remote areas, sometimes hidden by a canopy of trees, were nurtured by rich soil and nearby water sources. "These plants have incredibly ideal situations," Dell'Osso said.

Marin Conservation Corps and National Park Service personnel worked last week to clear debris from the grow sites. A helicopter from the Air National Guard lifted out more than 60 cubic yards of waste, including irrigation pipes, garbage bags, fertilizer and pesticides.

Point Reyes National Seashore officials said it cost more than $100,000 to clean up the mess.

"We are now at a point where we can safely say we have removed all of the debris left behind," Colin Smith, the seashore's chief enforcement ranger, said. "We hope this will discourage these individuals from coming back."

Statewide problem

Marin's situation is similar to what is happening across California.

Marin was ranked 12th this year in marijuana seizures, according to statistics from the state attorney general office's Campaign Against Marijuana Planting.

The state reported 1,675,681 plants confiscated in 2006, up from 1.1 million the year before, with most seized on public lands. Estimated wholesale value of the statewide haul was put at $6.7 billion.

"Certainly for us it was a record seizure year," said Kent Shaw, assistant chief of the Department of Justice's Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement in Sacramento. "We definitely realize we have to put more resources in that direction. We're definitely seeing signs we're having an impact on some of these organizations. I'm not surprised at all by what we're seeing.

"They're not only growing more of it, the potency of what they can produce is getting better" and far more potent, he said. "Some of these stalks look like trees."

Authorities say they believe cultivation efforts are the work of major Mexican drug cartels that find growing pot in California is easier than smuggling it across the border.

Authorities back the assertion by pointing to similarities in the construction of the marijuana camp sites, evidence found at the sites, including food, trash and gear, and intelligence gathered across the state by narcotics investigators.

State authorities estimate more than 50 percent of marijuana sold in the United States originates from California. The growers are predominately Mexican nationals in the United States illegally, state and local officials say.

"We've found cells operating numerous grow sites," state narcotics chief Shaw said. "They're large organizations. It just depends on how far their tentacles reach. In some counties, these people operate with fairly liberal impunity.

"They select areas that will create the greatest return and where they're less likely to go to jail."

Frank Egger of Fairfax, who served on the Town Council for four decades, said more needs to be done to protect the community.

"Our residents hike and recreate all over that mountain," Egger said. "I think that's the issue no one's looking at. This county's going to have to get a handle on it, and they better do it fairly quickly.

"It's clearly a safety issue," he said. "We could be doing more."

Water board member Alex Forman was shocked about the scope of the operation.

"I think it shows how incredibly vast the wild open spaces are in these areas," Forman said. "I wouldn't blame local law enforcement. I'm not surprised no one's been caught. I don't think anyone was expecting they'd be so clever about it.

"We know now there's a problem. We just have to control it."

National parks officials said the drug sweeps this summer might scare off growers.

"We're hoping that the effort we put out this summer will hopefully deter this type of illegal activity," Dell'Osso said.

Doyle said before next year's growing season begins, officials with the sheriff's department will sit down with other authorities and devise a coordinated plan.

"It's not going to be easy," Doyle said. "People have to realize these are vast areas and these people are dangerous."

But Doyle said one thing is for sure.

"We'll do everything we can to eliminate those groves."

IMMIGRATION:

Swift Raids (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0107095

When federal immigration officials raided six plants owned by Swift & Company, the world's second largest beef and pork processor, last Tuesday, they brought Spanish translators. They knew exactly what kind of worker is found in low-paying, strenuous jobs in this country: recent Latino arrivals with limited skills and, in many cases, no legal papers. Nearly 1,300 people — almost 10 percent of Swift's work force — were taken away in what the government said was the largest but not the last assault on the underground immigrant economy.

The raids have led some people to heap scorn on Swift and, of course, on the illegal immigrants, particularly the dozens of detainees who have been charged with identity theft and other crimes. But doing so misses the bigger picture. Swift and its workers are merely Exhibit A in an immigration system that is failing in all of its parts.

It is a system that rewards illegality and pays lip service to lawfulness and order.

Swift insists that it is a model corporate citizen. It obeyed the rules, which require it to check workers' identity papers and file so-called I-9 forms attesting to that. And it went further, participating in the federal Basic Pilot program, a system of checking Social Security numbers that President Bush has touted as a way to crack down on immigration fraud. The company says that prying any more aggressively into workers' legal status would leave it open to civil rights lawsuits.

The Swift raids are powerful evidence that I-9's and Basic Pilot are ineffective and disingenuous, a nod to by-the-books technical lawfulness that allows a far vaster world of illegality to flourish. Swift and other large-scale employers of immigrants, like farms and hotels, may insist that they never knowingly hire people illegally. But as long as the jobs they offer are the kinds whose pay and conditions consistently fail to attract native-born Americans, their protests will ring hollow. This system is brilliantly efficient at bringing lots of cheap products and services to market, which is great unless you mind its essential lawlessness, anonymity and reliance on an enormous work force of silent, compliant, frightened people whose bitter choice is to stay here illegally or go home and be desperately poor.

Swift, by its lights, was doing the right thing. The federal government was doing the right thing, waking up, belatedly, to workplace enforcement. And yet it's impossible to see how this will work over the long term. Immigration reform built on piecemeal enforcement — factory raids and border walls — won't solve the problem of the 12 million illegal immigrants already here. The American economy wouldn't stand the shock if the Swift raids were multiplied to levels beyond the merely symbolic.

The system needs what Mr. Bush and Congress have refused to give it: a way to end the sham. Comprehensive immigration reform is good for the economy, giving companies access to a secure and stable work force. It is good for national security, allowing law enforcement to go after real criminals and leave honest working people alone. And it is good for the immigrant workers across the country, terrorized by Tuesday's raids, who just want to keep doing their jobs, no matter how hard and distasteful.

Focus Shifts North Amid Terror Fears (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, December 18, 2006

Police, lawmakers say 'the forgotten border' is difficult to secure — and too easy to cross

Along slim sections of the nation's vast northern border, anyone can drive the back roads that flow from Canada into the United States.

So it's only natural for Caribou (Maine) Police Chief Michael Gahagan to be concerned that terrorists could be in some of those cars.

"It worries us every day," Gahagan says.

It worries local police, Border Patrol officers and members of Congress alike.

Many say the USA's northern border — more than 4,000 miles of open and largely unprotected land — remains a dangerously weak link in the nation's post-9/11 effort to shore up security against terrorist attacks.

To cross it legally, people can pull up at any of 89 official points of entry from Seattle to eastern Maine. Some are huge, multilane crossings that process tourists and commercial trucks; others are small crossings, open only certain hours of the day, that generally handle only cars.

But it's still easy to cross illegally, across hundreds of small back roads, through the woods or over the mountains.

"It's a big, porous border and it's very difficult to secure," says Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., who made headlines in 2001 when he held up an orange traffic cone in the Senate as an example of the kinds of barriers often used to block roads on the Canadian border.

Five years later, Dorgan says, northern border security has improved — but not nearly enough. "There should be no less anxiety about it," he says. "Terrorists will search for the weakest link when trying to enter this country."

The flood of illegal immigrants across the U.S. border with Mexico has focused the government's attention south for years.

Roughly nine out of 10 of the nation's 12,000 Border Patrol agents work along the Mexican border, in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California. The Homeland Security Department's new multibillion-dollar plan to tighten security with more cameras, sensors and fences is being set up along the southern border, starting in Arizona.

The northern border "really is the forgotten border," says T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, the union that represents Homeland Security's Border Patrol agents. "We're just so vulnerable up there."

Critics of the government's southern-border focus, such as Dorgan, acknowledge the need to concentrate on the area where hundreds of thousands of people illegally enter the country each year to look for work and sell drugs.

Intelligence officials long have said the northern border is no less of a security concern when it comes to the potential for terrorists to sneak in to the United States.

Homeland Security Department chief intelligence officer Charles Allen won't talk about classified intelligence reports, but he says not a day goes by when he doesn't worry about the northern border.

The arrests in Canada last June of 17 alleged terrorists with 3 tons of ammonium nitrate, the same kind of fertilizer used to make the deadly Oklahoma City bomb in 1995, intensified those concerns in Allen's department and at police stations along the border.

Local police such as Gahagan say that although security at official points of entry — including at big, busy crossings such as Detroit and Buffalo — has tightened considerably, there are still hundreds of easily accessible routes into the USA.

And just as technology has helped the Border Patrol zero in on suspects, it also has helped those trying to sneak people or drugs into the country, Gahagan says.

Smugglers, who are paid up to $10,000 per person to get people across the border, drop illegal immigrants in the woods with a Global Positioning System device so the person picking them up can easily find them, Gahagan says.

And in his remote area, Gahagan says he has no way of knowing how many people make it across — or, disturbingly, why they're trying to get through.

"It's very rugged country and extremely difficult" to protect, says Rep. Norm Dicks, D-Wash. "We need more agents. And we're gonna have to use more technology."

Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar says more resources are on the way, including new helicopters and more agents. He disputes the notion that the Canadian border has been "forgotten" by the Homeland Security Department. "The northern border is at the forefront of our concerns about security and enforcement," he says.

But agent Darryl Schermerhorn, who works in northwest Washington state, says the equipment the Border Patrol relies on now is nearly useless in some cases. Cameras along the border are poorly placed and often fog up or shake, the ground sensors fail, and the old four-wheel-drives and ATVs break down. He added that there are too few agents to read camera images and to patrol remote areas.

If a camera does pick up someone crossing a remote road, by the time an agent can get there to check it out, the person is long gone — into the United States.

"It happens all the time," Schermerhorn says. He says the agents on the northern border are no better off in terms of protecting the country than they were on 9/11.

"If someone has a vested interest in getting in here," he says, "they'd probably be better off coming across the northern border."

TAX:

Some Americans Abroad Turn In Passports (NYT)

By Doreen Carvajal

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

PARIS, Dec. 17 — She is a former marine, a native Californian and, now, an ex-American who prefers to remain discreet about abandoning her citizenship. After 10 years of warily considering options, she turned in her United States passport last month without ceremony, becoming an alien in the view of her homeland.

"It's a really hard thing to do," said the woman, a 16-year resident of Geneva who had tired of the cost and time of filing yearly United States tax returns on top of her Swiss taxes. "I just kept putting this off. But it's my kids and the estate tax. I don't care if I die with only one Swiss franc to my name, but the U.S. shouldn't get money I earned here when I die."

Historically, small numbers of Americans have turned in their passports every year for political and economic reasons, with the numbers reaching a high of about 2,000 during the Vietnam War in the early 1970s.

But after Congress sharply raised taxes this year for many Americans living abroad, some international tax lawyers say they detect rising demand from citizens to renounce ties with the United States, the only developed country that taxes it citizens while they live overseas. Americans abroad are also taxed in the countries where they live.

"The administrative costs of being an American and living outside the U.S. have gone up dramatically," said Marnin Michaels, a tax lawyer with Baker & McKenzie in Zurich.

So far this year, the Internal Revenue Service has tallied 509 Americans who have given up their citizenship, said Anthony Burke, an I.R.S. spokesman in Washington. He said complete figures were still being calculated.

Applications to renounce citizenship are on the rise at the American Embassy in Paris, according to an official who spoke on condition of anonymity. At the embassy in London, the number of applications was reported to be fairly stable over the past two years, though it would be hard to spot a recent surge because applications are taking longer to process there than in past years. Neither embassy would disclose exact figures. A spokeswoman for the American Embassy in London, Karen Maxfield, said Americans living abroad usually took the step "because they do not have strong ties to the United States and do not believe that they will ever live there in the future."

"All have two citizenships and generally say they would like to simplify their lives by giving up a citizenship they are not using," she said.

Andy Sundberg, a director of the Geneva-based American Citizens Abroad, has been tracking renunciations dating back to the 1960s through annual Treasury Department figures. He considers the numbers low compared with some stretches in the past, like the early 1970s. But he has also noticed a recent increase in interest among Americans in renouncing their citizenship.

"I think the cup is boiling over for a number of people living abroad," Mr. Sundberg said. "With the Internet and the speed and the ubiquity of information, people are more aware of what's happening." With the changes in the tax laws, he said, some Americans living abroad fear "they're heading toward a real storm."

He cited a survey by the American Chamber of Commerce in Singapore, which polled its members in October and November and found that many were considering returning to the United States because of the higher taxes.

Concern about taxes among Americans living abroad has surged since President Bush signed into law a bill that sharply raises tax rates for those with incomes of more than $82,400 a year. The legislation also increases taxes on employer-provided benefits like housing allowances.

The changes, enacted in May, apply retroactively to Jan. 1, 2006.

Matthew Ledvina, an international tax lawyer in Geneva, said demand for legal counsel on the citizenship issue was coming largely from American citizens who held second passports and who had minimal ties to the United States.

"There are incentives to do it before the end of the year so that you can minimize your future reporting," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0107098

Mr. Ledvina said the waiting period for appointments at the American Embassy in London had increased from a few days to more than three and a half months. He said he had recently approached embassies in Vienna, Bern, London, Paris and Brussels before finally getting an appointment in Amsterdam for a client's renunciation application.

The legal ritual of renunciation is largely unique to the United States because other countries base taxation on residency, not citizenship, according to Ingmar Dörr, a tax lawyer with Lovells in Munich.

"We don't have that issue," he said. "We only have the problem that rich people who don't want to pay taxes in Germany just move to a lower-tax country in Switzerland."

For some Americans abroad, motivations for renunciation are mixed and complex, involving social concerns, political displeasure with their government and other reasons. But it is clear that taxation plays a large role for many, even though few are willing to admit that because of penalties enacted a decade ago.

In 1996, Congress tried to address a wave of tax-driven expatriation by the wealthy by requiring former citizens to file tax returns for a decade and forbidding Americans who renounced their passports for tax reasons from visiting the United States.

But in practice, the government is mainly interested in wealthier ex-citizens with a net worth of more than $2 million — few of whom pay further United States taxes because they generally avoid making American financial investments after giving up citizenship, Mr. Ledvina said. As for the rule barring entry to tax refugees, he said, it has not been enforced by the authorities.

Still, that possibility prompts ex-citizens to tread carefully and remain discreet about their choices.

"I didn't give up my citizenship with a sense of hostility," said an importer in Geneva who renounced her citizenship as President Bush was taking office in 2001. "I gave it up with a sense of fairness."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Judicial Nominee's Chance May Be Coming To End (JH)

By Alicia Wittmeyer

Jackson Hole Star-Tribune, December 18, 2006

BOISE, Idaho -- If President George W. Bush renominates a controversial Republican Idaho lawyer for a seat on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, he's going to have a tough fight ahead of him, Senate leaders say.

The nomination of Boise lawyer William Gerry Myers III, which has been stalled in the Senate for three years, may have almost reached an end. Now that Democrats have control of Congress, a consensus has formed on Capitol Hill that Myers -- who has stirred up some of the fiercest Democratic opposition of all Bush's judicial nominees -- has almost no chance of getting through.

"I think he's definitely a well-qualified nominee, but whether he can make it through a Democratic Congress is a different story," said Dan Whiting, spokesman for Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, who first submitted Myers to Bush as a potential nominee.

That's especially true now that some have suggested Myers may have misled senators about meeting lobbyist Jack Abramoff during questioning by the Senate Judiciary Committee, lawmakers say.

"The reality is this president's nominee hasn't been able to win support for the past two years from a Congress controlled by his own political party," said Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., incoming chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Leahy said in a speech last week that Bush "squandered an opportunity to fill Idaho's vacancy" on the 9th Circuit by renominating Myers on Nov. 15, in a last-ditch effort to push his nominees through before Congress changed hands.

Myers, the former top lawyer at the Interior Department, was first nominated to the seat in May 2003 to fill a vacancy left by retiring Idaho Judge Tom Nelson.

He's one of two Bush nominees from Idaho -- along with Idaho 6th District Judge Norman Randy Smith -- up for judgeships on the 9th Circuit, which hears appeals from courts in nine Western states, as well as the territories of Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands. Republicans have supported Smith and Myers, saying they would bring ideological balance to one of the most liberal courts in the nation.

When Myers was nominated, liberal groups immediately attacked his record of opposing environmental protections when he worked as a lobbyist for cattle and mining interests. American Indian groups have also spoken out against him, in particular for an Interior Department decision that cleared the way for a gold mine in California that they say threatens tribal lands.

"I think the Senate ought to only confirm individuals who merit the highest respect in the country," said Nan Aron, President of the liberal judicial watchdog group Alliance for Justice, which has been a major voice against Myer's nomination. "And certainly William Myer's record proves that he's unqualified for a lifetime seat on the 9th Circuit."

A report in The Denver Post raised more questions for the embattled nominee earlier this month. The story, based on information obtained through a public records search, showed Myers was among two dozen people who attended a dinner party with Jack Abramoff in September 2001.

But in a March 2005 letter to Leahy, Myers wrote that after "searching his memory and files" he couldn't remember having any contact with Abramoff.

Abramoff, a once-powerful lobbyist, pleaded guilty in an influence-peddling scandal and is cooperating with a wide-ranging Justice Department probe of alleged corruption on Capitol Hill and in the executive branch.

If Bush renominates Myers, the nominee will have many questions to answer about his ethics record, Leahy said in the Dec. 8 speech.

Leahy suggested this month that Bush nominate Smith for the judge seat that would be filled by Myers. California Democrats have opposed Smith's nomination, because he would replace a California judge, but have had less to say about his record than Myers'.

But Republican lawmakers say they're skeptical of the chances for even the less controversial potential judges.

"I think it's going to be tough to get any of President's Bush's nominees through a Democratic Congress," Whiting said. "We'll see what Chairman Leahy has in store."

Green Laws No Slam-dunk In New Congress (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Steps to curb global warming. Tougher fuel economy standards for automobiles. Repeal of massive tax breaks for the oil industry.

Environmentalists are busy these days crafting their holiday wish-list, giddy about the prospects for success in the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

But industry groups are gearing up to fight, and their forces may include more than the usual Republican allies.

"We're confident that there are plenty of Democrats who know and understand us," said Charles Drevna of the National Petrochemical & Refiners Assn.

Drevna's confidence is probably well-placed. The politics surrounding environmental issues have proved hard to predict, largely because the potential economic impact of stronger regulation tends to scramble partisan loyalties. Democrats from auto-making states, for example, have fought efforts to mandate stricter miles-per-gallon rules for vehicles.

These crosscurrents could cause the push for an aggressive environmental agenda to become an object lesson on the limits of what can actually be achieved in the Congress that will convene in January.

New chief for key panel

Key to the enthusiasm among environmentalists is the impending change at the helm of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who has called global warming "the greatest challenge of our generation," will replace Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), who has dismissed man-made climate change as a "hoax."

DOJ_NMG_0107100

Perhaps no other transfer of committee chairs is as dramatic. Boxer drives a hybrid Toyota Prius. Inhofe drives a Jeep.

Boxer says that California's new global warming law — whose goal is to reduce emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases by 25% by 2020 — should be a model for the nation. Inhofe derides it as a "job killer."

Boxer received a perfect score from the League of Conservation Voters for her Senate votes this year. Inhofe received a 0.

Environmentalists say that after years of fighting GOP attempts to roll back environmental laws, they now can go on the offensive.

"It's as if the winds have shifted and proponents of environmental controls finally have the winds at our backs," said Frank O'Donnell of Clean Air Watch.

The precarious nature of this shift was driven home last week when Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) underwent brain surgery.

Should Johnson die or resign and be replaced by a Republican, the GOP would regain control of the closely divided Senate, denying Boxer and other Democrats committee chairmanships. With Johnson's condition improving, however, plans for the Democratic takeover are proceeding.

Difficult goals

Boxer has set an ambitious agenda that includes advancing legislation on global warming and reinstituting a tax on the oil and chemical industries to pay for clean up of contaminated sites. She also has pledged tough oversight of the Environmental Protection Agency.

But she faces a daunting task in trying to move her bills through Congress — and past President Bush's veto pen.

For anything controversial, such as mandatory caps on emissions linked to global warming, she probably would face Senate filibusters — perhaps joined by some of her fellow Democrats.

Nor will assent from the House be an easy matter.

Asked to assess Boxer's prospects for enacting a law to cap emissions, Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) said: "She hasn't called John Dingell."

Dingell, a Michigan Democrat who will chair the House Energy and Commerce Committee, has been a champion of automakers, who have opposed California's effort to reduce tailpipe emissions linked to global warming. He also has helped thwart congressional efforts to toughen miles-per-gallon rules for vehicles.

Although noncommittal about specific legislation, Dingell made clear that his approach differs from Boxer's.

"Democrats want a sound environment," he said. "But remember, this is a big country, and different parts of the country are affected differently" by environmental laws.

He did say, however, "I cannot support destituting the United States to address the problem of global warming. If we're going to pitch in … then everybody is going to have to do so."

Boxer plans to hold hearings on climate change, including calling California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to Washington to testify about the state's cutting-edge laws on the issue.

Boxer pledges to take global warming legislation "as far as we possibly can take it" with the makeup of the new Congress.

And even if her efforts fall short, environmentalists say she and like-minded lawmakers could play a crucial role in laying the groundwork for future federal action.

House maneuvering

As industry lobbyists prepare to battle Boxer, they also are looking for help from Democrats to block an effort planned by House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) to repeal tax breaks for oil and natural gas industries.

"We do have a lot of Democrats who understand the importance of domestic oil production," said Jeff Eshelman of the Independent Petroleum Assn. of America, a trade group for independent oil and gas producers.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), incoming chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, has taken a cautious posture on repealing the tax breaks.

"Many of those tax breaks were put in place to encourage production here in this country," he said in a recent interview on CNBC. "It's very much in our interests that we maximize production here and not depend more and more on foreign oil."

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.), who represents an energy-producing state and sometimes votes with Republicans on energy issues, also looms as a potential obstacle to Pelosi's efforts.

"Programs such as those that encourage deep water [energy] exploration or help keep our small, independent energy producers in business are among the keys to American energy independence," she said in a statement.

No easy job

Evidence of the daunting task facing environmentalists — even when dealing with a Democratic Congress — was provided during debate on a wide-ranging energy bill in 2005. A proposal to significantly increase fuel-economy requirements for automobiles drew 28 votes in the 100-member Senate.

"On several occasions over the past six years, members of Congress have rejected, by an overwhelming bipartisan majority, legislative attempts to increase fuel economy standards," said Charles Territo, director of communications for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, a trade association.

Environmentalists acknowledge the obstacles they face.

"It took a long time to bring about some of our core environmental protections that have been in place for decades," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, legislative director for the League of Conservation Voters. "This is not going to happen overnight, and we recognize that."

Just Do It (NYT)

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

The Democrats promised sweeping ethics reform in this year's campaign, and now they have control of Congress. But procrastination is a legendary Capitol vice, and there are worrisome signs that the Democrats may already be indulging.

The most glaring lapse of the Republican-controlled Congress was the abject failure of the House ethics committee to police misbehavior, highlighted by the panel's studied avoidance of the Jack Abramoff lobbying mess. Members were shielded and allegations muffled.

The need for an independent body staffed by nonpartisan professionals to investigate complaints would seem beyond debate. Good ideas for that were circulating this year, notably a proposal for the creation of an office of public integrity by Representatives Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, and Martin Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts.

Rather than committing wholeheartedly to the need for an independent panel, the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi, is opting to create a bipartisan task force to study the issue and report back by mid-March. If the motive is a careful sales pitch to secure the idea on both sides of the aisle, voters may tolerate a two-month study approach. But the task force should not be an excuse for more delay or to dumb down a much-needed anticorruption monitor. The fact that the Republican leader, John Boehner of Ohio, has signed on to the study is hardly encouraging, since he was a principal in the failure of the last Congress to pass effective ethics controls.

We are more encouraged by early papers prepared by Ms. Pelosi's office that outline other needed reforms, beginning with the banning of gifts, meals and travel money from lobbyists. Putting the brakes on lawmakers' borrowing corporate jets for regal-class travel is another promising step reported to be on the Democrats' agenda, as are requirements to disclose and limit the earmarking of pork spending for favored pleaders.

But Ms. Pelosi hasn't shared these ideas with the public yet, and each detail can attract a thousand devils in the muddlers' art of Washington deal-making. Ms. Pelosi and Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, have a great opportunity to lead the way with clear proposals, offered up front before the usual Congressional scrum blurs the issue.

The two new leaders should keep foremost in mind the voters' anticipation of a cleaner, more quickly responsive Congress.

Unions Hope Democrats Will Counter GOP Policy Changes (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

As a member of the Democratic minority, Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.) fought a Bush administration policy that increasingly opened up federal jobs to private contracting.

Although he and colleagues had some success, Van Hollen said that when the 110th Congress takes over next month and the Democrats are in the majority, he will have greater ability to combat the administration's policies on federal employees. "It's had a demoralizing effect on the federal workforce," he said. "I do think now we're in a better position to fix things."

For the past six years, unions that represent most federal employees have argued that the Bush administration has been hostile to the needs of workers -- keeping pay raises low, trying to prevent employees from organizing in the departments of Defense and Homeland Security, and outsourcing government jobs to the private sector.

Now, the change in control of Congress gives unions much more powerful allies in the legislative branch. Democratic lawmakers pledge to work on issues of central concern to the unions, but the administration outlines other priorities for the workforce and disputes any notion it has not pursued a course beneficial to workers.

The election of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) as majority leader is seen as a boon for federal workers. Hoyer, who will be the House's second most powerful figure, represents Southern Maryland's 5th Congressional District, home to thousands of government employees.

Hoyer said he will work to create a "more cooperative relationship with the White House" to ensure pay raises and to contain rising health premiums. While he praised several Republican colleagues, such as Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), outgoing chairman of the Government Reform Committee, Hoyer said: "Republicans made it much harder to ensure federal employees received fair and competitive annual pay adjustments. . . . They also did virtually nothing to help resist the White House effort to outsource federal jobs to private contractors."

John Gage, national president of the American Federation of Government Employees, said that as soon as the Bush administration came to power in 2001, it wiped out "our partnerships with agencies, and since that time our ability to sit down with the agencies and work out problems and differences has really declined." AFGE is the largest union of government employees, representing 700,000 federal and D.C. government workers.

With the new Congress, Gage said, "we're hoping not only we'll have more access to committees and Congress, but that word will get down to the political appointees in the departments."

Labor unions were a major source of support to Democrats in the midterm elections. The AFL-CIO spent roughly $40 million on a get-out-the-vote operation, and union members contributed substantial sums to Democratic candidates. Hoyer was not in a competitive race but received more than $300,000 in money from labor-affiliated political action committees.

Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, called labor's criticisms of the administration "rhetoric."

"The idea that management would be hostile to employees is just foreign to me," Johnson said. "Everybody's focused on what we can do that's smart and professional and effective, to make sure we have the best and most effective workforce possible."

Johnson said the administration's goal in its final two years is to strengthen a management system that rewards employees who perform exceptionally. "I believe that employees want to be respected. They want to be challenged. They want to be held accountable. They want to grow professionally," he said.

According to the unions, federal workers have more pressing needs.

"We expect the Democratic Congress to support the federal employees with regard to wages, health insurance and retirement," said Beth Moten, AFGE's legislative and political director. "We expect them to support federal bargaining rights, and we expect them to work for reforms so that federal workers don't lose their jobs because of procedures or political influence,"

No issue has been more divisive than "contracting out," the phrase critics use to describe the outsourcing of government jobs to private contractors. Unions have fought efforts to transfer jobs at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, the Internal Revenue Service and elsewhere. Colleen M. Kelley, national president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said one worrisome trend is the IRS's interest in using private debt-collection agencies. "There are going to be problems with taxpayer privacy," she said.

In 2003, the administration revised Circular A-76, which lays out the rules for job competitions, to direct agencies to evaluate whether more jobs could be privatized. The effort has faced stiff resistance on Capitol Hill. Democrats have argued that agencies are under pressure to privatize jobs that should be confined to government workers.

"I am not opposed to privatization, but if it occurs with federal jobs, then it must be legal and fair," said Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), incoming chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on commerce, justice and science, which will have authority over many of these issues. She also has many government employees as constituents.

The debate over privatization, among other disputes, is occurring against a backdrop of profound demographic change in the civil service. In the next 10 years, as much as 60 percent of the government's 1.8 million workers will become eligible to retire. "The long-term challenge for the federal government is to continue to attract the best and the brightest people. We've got to make sure we can replenish the federal workforce," Van Hollen said.

Appropriate Appropriations (NYT)

The incoming Democratic chairmen of Congress's appropriations committees announced last week that a big chunk of the federal government will operate next year under 2006 budgets. That will allow the new Congress to focus on programs where needs are great — and rising — like veterans' health care and low-income housing. It will also free up time to pursue a fresh legislative agenda.

Under normal circumstances, operating under old budgets would be a dereliction of lawmakers' duty to weigh needs and resources, and spend tax dollars accordingly. But the current situation is hardly normal. The departing Republican-led Congress was supposed to nail down the government's spending plans for 2007 before it adjourned, but it neglected to do so, passing only 2 of the 11 required appropriations bills.

The delay was initially due to infighting among Republicans, sparked by President Bush, who gunned for a spending limit that was so low that many Republicans were unwilling to support it openly. The delay dragged on as Republican leaders refused to hold difficult votes before the midterm elections. Then, during the lame duck session, they did not even try to complete the spending bills — a crass attempt to force the new Democratic majority to expend time and energy cleaning up the mess.

By choosing to operate much of next year's government at the 2006 level, the Democrats avoid that trap. But solving the political problem creates some practical ones. President Bush, for example, will have to step up during the year to ask for more money as needed.

But Mr. Bush is to blame for this problem in the first place. Next year he will have the chance to make amends, if only he will take it.

So Long, Farewell, Auf Wiedersehen, Rumsfeld (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has been on the "farewell" circuit of late, going to see the troops in Iraq, saying goodbye to various folks at the Pentagon and around town.

DOJ_NMG_0107104

On Friday we had the fine Pentagon parade featuring the Army fife and bugle something. (Marching with the Army you've got, not the Army you want.) Earlier this month, he did interviews with two news folks -- Laura Ingraham and, for balance, Cal Thomas.

Rumsfeld told Thomas he hadn't given much thought about what he'd do after today's departure. Thomas invited him over to his home theater -- complete with surround sound -- to watch a movie.

"I have not been in six years to the movies," Rumsfeld said.

"It'll be fun," Thomas said in the broadcast interview. "I got one for you that'd you'd really love. . . . It's called 'Akeelah and the Bee.' Starbucks is involved in it. It's about a little African American girl, 11 years old, growing up in Crenshaw in L.A. Her father's been killed by some hoodie. Her brother's about to become a hoodie. And they discover that she has this great gift of spelling. Laurence Fishburne is in it, Angela Bassett. She goes out and redeems everybody. I mean, this is about every value we care about. Hard work, overcoming, honesty, integrity. I'm sitting there, I'm bawling away. I'm cheering for the kid."

"It's A-K-E-E-L-A-H -- maybe," Thomas said, " 'and the Bee' as in 'spelling bee.' I guarantee you I'll give you your money back if you don't love this movie. You will absolutely love this. It's got everything. There's not a white guy -- the only white guy in it is the principal of the school. Everybody else is minority, everybody else gets along."

"Did you like 'The Sound of Music'?" Rumsfeld asked.

"Of course I liked 'The Sound of Music,' " Thomas said.

"Well, so did I," Rumsfeld said. "People laugh at that."

"Well, I want to [tell] you something," Thomas said. "I stalked Julie Andrews for 40 years before I finally got her."

"Is that right?"

"On our shelf, a picture of us having tea together in New York," Thomas said.

"How long ago?" the defense secretary asked.

"Two years. But I . . ."

"She's showing her years," Rumsfeld observed.

"Yeah, well -- no, she looks great," Thomas said.

Rumsfeld laughed.

"I waited for her outside the Majestic Theater in 1962 in the rain," Thomas continued. "That's when it started."

Rumsfeld laughed.

"And that's how I opened the letter to her, you know," Thomas said, according to the transcript. "So anyway, you got more important things to do." Well, maybe not.

"Good to see you," Rumsfeld said.

"Good to see you," Thomas said, "and let's stay in touch."

Maybe lunch sometime?The Replacements

The rumor mill is working overtime at the Agency for International Development, where morale is said to be a bit low these days. Word is that the administrator, former Eli Lilly and AT&T top executive Randall Tobias, is leaving early next year after his big reorganization plan, putting the office of reconstruction and stabilization into AID and rearranging a bunch of other offices, is finalized.

There were even candidates being mentioned as likely prospects to replace Tobias -- John Herbst, who runs the reconstruction office, and James Kunder, assistant AID administrator.

Tobias was said to be going back to Indiana to run for governor or senator or something. But the governor, Mitch Daniels, is a Republican and is apparently running again in 2008. Sen. Richard Lugar (R) was just re-elected and Sen. Evan Bayh (D) isn't up until 2010.

Asked Friday whether Tobias was on his way out, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "He's got no plans to leave in the near future."After State, State School

While we're at it, the rumors at Foggy Bottom were that counselor Philip Ze likow, who had been advising his close friend of many years, Condoleezza Rice, on Iraq and other matters, was eased out last month because he wasn't on the same page with the administration.

Some insiders felt there were suspicious leaks of his internal memos -- taking issue with administration policy on Iraq and the Middle East -- in books and articles, culminating with one at the end of November in the New York Times that was headlined: "Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want to Hear." That one was called the last straw.

Rice, cornered by The Washington Post's Peter Baker after her visit last week to The Post, said she didn't give him the boot. "Nooooo," she said. "Philip and I had an understanding that it would be about two years. So he had to go back or he'd lose his chair" at the University of Virginia.

Must be a really tough crowd down there in Charlottesville.

Justice? (WP)

NINE YEARS, four months and 18 days: That's the amount of time that Lawrence Banks spent in a Maryland prison for murdering two people, one of whom was his 17-year-old son. The appalling details of this case -- which have come to light only because Mr. Banks is now a figure in a new double-murder investigation -- raise troubling questions about Maryland's justice system. So far, there haven't been any answers -- only the spectacle of public officials trying to shift the blame.

The facts, as reported by The Post's Ruben Castaneda and Eric Rich, are chilling. A 22-year-old woman and her 9-month-old baby were shot to death in Laurel last week. The woman had recently sought a protective order against Mr. Banks, a man with a history of violence -- including tossing his infant daughter through a glass window in 1976 and the separate murders of his son and another man on the same day in 1991. For those two murders, Mr. Banks was able to get a remarkable deal from prosecutors in Baltimore City and Anne Arundel County. Instead of the 30-year maximum set out by Maryland sentencing guidelines for each second-degree murder, he got 20 years for each, served concurrently.

The Baltimore prosecutor said she wanted to avoid putting Mr. Banks's teenage daughter, who had been subjected to abuse, through the ordeal of testifying. Anne Arundel prosecutors said they had no evidence or motive. Each looked to the other to see that a dangerous murderer was put away. Why didn't Anne Arundel push for Mr. Banks to serve his sentence consecutively with the Baltimore sentence, rather than concurrently? Was Baltimore consulted about the bargain brokered in Anne Arundel? Should the sentencing judges have rejected the plea agreements? It is noteworthy that the Baltimore judge who sentenced Mr. Banks for his son's murder denied his 1993 appeal for a reduction saying the "sentence was too low to begin with."

There are always extenuating circumstances in the prosecution of criminal cases. But this was a botched case, and it raises new questions in Maryland's long-running debate over truth in sentencing. Mr. Banks served less than half of his sentence, and his release came about not as a result of being judged eligible for or worthy of parole but because of diminution credits granted for good behavior. It makes sense to reward inmates who have model records or earn educational credits, but because the lenient treatment afforded Mr. Banks is not unusual, it is time for a thorough examination of the system. We hope that need is noted by Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) and the incoming members of the General Assembly.

Flag-Burning Foe Says Law Not Needed (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens has twice voted to outlaw burning the U.S. flag, in memorable dissents that emphasized the flag's great symbolic value.

Now, however, the 86-year-old justice says there is no need to amend the Constitution to protect Old Glory.

In 5-to-4 decisions in 1989 and 1990, the Supreme Court held that burning the flag is protected by the First Amendment.

DOJ_NMG_0107106

"Ironically, those decisions seem to have solved the problem because no one burns flags anymore," Stevens said in a speech to the Chicago Bar Association in September, recently aired on C-SPAN.

Congress has continued to try to amend the Constitution to permit legislation that would prohibit desecration of the flag. The Senate fell one vote short of the required two-thirds majority in June.

In 1989, Stevens, a World War II veteran, evoked images of the D-Day assault on Omaha Beach in writing that if liberty and equality are worth fighting for, "it cannot be true that the flag that uniquely symbolizes their power is not itself worthy of protection from unnecessary desecration."

He allowed then for the possibility that the court's majority might have gotten it right. "Conceivably, that value will be enhanced by the Court's conclusion that our national commitment to free expression is so strong that even the United States, as ultimate guarantor of that freedom, is without power to prohibit the desecration of its unique symbol. But I am unpersuaded."

Stevens said in Chicago that he remains convinced that he interpreted the Constitution correctly and continues to be proud of his dissents in the flag desecration cases.

Yet he paid homage to the five justices -- William J. Brennan Jr., Thurgood Marshall, Harry A. Blackmun, Antonin Scalia and Anthony M. Kennedy -- who carried the day in both cases.

"If one were to burn a flag today, the act would convey a message of freedom that ours is a society that is strong enough to tolerate such acts by those whom we despise," Stevens said. "Today, one could not burn a flag without reminding every observer that we cherish our freedom."

Internet Critical Tool For Political Cash (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Retired naval officer Joe Sestak out-raised incumbent Republican Curt Weldon to seize a House seat in suburban Philadelphia — aided by nearly $900,000 in Internet contributions. "Netroots" activists helped propel Virginia's incoming Democratic Sen. Jim Webb in the early days of his race. And in 18 hours, the Internet-based political action committee MoveOn.org Political Action raised $500,000 online to buy airtime for advertising that targeted Republicans in four congressional races.

This year's midterm elections offered fresh examples of the ways the Internet is changing how candidates in both parties raise money as they scramble to collect the $20, $30 and $50 donations needed in the aftermath of changes to campaign-finance laws in 2002 that banned large donations. Online fundraising has proved a cost-effective and lightning-fast method to raise cash, rally the faithful and promote or smear office seekers.

It also could transform fundraising in presidential races. "It's inevitable that the Internet will become the principal means of fundraising from now on," said Anthony Corrado, a campaign-finance expert at Colby College in Waterville, Maine. "It's the only way you get a million people to each give you $10 on the same day."

ActBlue, an online clearinghouse that has raised more than $17 million since 2004, plans to use that power. It recently won approval from federal regulators to stockpile cash for yet-undeclared presidential candidates.

While Democrats have scored many of the high-profile campaign successes on the Web, Republicans say they are not far behind in capitalizing on the Internet's potential.

ABCPAC.com, a GOP website launched in September, has raised $300,000 for candidates, said its chairman, Frank Donatelli, a public-affairs consultant and longtime Republican activist. Following ActBlue's lead, the PAC also will raise money to draft presidential contenders.

It's hard to quantify Internet contributions in campaigns because candidates and political parties are not required to disclose which donations came via the Web, but online activity played a role in several closely watched races this year.

In Pennsylvania, online cash to Sestak helped catapult the political newcomer ahead of the 10-term congressman in the money race. Campaign-finance reports show Sestak raised nearly $3.2 million to Weldon's $2.7 million through Nov.

27. Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral, said he had no clue of the role the Web would play in the race when he announced his candidacy Feb. 2.

He caught on. Sestak called for U.S. troop withdrawals from Iraq by the end of 2007 — a message that resonated with netroots activists opposed to the war. In June, he spoke to liberal bloggers at the first YearlyKos convention. (Attention to the race also spiked with news of an FBI probe into whether Weldon used his influence to help his lobbyist daughter. Weldon has denied wrongdoing.)

The Web became "an absolutely critical source" of money, Sestak said. In four days, a single e-mail solicitation raised $88,000.

Candidates such as Jesse Ventura, the former pro wrestler who became Minnesota governor in 1999, and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who sought the presidency in 2000, were among those with strong Web appeal years before former Vermont governor Howard Dean outpaced better-known rivals through online fundraising before the 2004 Democratic presidential primaries.

"Television benefited candidates who were telegenic and, most importantly, people who had money because TV is so expensive," said Carol Darr, director of the Institute for Politics, Democracy & the Internet at George Washington University. "The Internet tends to benefit the mavericks who have a compelling message."

Web-based activists such as Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org, relish their new role. In the 2005-06 election cycle, MoveOn.org Political Action, the group's PAC, raised $28 million, he said. That's almost on par with the $30 million the group collected during the high-profile presidential campaign two years ago, Pariser said.

"The presidential race that's coming up is one where online fundraising has the power to completely level the playing field," he said.

Benjamin Rahn, the 29-year-old president of ActBlue, said the Web opens up politics. "Anyone can get up and running and have a website for free. People don't need to go through the traditional party structures."

That said, online watchers say Internet givers have more in common with large donors than they do the general population. "They don't have as much money as big donors, but they are still middle-aged, upper income and highly educated," Darr said.

Just because the midterms are over, that doesn't mean the race for cash via the Internet is done. Recently, the National Republican Congressional Committee issued an e-mail plea to supporters to help retire $2 million in debt. Donors who sent in $100 or more were promised a 2007 daily planner.

Outgoing committee spokesman Ed Patru declined to say how much the appeal has raised. Contribution amounts garnered from the Internet are "not something we discuss," he said. "It's something that gets into the strategy side of things."

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Sends Home 33 Detainees From Guantanamo Bay (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Thirty-three detainees who had been held at the U.S. military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, were returned to their home countries over the past week, part of a government effort to reduce the facility's population to a core group of terrorism suspects who could be held indefinitely.

The Defense Department announced yesterday that it transferred 17 detainees to their home countries over the weekend: seven to Afghanistan, five to Yemen, three to Kazakhstan, one to Libya and one to Bangladesh. Military officials announced Thursday that 16 detainees were sent to Saudi Arabia last week.

With the transfer of the 33 detainees -- nearly 8 percent of the facility's population -- Guantanamo now holds about 395 detainees, almost none of whom have been charged with a crime. State Department officials have been working to reducesignificantly reduce the number of Guantanamo detainees through lengthy negotiations with other countries, although the United States is unwilling to release detainees into the custody of nations where they would likely be abused, tortured or killed.

A large percentage of the remaining population is from Saudi Arabia and Yemen.

According to Pentagon figures, approximately 380 detainees have departed Guantanamo for at least 29 countries since 2002, meaning the facility's current population represents slightly more than half of the suspects captured and transferred to U.S. custody in Cuba. An additional 85 detainees are slated for transfer or release to their home nations pending the outcome of diplomatic discussions. Their departure would leave the number of detainees at Guantanamo at about 310.

"Departure of these remaining detainees approved for transfer or release is subject to ongoing discussions between the United States and other nations," according to a Defense Department news release yesterday. "The United States does not desire to hold detainees for any longer than necessary."

Guantanamo did not accept new detainees from September 2004 to this past September, when 14 high-value suspects who had been in secret CIA custody were moved to Cuba.

Fenced In At Guantanamo, Even "Easy" Cases Have Lingered (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

After an hours-long firefight in an Afghan village called Ab Khail, an enemy fighter hurled a grenade at Sgt. First Class Christopher Speer, causing fatal injuries. For more than a year, Maj. Jeffrey Groharing, a Marine Corps prosecutor, has been trying to bring the alleged killer to justice.

Winning a conviction should have been easy. The suspect, Omar Ahmed Khadr, a Toronto-born teenager whose relatives have ties to al Qaeda, was captured after the July 2002 skirmish and taken to Guantánamo Bay. Under an order President Bush issued in November 2001, Mr. Khadr could claim few of the rights afforded defendants in civilian courts or courts-martial.

But for Maj. Groharing, the case of U.S. v. Omar Khadr, slated for an American military commission at Guantánamo, has been a headache. Intelligence agencies refused to share their files with the prosecutor, fearing their methods or sources might be disclosed. Soldiers who witnessed the incident are scattered across the globe. Defense attorneys hurled a series of legal challenges that paralyzed proceedings. And the crime scene -- a remote village still contested by Taliban fighters -- was all but obliterated by American bombs, making it nearly impossible to conduct an independent investigation.

Such challenges help explain why the Bush administration failed to complete a single Guantánamo trial in the five years before the Supreme Court struck the system down in June. The decision threw into limbo the prosecution of Mr. Khadr and nine other Guantánamo prisoners who were charged prior to the high court ruling. Congress has since passed the Military Commissions Act, which grants defendants some of the rights President Bush previously had sought to deny. But even when the deck was stacked in the government's favor, prosecutors struggled to convict fighters captured overseas amid a continuing conflict.

"At the end of the day, the question is: Can you actually try a case under these conditions?" says Prof. Robert Chesney, a specialist in national-security law at Wake Forest University.

Maj. Groharing acknowledges that the Guantánamo cases have had "some fits and starts," and presented challenges that few other prosecutors face. He says the effort is nonetheless worthwhile.

"What's the alternative? To not hold him accountable? We are certainly not going to give him a pass for killing a U.S. service member and plotting to kill many more," the prosecutor says. "The difference between us and al Qaeda is that when we had him on the battlefield, we didn't summarily execute him," he says.

The U.S. has employed forms of military commissions in past conflicts, most recently World War II, when hundreds of Axis officials and soldiers were tried for offenses such as crimes against humanity and mistreatment of American prisoners of war. But those trials took place after fighting had ended and before the introduction of stricter courtroom and evidentiary standards, as laid out by the Geneva Conventions, the U.S. Uniform Code of Military Justice and other laws.

Air Force Col. Moe Davis, the chief Guantánamo prosecutor, estimates that about 70 of some 435 Guantánamo prisoners will eventually face trial for specific war crimes; the rest will be held until the U.S. determines they no longer pose a threat. Those expected to face military trial include Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh, alleged plotters of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. President Bush transferred them in September from a secret Central Intelligence Agency prison to Guantánamo.

The majority of the defendants are relative unknowns whose alleged crimes fall short of the catastrophic hijacking attacks. Mr. Khadr was selected as an early prosecution target precisely because his case seemed so simple. Of the prisoners previously charged, Mr. Khadr is the only one accused of killing anybody. Sgt. Speer's combat death, alone of the 194 American military personnel killed by enemy fire in and around Afghanistan, is the only one that has prompted a murder charge.

In contrast to some other cases, "we have a crime scene, we have facts, we have witnesses," says Maj. Groharing.

Defense attorneys say the allegations against Mr. Khadr amount to nothing other than taking part in a battle he didn't start.

The Marine attorney assigned to represent Mr. Khadr, Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, initially was barred by his commander from communicating with reporters after filing an affidavit accusing Guantánamo prison guards of abusing detainees. Muneer Ahmad, an American University law professor helping represent Mr. Khadr, says: "It's hard to think this is a case prosecuted solely on its merits without regard to the political benefits to the administration."

Mr. Khadr, he adds, "has been punished for the perceived sins of his family."

Mr. Khadr's father, Ahmed Said Khadr, an Egyptian-born Canadian citizen, was closely identified with extremist Islamic causes. In the 1980s, Ahmed Khadr traveled to Pakistan and Afghanistan, where he became a confidant of Osama bin Laden. In 1993, Mr. Khadr moved his family to Afghanistan, where U.S. authorities say he funneled money to al Qaeda under cover of charity work.

Mr. Khadr's boys trained at al Qaeda-run camps and played with Mr. bin Laden's children, Khadr family members said in interviews with the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. According to Pentagon charges, "while traveling with his father, Omar Khadr saw or personally met senior al Qaeda leaders," including Mr. bin Laden, Ayman al-Zawahiri and Muhammed Atef.

After the U.S. invaded Afghanistan to topple the Taliban regime in October 2001, the Khadrs scattered. Ahmed Khadr was killed by Pakistani forces in an October 2003 battle that also left his youngest son paralyzed.

Omar, meanwhile, "received approximately one month of one-on-one, private al Qaeda basic training" arranged by his father, Pentagon charges say, including "the use of rocket-propelled grenades, rifles, pistols, grenades and explosives."

In late July 2002, U.S. forces picked up satellite telephone transmissions from a village about seven miles outside Khost, Afghanistan, says retired Army Sgt. First Class Layne Morris, part of the unit sent to reconnoiter. Mr. Morris's account of the day is corroborated by contemporary news reports, charging documents and other court papers, including a successful civil suit filed by Mr. Morris and the widow of Sgt. Speer in U.S. District Court in Utah.

The Khadr family's Canadian lawyer, Dennis Edney, contends that suit was illegitimate and that it may color Mr. Morris's credibility.

According to Mr. Morris and press accounts, a detachment of about 40 U.S. soldiers, along with a few allied Afghan militiamen, headed to Ab Khail. Mr. Morris recalls leading a five-man squad to a compound outside the main village, with a mud wall surrounding a homestead with buildings and animal pens.

The sergeant peered through the compound's green metal gate, spotting what he says were well-dressed Arabs with AK-47 machine guns sitting around a fire. "They looked at me and I looked at them," Mr. Morris says.

Mr. Morris backed up, ordered his soldiers into position and called for reinforcements. About 100 villagers were hanging around watching events unfold. About 45 minutes later, the rest of the detachment arrived, including Sgt. Speer. The Americans took cover and sent the Afghans into the compound to inquire further, Mr. Morris says.

The men inside immediately shot the Afghans dead and began firing guns and throwing grenades at the U.S. soldiers, Mr. Morris says. The ensuing battle was ferocious, costing Mr. Morris his right eye, wounding four other Americans and ending only after U.S. F-18s dropped two 500-pound bombs on the compound, destroying it.

U.S. soldiers, assuming the enemy fighters were all dead, advanced on the compound, Mr. Morris says. That's when Mr. Khadr, then 15, allegedly rose and threw a grenade that wounded Sgt. Speer, a 28-year-old medic.

The soldiers shot Mr. Khadr. When they got to his prone body, he begged them, in English, to finish him off, Mr. Morris says. U.S. soldiers said at the time in press interviews they restrained their desire to do so and instead ordered medical treatment. Mr. Khadr survived, but lost most sight in his left eye. His three companions, all Arabs, were dead.

Sgt. Speer, shrapnel lodged in his head, was taken to an Army hospital in Germany, where he died on Aug. 7. Mr. Khadr was sent to Guantánamo Bay.

Maj. Groharing, 36, had long nursed dreams of becoming a Marine. He didn't join the Corps until 1996 after graduating from the University of Nebraska law school and a brief but unexciting exposure to private practice. For most of his career, he worked as a defense attorney representing Marines accused of crimes. He sometimes found the role uncomfortable, he says, partly because it involved standing up to commanders who want the offenders punished.

In 2002, he was transferred from San Diego to Washington, D.C., for a job with the Marine Corps commandant's legal counsel. Eager for experience at the prosecution table, he next sought appointment to the Office of Military Commissions.

"I wanted to do something that needed to be done," says Maj. Groharing. After he arrived in June 2005, Guantánamo reporters nicknamed him "Kevin Bacon," after his resemblance to the actor who played a Marine prosecutor in the picture, "A Few Good Men."

Prosecutors had already requested that President Bush authorize charges against Mr. Khadr based on the voluminous array of potential evidence. Over three years of detention, Mr. Khadr had told interrogators about his father's activities and connections, shedding light on al Qaeda's organizational structure, military officials say.

Soldiers who took part in the battle could be called to testify, along with relatives of Sgt. Speer. Both would likely hold weight with the seven U.S. officers appointed as judges. To top it off, soldiers had recovered a video tape from Ab Khail, which the Pentagon says shows a smiling Mr. Khadr building and planting bombs.

In November 2005, the administration formally charged Mr. Khadr with conspiracy, murder by an unprivileged belligerent, attempted murder by an unprivileged belligerent and aiding the enemy. The charges stem from Mr. Khadr's classification as an unlawful combatant, or a person who has no right to commit acts of war; if he was adjudged to be part of a regular army, his actions likely would be considered legal under the rules of war.

Maj. Groharing went to Guantánamo to personally deliver the news. He recalls thinking that Mr. Khadr looked "somewhat hardened, far from a typical teenager" and "a bit arrogant, cocky."

Mr. Khadr didn't appear know who the Marine was. "He advised me he didn't want me to be his lawyer. I said, 'I'm not your lawyer,' " and handed him the charges.

Mr. Khadr already had an impressive legal team. His family in Canada had hired counsel. In addition, Prof. Ahmad and a faculty colleague, Richard Wilson, represented him in civil litigation challenging his detention at Guantánamo. To these were added an Army lawyer and Col. Vokey, an experienced military defense counsel.

Mr. Khadr's lawyers say none of the charges are crimes, citing a variety of legal arguments. They note the Supreme Court plurality has found that conspiracy is not a war crime, based on post-World War II precedents that considered the charge too vague.

Prof. Ahmed says murder by an unprivileged belligerent "has never been recognized as a violation of the laws of war," and was instead "invented" by the Bush administration. The other charge, aiding the enemy, makes no sense, the law professor adds, because Mr. Khadr owes no allegiance to the U.S. Lastly, because Mr. Khadr was 15 at the time of the alleged crime, he should be treated as a juvenile, says Prof. Ahmad, following historic precedent.

His attorneys allege Mr. Khadr was subjected to years of abuse, including being used as a "human mop" to clean up urine, being shackled until he soiled himself, and being threatened with deportation to Egypt, where he would be raped.

Col. Davis, the chief Guantánamo prosecutor, says the allegations are under review and have not to date been substantiated. Maj. Groharing says if he ever gets his case into a courtroom, he can deal with such objections by citing evidence collected prior to the interrogation.

That wasn't the only problem. The prosecution needed help from other Pentagon offices but instead found uneven support for the commission plan. The tribunals had originated with Bush political appointees rather than professional military lawyers, many of whom thought existing court-martial procedures were more than adequate. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had little time for the commissions, officials say, since administration lawyers concluded prisoners could be held indefinitely, regardless of whether they were tried or even acquitted.

In the Pentagon bureaucracy, ambivalence translated into inertia, if not outright resistance. Intelligence agents refused to make key material available. Maj. Groharing tacked over his desk an intelligence report he received whose entire contents had been blacked out.

"There's an inherent conflict between what they're doing and what we're doing," Maj. Groharing says he realized. And the intelligence mission "trumps what we're doing."

Maj. Groharing says he was prepared to try his case based on the paper files and interviews with surviving U.S. servicemen. But Col. Vokey, the defense attorney, wanted to interview witnesses and gather evidence himself. Because that meant a trip to contested areas of Afghanistan and regions of Pakistan unfriendly to Americans, Maj. Groharing had to make arrangements for his adversary's travel, something the prosecutor considered "awkward."

Col. Vokey agrees, saying he didn't want to conduct his investigation with the prosecutor "looking over my shoulder." (Shortly before this article's publication, Col. Vokey said the ban on his communication with journalists had been lifted.)

By chance, lawyers in other military commission cases had business of their own in the region and the office planned a group trip. Maj. Groharing decided to go, too, so he could attend Col. Vokey's depositions and hunt down additional witnesses of his own.

The group flew to Islamabad, Pakistan, in May. Col. Vokey immediately came down with food poisoning "and that put him down for a week," the prosecutor says. "From that day on, he never had another kebab or naan."

After a stop in Peshawar, a border city where Ahmed Khadr once volunteered for a charity called Human Concern International, the group flew to Bagram air base in Afghanistan. From there, they took a helicopter to Khost, where an Army unit was assembled to escort the lawyers, now wearing Kevlar battle gear, to the crime scene.

At first, they couldn't find the village. When the convoy of six Humvees and some 25 soldiers finally rumbled into Ab Khail, villagers surrounded the U.S. group. The prosecutor wanted to find witnesses who would say that foreign fighters had been in the compound.

Several villagers "clearly remembered" the incident, Maj. Groharing says, before the village elder showed up and took charge of the encounter. "Anyone we tried to talk to, he would always jump in and answer for everyone else," the prosecutor says. The elder denied the very essence of the prosecution case: that al Qaeda fighters had fought U.S. soldiers in the village.

"There wasn't going to be a 'Perry Mason' moment where all of a sudden he admitted everything when I confronted him with the evidence," Maj. Groharing says.

Both the prosecutor and the defense attorney tried various feints to distract the elder. "We did talk to some folks on the side without him, but we also didn't want to upset the apple cart," Maj. Groharing says. "We wouldn't be doing a very good job of winning hearts and minds" by offending the local establishment.

The Americans examined the new compound, which had been built over the rubble of the previous buildings, noting a few reused bricks with bullet holes and spotting the shrapnel-damaged green metal gate, leaning unused against the compound's mud wall. After about three frustrating hours, they gave up and returned to Khost, Maj. Groharing says.

Their last stop was Jalalabad, a southern Afghan city where Ahmed Khadr ran an organization called Health and Education Project International. The U.S. says it was a front for financing al Qaeda. Col. Vokey wanted to interview the organization's current director.

Narrow streets and congested traffic made it impossible for their Humvees to maneuver, forcing the uniformed U.S. lawyers to walk the last few blocks. As they approached, explosions went off, Maj. Groharing recalls. Arriving at the address, they found a crowd watching the entire city block in flames.

"We were looking at the map and the grid coordinates and, no kidding, it's the place Col. Vokey wanted to see," Maj. Groharing says. The two lawyers, fearing for their safety, quickly left the scene.

The case against Mr. Khadr is now one of many held up by the Supreme Court's decision to strike down the Bush administration's original commission plan. Maj. Groharing says he expects to refile charges after the Pentagon draws up rules and procedures implementing the new system of military commissions, to be completed as soon as January. The Bush administration, meanwhile, plans to build a courtroom complex at Guantánamo by July 2007 at a cost of up to $125 million.

But lawmakers of both parties have questioned the courtroom project, and the ultimate fate of military commission trials remains unclear. Last week a federal judge found Guantánamo prisoners had no right to challenge the Military Commissions Act, but the outgoing and incoming chairmen of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sens. Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) and Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.), have said they plan to revisit the legislation.

U.S. Military Rehearses Terror Hearings (AP)

By Michael Melia

AP, December 17, 2006

The U.S. military is rehearsing for hearings on whether 14 top terror suspects can be held indefinitely without charge as enemy combatants, but defense lawyers say the outcome is preordained.

Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and the 13 others will be the highest-profile detainees to undergo the so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, and the first to do so in two years. The proceedings, expected early next year, are open to the media.

At the hearings, a military panel will evaluate whether the men should be classified as "enemy combatants," a designation which allows them to be held indefinitely and prevents them from challenging their detention in the U.S. court system.

"The biggest thing we're doing is opening up the books, reviewing procedures and conducting rehearsals so that we do it correctly," Navy Capt. Philip Waddingham told reporters who recently visited Guantanamo. He is the lead officer at Guantanamo for the Pentagon-based office in charge of determining detainees' status.

It is unclear whether Mohammed and the others — who until recently were being held in secret CIA prisons — will agree to attend the hearings. If they do, the military says they will remain shackled and would be forbidden to talk to reporters.

The rehearsals are being conducted inside the same space reserved for the hearings — a small room inside a trailer equipped with a few leather chairs, one plastic seat for the detainee, and little else.

Combatant Status Review Tribunals were held for 558 detainees between July 2004 and January 2005. All but 38 were deemed enemy combatants.

Defense attorneys have condemned the hearings as shams because classified evidence is withheld from the detainees and they are not afforded defense lawyers.

"There is no question that these 14 have no chance," said Brent Mickum, an attorney who represents two Britons at Guantanamo. "The decision has (already) been made that they are enemy combatants."

At the hearings, a panel of three officers will evaluate whether detainees merit the designation. A military "personal representative" will help prisoners prepare for the proceedings.

Bush announced on Sept. 6 that the 14 detainees had been transferred to Guantanamo.

Mohammed, who was believed to be the No. 3 al-Qaida leader, has not been seen in public since he was captured in Pakistan in 2003. The others include the alleged architects of the USS Cole bombing in Yemen in 2000 and the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The 14 are in a maximum-security section of the prison, which sprawls over a cactus-studded patch of arid ground overlooking the Caribbean. Officials say they are treated like other detainees, and can receive reading materials and have access to mail censored by the military.

Waddingham said in September that he expected the hearings for the 14 new detainees to be held within three months. That timeframe has been pushed back to early 2007 as top officials at the Pentagon, the Justice Department and the military Joint Task Force in charge of the prison camps coordinate the proceedings, he said.

About 380 men have been transferred from Guantanamo to other countries since the detention center opened in January 2002. About 395 detainees remain, most of them held for nearly five years without charge on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

U.S. authorities repatriated a 28-year-old Bangladeshi man on Sunday after years of imprisonment in Guantanamo, a police official at the airport in Bangladesh's capital Dhaka said. The official, Tahera Banu, said the man was being interrogated.

Give Habeas A Chance (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER (R-Pa.), who has often complained about judicial second-guessing of congressional reasoning, practically pleaded with the Supreme Court recently to substitute its judgment for that of the legislative branch. Specter believes that prisoners at Guantanamo Bay should be able to file habeas corpus petitions challenging their confinement, and he offered legislation that would have allowed them to do so. It failed, and Specter ended up voting for a bill that denies them that right, later expressing confidence that the Supreme Court would "clean it up."

Now Specter is having second — or is it third? — thoughts. Earlier this month, he joined with his successor as Judiciary Committee chairman, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), in introducing the Habeas Corpus Restoration Act of 2006. The bill, which presumably will be reintroduced in January, would repeal provisions of the Military Commissions Act that withheld habeas protection from foreigners deemed "enemy combatants."

That law has already resulted in a legal defeat for Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the former driver for Osama bin Laden who won a victory in the Supreme Court in June. Last week, a federal judge ruled that the law barred Hamdan, who is imprisoned at Guantanamo, from challenging his confinement in court. But the judge also ruled that the law was unconstitutional because it denied habeas rights to foreigners living in the U.S.

Of the 51 senators who voted against affording habeas protection to present and future enemy combatants, six will be missing from the next Congress. Prospects for remedial legislation would seem equally bright in the new House of Representatives, where Democrats will have a majority of 233 to 202. Even if the majorities for passage weren't veto-proof, President Bush might think twice about rejecting legislation restoring a privilege with roots in the Magna Carta.

As Specter points out, the Constitution allows for the suspension of the writ only in times of invasion or rebellion, and "we are suffering neither of those alternatives at the present time." Habeas protection for enemy combatants — not just those at Guantanamo but other aliens who might be detained in the future — is not just a legal nicety. Without such protection, real injustices could be suffered by flesh-and-blood individuals.

Mark Denbeaux, a Seton Hall University law professor who studied transcripts of proceedings in which Guantanamo inmates were classified as enemy combatants, has said that the process afforded prisoners little opportunity to contest the allegations against them. "These were not hearings," he said. "These were shams." Even if he's wrong, the military has nothing to fear from the ancient safeguard of habeas corpus.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New Twist On Government Control Of Data: Use Of Subpoenas (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, December 18, 2006

When Anthony Romero finally read the document marked "secret" that the Justice Department was subpoenaing "any and all copies of," he scratched his head.

"It simply had nothing to do with national security. If anything, it might be mildly embarrassing to the government," he says.

And so Mr. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, decided to fight. That kicked off the latest battle in one key arena of the Bush administration's war on terror - the information front.

Both sides agree that nothing less than the nature of American society is at stake, although each side sees different threats. The administration says the danger comes from technically savvy terrorists who are out to exploit the nation's open society in order to undermine it. Critics contend that the real peril comes from the administration itself, which, they charge, is abusing the classification system to shield its activities from public scrutiny, thus undermining the workings of democracy.

This struggle between the needs to protect national security and civil liberties goes back to the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798, which were passed to silence critics of the war with France. Such practices became more formalized in 1940, when the Roosevelt administration issued the first executive order creating a classification system. But since 9/11, the struggle has intensified.

"Democracy cannot give you a perfectly clear line between the balance of transparency and secrecy," says James Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank in Washington. "That will always create natural tensions, particularly at a time when we see we do have a lot of enemies." Revised approach after 9/11

Since 9/11, the Bush administration has sought to keep secret any and all information that it believes could potentially be used by terrorists. In March 2003, it issued a broad executive order that extended the authority to classify information from agencies like the Department of Agriculture, Health and Human Services, and the Environmental Protection Agency. It's also extended the time information could be kept secret, from 10 years to 25 years. Moreover, it began a campaign to reclassify millions of documents from earlier administrations that had previously been declassified.

In 2005, more than 15 million additional documents were classified, a record amount, according to the Information Security Oversight Office of the National Archives. It cost the United States an estimated $7.7 billion to keep all the nation's information under wraps, according to the ISOO - an increase of more than 50 percent since 2001.

Critics say this is a significant overclassification of information. They say it's denied the public access to crucial policy debates about the fight against terrorism as well as the way the war in Iraq has been waged.

In addition, they contend, this administration has used the rubric of national security to cover up controversial activities - from the Abu Ghraib prison abuses to the National Security Agency's domestic wiretapping.

"[National security has] been abused to shield high-level political leadership on the torture issue. It's been used as a way to intimate the press [and] create a climate of fear and intimidation about government employees to dissuade whistle-blowers," says Romero of the ACLU.

Some academics also argue that large amounts of information that have nothing to do with national security have been reclassified - which has undermined their ability to do basic historical as well as scientific research.

"It's an unprecedented situation," says Larry Berman, a professor of political science at the University of California at Davis, who is suing the CIA for access to documents from the Johnson administration. "This current administration has set back freedom on information and access to knowledge for generations." How the government sees it

From the administration's point of view, however, the problem is not so much secrecy but the Internet and computer-savvy terrorists, who can use the free flow of information within the nation's open, democratic system to invent creative ways to attack it.

"This isn't the same world we lived in 10 years ago," says William Banks, director of the Institute for National Security and Counterterrorism at Syracuse University in New York. "The dynamics of information have changed dramatically because of the Internet and the ease of data collection and transference."

To address that new technical reality, the administration has tried to prevent access to information that, if cobbled together properly, could give terrorists clues as to how the government functions. It's become known as the "mosaic theory" - that one piece of information on its own may seem harmless, but together with others, it can result in a larger picture that enemies could use. This has created a new paradigm that has allowed the administration to expand its definition of what should be kept secret.

"It basically says, 'Just trust us that even though this piece may seem innocuous, we know that if it's connected to other pieces of information that it can be dangerous,' " says Professor Banks.

That brings the issue back to the ACLU document, which the Justice Department has subpoenaed from the ACLU. Neither the Justice Department nor the US Attorney's Office would comment on it. The ACLU will not reveal its contents either, awaiting the outcome of its effort to quash the subpoena. But Romero says the document is a "classic example of overclassification." He also says the US Attorney's Office is abusing the grand-jury system, which is set up as an investigative body.

"The government's attempt to suppress information using the grand-jury process is truly chilling and is unprecedented," said Romero in a statement. "This subpoena serves no legitimate investigative purpose."

Mr. Carafano of the Heritage Foundation says that overclassification is a problem in every administration, and he does not believe the current one has particularly abused the process.

"Is overclassification a problem? Absolutely," he says. "Are there people who try to cover up their mistakes using it? Absolutely. Is there's going to be a constant tension around this issue? Absolutely. But if somebody thinks that if they vote the bums out of office this will change, they're wrong."

Our Own Nuremberg Trials (VV)

By Nat Hentoff

Village Voice, December 18, 2006

The new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, warden of the "worst of the worst" in Guantánamo.

photo: www.defenselink.mil/During the mutual-admiration hearing before the Senate Committee on Armed Services—which led to the unanimous confirmation of former CIA chief Robert Gates to be Donald Rumsfeld's successor—no senator asked Gates if he approves of the Pentagon's "extreme . . . emergency" insistence on a $125 million appropriation to construct a permanent compound for a war-crimes court at Guantánamo. There, in 2007, war-crimes trials will be held for dozens of Guantánamo "detainees." The facilities will accommodate simultaneous proceedings.

Unlike the Nuremberg war-crimes trials of the Nazis, there will be no government officials in the dock, but rather—as detailed in my last column—prisoners against whom the United States has itself committed war crimes under the Geneva Conventions and our own War Crimes act. These crimes include their conditions of confinement and a total lack of the due process that the Supreme Court ordered in Rasul v. Bush (2004) and Hamdan v. Rumsfeld (2006).

Each of the defendants will have already been designated as an "enemy combatant" by previous "administrative" Combatant Status Review Tribunals at Guantánamo. At these sham hearings they were presumed guilty before any of the "evidence" against them (which they were not permitted to see) was aired. That means the presumption of guilt will continue at the war-crimes trials.

The world will watch the total transmogrification of America's much self-praised "rule of law." There are objections to this rush for funds to house the American Nuremberg trials. On December 3, Republican congressman James Walsh, chair of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs, and Related Agencies—which is in charge of military construction projects—refused to authorize the Pentagon's "national security" appropriation.

Walsh is angry at the absence of any public debate on this expenditure and, he cogently adds, "The issue of the tribunals is very controversial. For them to move this fast makes me wonder why."

Congressman Walsh will no longer chair that crucial committee in January. But in view of the Democratic congressional leadership's enveloping embrace of the new defense secretary, Robert Gates, will lawmakers prevent him from going ahead with the compound at Guantánamo? And if the Democrats hold up the appropriation, will Gates proceed with the trials in more cramped quarters? (On December 10, the Pentagon suddenly postponed its proposal—leaving it to be decided by the next Congress.)

Our rampant lawlessness during the past four years at Guantánamo has long been "controversial" in the international press and among human rights groups. But the extent and depth of our abuse of these prisoners—resulting in a number of desperation suicides—have been illuminated with damning clarity in a series of reports by New Jersey's Seton Hall University School of Law, the most recent of which, "No-Hearing Hearings," I reported on last week.

The Seton Hall revelations have reached beyond the metropolitan press to, for example, the Anniston Star in Alabama. A December 1 editorial, "The Gitmo Games," quotes from the Seton Hall findings, and concludes:

"The military is holding something less than a kangaroo court that results in putting people away—without charging them with any specific wrongdoing—for an indefinite period of time . . . History will be very unkind to the rulers who constructed this very unjust, un-American system.

"Those un-American rulers, of course, include George W. Bush, Dick Cheney, John Ashcroft and Alberto Gonzales, a coven of lawyers at the Defense Department and the White House, and Donald Rumsfeld. Will Robert Gates take his place among them?"

The Anniston Star's indictment-editorial ends: "[History] also will be unkind to people who tolerated [this un-American system.]" That means us.

A Seton Hall Law School report from February 8, which I did not cite last week, by professor Mark Denbeaux and Joshua Denbeaux and law students at this exemplary school, presents the case against the United States in anticipation of the war-crimes trials at Guantánamo next year. "A Profile of 517 Detainees Through Analysis of Department of Defense Data" provides "a window into the Government's detaining only those the President has called 'the worst of the worst.' " You can now determine for yourself how dangerous the great majority of the defendants are in the forthcoming American Nuremberg trials:

"Only 8 percent of the detainees were characterized as al Qaeda fighters. Of the remaining detainees, 40 percent have no definitive connection with al Qaeda at all and 18 percent have no definitive affiliation with either al Qaeda or the Taliban."

The report continues: "The Government has detained numerous persons based on mere affiliations with a large number of groups that are, in fact, not on the Department of Homeland Security terrorist watchlist . . . A large majority—60 percent—are detained merely because they are 'associated with' a group or groups the Government asserts are terrorist organizations. (And members of almost 72 percent of those groups are allowed into the U.S.)"

Remember, these findings are based entirely on Department of Defense records. (Robert Gates can fact-check them.) Also, among "the worst of the worst":

"Only 5 percent of the detainees were captured by United States forces. Eighty-six percent of the detainees were arrested by either Pakistan or the Northern Alliance and turned over to United States custody. This 86 percent of the detainees captured by Pakistan or the Northern Alliance were handed over to the United States at a time when the United States offered large bounties for capture of suspected enemies." No questions asked.

Remember, too, that in the 2006 Military Commissions Act, Congress stripped from all these prisoners any meaningful right to utilize our federal courts, thereby defying our own Supreme Court.

Co-author Joshua Denbeaux tells me: "The government's own documents proved that the government's claims that the prisoners were the 'worst of the worst' was a false and shameful public relations ploy . . . We hope that our reports will convince Congress to amend the Military Commissions Act and restore federal jurisdiction." If that happens, the prisoners could contest their conditions of confinement, their imprisonment, and their sentences.

Should the new Democrat-controlled Congress not do that, the American Nuremberg trials could begin—and later, the defendants' last resort may be the John Roberts Supreme Court. But however Congress or the high court eventually decides, we will again be disgraced around the world.

WAR NEWS:

Reid Backs 'Surge' Of Troops In Iraq With '08 Pullout (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 18, 2006

The Senate's incoming majority leader said he would support a temporary increase of U.S. military forces in Iraq, so long as any such act was tied to a withdrawal by 2008.

"If it's for a surge -- that is, for two or three months -- and it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year, then, sure, I'll go along with it," Sen. Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said on ABC's "This Week."

However, other Democrats and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said such an increase in troop levels would not make much of a difference.

"Over this summer, the United States and Iraqi forces launched Operation Forward Together. It began in June, and then phase two began in August with thousands of American troops going into Baghdad to try to stabilize the situation," Mr. Powell said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

"They haven't stabilized the situation. So we have tried this surge of troops over the summer. I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purposes of suppressing this communitarian violence, this civil war, will work," he said.

Mr. Powell, whose so-called Powell Doctrine calls for the use of overwhelming force in military conflicts, said he thinks force levels should have been increased after the fall of Saddam Hussein in order to fill the security vacuum that led to the Iraq insurgency.

During his interview, Mr. Powell said he supports many of the proposals contained in the Iraq Study Group's 79 policy recommendations recently submitted to President Bush.

The bipartisan panel rejected a call for increased troop levels, which have been made most vocally by Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, who is weighing a possible 2008 presidential campaign.

A short-term increase in troop levels was also rejected by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"Well, I respect Harry Reid on it, but that's not where I am," Mr. Kennedy told "Fox News Sunday." "The generals who have testified before the Armed Services Committee think that we would add to being a crutch for the Iraqi civilian government in not making the right judgments and decisions. I think that is a persuasive case and is one that I support."

Although Mr. Reid said he would support a short-term troop increase, it was pointed out by "This Week" moderator George Stephanopoulos that one of the troop-increase proposals being considered by Mr. Bush would take place over 18 to 24 months.

"All I can do is shake my head," Mr. Reid said in response. "I have no military experience, but I have political experience. The American people will not allow this war to go on as it has. It simply is a war that will not be won militarily. It can only be won politically."

Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat, also appeared to reject the idea of sending more troops to Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0107118

"I'd be very skeptical," Mr. Reed, who also sits on the Armed Services Committee, told CNN's "Late Edition." "General Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, pointed out that surging troops without a purpose doesn't make any sense. So I think we'd all have to understand what the purpose of this increase would be."

Powell Says Troops Stretched Too Thin (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin,

USA Today, December 18, 2006

Former secretary of State Colin Powell said Sunday that the U.S. Army "is about broken" and could not support sending a significant increase of soldiers to Iraq.

"That surge cannot be sustained," Powell said. "The current active Army … and the Marine Corps is not large enough for the kinds of missions they're being asked to perform."

Powell, a 35-year Army veteran and former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said he doubted a temporary increase in U.S. forces in Iraq now would change the outcome of the war. The United States was "losing" but had not yet lost, he said.

Speaking on the CBS program, Face the Nation, Powell said that increasing the number of U.S. troops in Iraq from 140,000 to 160,000 or more would force the military to keep soldiers currently in Iraq there longer and to accelerate the arrival of others. That would hurt a force already strained by repeated and extended deployments since 9/11. The White House has said it is considering a number of options that would alter U.S. strategy in Iraq, including a temporary surge of U.S. forces.

Several Iraq war supporters, including Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., have called for a major increase in U.S. troops in Iraq and criticized the administration for not sending more soldiers there in 2003.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., told ABC's This Week that he could back a brief increase in forces if "it's part of a program to get us out of there."

However, U.S. commanders are worried about the impact of such a plan. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, told the House Armed Services Committee on Friday that the active duty Army of 507,000 "will break" unless the force is expanded by 7,000 or more soldiers a year.

He also called for increased deployment of the Army National Guard and Reserves, which have already seen record call-ups since the 9/11 attacks.

As a military leader, Powell articulated a philosophy that came to be known as the Powell doctrine. It rejected the use of U.S. military force without a clear mission and overwhelming numbers deployed against an enemy.

The conflict in Iraq, Powell said, has become a civil war that requires an Iraqi political solution. "It's very difficult to see how the American Army can impose its will in this sort of conflict," he said.

Powell Doubts Need To Raise Troop Levels (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON. Dec. 17 — Colin L. Powell, the former secretary of state and former chairman of the Joints Chiefs of Staff, said Sunday that the Army was “about broken” and that he saw nothing to justify an increase in troops in Iraq.

“I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purposes of suppression of this communitarian violence, this civil war, will work,” he said in an interview on the CBS News program “Face the Nation.”

“But if somebody proposes that additional troops be sent,” Mr. Powell said, “if I were still chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, my first question to whoever is proposing it: what mission is it that these troops are to accomplish?”

Mr. Powell said heavy demands on the Army had meant “a backlog of equipment that is not being repaired” and “repetitive tours” for soldiers assigned to Iraq. “So if you surge now,” he said, “you’re going to be bringing in troops from the United States who have already been kept there even longer.”

Mr. Powell said the United States should be talking directly with the governments of Syria and Iran in an effort to stabilize the region — a contrast to the policy of the Bush administration, which has not engaged in such talks.

In a separate interview on the ABC News program “This Week,” Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming Democratic majority leader, said he could support a troop increase only if it were temporary. “If it’s for a surge, that is, for two or three months, and it’s part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year, then, sure, I’ll go along with it.”

Mr. Reid added: “The American people will not allow this war to go on as it has. It simply is a war that will not be won militarily. It can only be won politically.”

Powell Says U.S. Losing In Iraq, Calls For Drawdown By Mid-2007 (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Former secretary of state Colin L. Powell said yesterday that the United States is losing what he described as a "civil war" in Iraq and that he is not persuaded that an increase in U.S. troops there would reverse the situation. Instead, he called for a new strategy that would relinquish responsibility for Iraqi security to the government in Baghdad sooner rather than later, with a U.S. drawdown to begin by the middle of next year.

Powell's comments broke his long public silence on the issue and placed him at odds with the administration. President Bush is considering options for a new military strategy -- among them a "surge" of 15,000 to 30,000 troops added to the current 140,000 in Iraq, to secure Baghdad and to accelerate the training of Iraqi forces, as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and others have proposed; or a redirection of the U.S. military away from the insurgency to focus mainly on hunting al-Qaeda terrorists, as the nation's top military leaders proposed last week in a meeting with the president.

But Bush has rejected the dire conclusions of the Iraq Study Group and its recommendations to set parameters for a phased withdrawal to begin next year, and he has insisted that the violence in Iraq is not a civil war.

"I agree with the assessment of Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton," Powell said, referring to the study group's leaders, former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former Indiana congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D). The situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating, and we're not winning, we are losing. We haven't lost. And this is the time, now, to start to put in place the kinds of strategies that will turn this situation around."

Speaking on CBS's "Face the Nation," Powell seemed to draw as much from his 35-year Army career, including four years as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as from his more recent and difficult tenure as Bush's chief diplomat.

The summer's surge of U.S. troops to try to stabilize Baghdad failed, he said, and any new attempt is unlikely to succeed. "If somebody proposes that additional troops be sent, if I was still chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, my first question . . . is what mission is it these troops are supposed to accomplish? . . . Is it something that is really accomplishable? . . . Do we have enough troops to accomplish it?"

Although he said he agrees with Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, that there should be an increase in U.S. advisers to the Iraqi military, he said that "sooner or later, you have to begin the baton pass, passing it off to the Iraqis for their security and to begin the drawdown of U.S. forces. I think that's got to happen sometime before the middle of next year."

Before any decision to increase troops, he said, "I'd want to have a clear understanding of what it is they're going for, how long they're going for. And let's be clear about something else. . . . There really are no additional troops. All we would be doing is keeping some of the troops who were there, there longer and escalating or accelerating the arrival of other troops."

He added: "That's how you surge. And that surge cannot be sustained."

The "active Army is about broken," Powell said. Even beyond Iraq, the Army and Marines have to "grow in size, in my military judgment," he said, adding that Congress must provide significant additional funding to sustain them.

Powell also agreed with the study group's recommendation that the administration open talks with Syria and Iran as it seeks a solution to the Iraq problem. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have explicitly rejected talks until Syria ends its destabilizing influence in Lebanon and its support for anti-Israel militants, and until Iran suspends its nuclear enrichment program. The administration has charged both countries with aiding the Iraqi insurgency.

"Do they get marginal support from Iran and Syria? You bet they do," Powell said of the Iraq militants. "I have no illusions that either Syria or Iran want to help us in Iraq. I am also quite confident that what is happening in Iraq is self-generated for the most part. The money, the resources, the weapons are in Iraq already."

He added: "Are Iran and Syria regimes that I look down upon? I certainly do. But at the same time, I've looked down on many people over the years, in the course of my military and diplomatic career, and I still had to talk to them."

During Bush's first term, Powell was often on the losing side of disagreements with then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Vice President Cheney and the president over a range of foreign policy issues, including the Arab-Israeli peace process, North Korea and Iraq. Although he ultimately supported the 2003 invasion of Iraq -- and played a major role in building public backing for war when he delivered a U.N. Security Council speech saying Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction -- he objected to the administration's detention and interrogation policies for "enemy combatants" and privately questioned the lack of planning and troop strength for postwar Iraq.

His low-key departure from office in January 2005, after Bush's request for his resignation, stood in contrast to Friday's ceremonial farewell to Rumsfeld, whose retirement festivities at the Pentagon were attended by Bush and

Cheney. Asked yesterday whether he agreed with Cheney's assessment that Rumsfeld was "the finest defense secretary this nation has ever had," Powell demurred.

"Well, that's the vice president's judgment," he said. "I've known many fine secretaries of defense. . . . But it's history that will judge the performance of all of us in this troubling time . . . and it is a history that I think will ultimately be written as a result of what happens in Iraq."

Biden Opposes Iraq Troop Surge (BOS)

The Boston Globe, December 18, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. --Likely presidential hopeful Sen. Joe Biden said Sunday that he opposes sending additional troops to Iraq, even as the idea seemed to gain support from the Senate's leading Democrat, incoming majority leader Harry Reid.

"I will not to support a surge of troops unless it's tied to some reason for me to believe that they have a political solution," said Biden, incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Biden, D-Del., said any proposal to send about 30,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq should only follow a political solution that will end sectarian violence and civil unrest.

Earlier, Reid said he would be open only to a short-term increase.

"If the commanders on the ground said this is just for a short period of time, we'll go along with that," said Reid, citing a time frame such as two months to three months. But a period of 18 months to 24 months would be too long, he said.

"The American people will not allow this war to go on as it has. It simply is a war that will not be won militarily. It can only be won politically," Reid said.

Biden spoke at Southern New Hampshire University to about 100 people Sunday afternoon, in an appearance sponsored by the World Affairs Council of New Hampshire.

His speech was part a weekend swing through New Hampshire, aimed at boosting his chances in the state's first-in-the-nation presidential primary.

"The president and others who support the surge have it exactly backwards," Biden said.

He added that Iraqis should construct and hold to a political settlement for peace before the United States sends additional support.

Biden, however, held out little hope that a Democrat-controlled Congress would be able to force President Bush's hand on Iraq. Although Congress could withhold spending for military efforts in Iraq, Biden said such a move would only deny needed supplies to troops and would not speed a pullout.

Instead, Biden said it will be up to Republicans to join Democrats in convincing Bush to change course on Iraq.

Biden said the main challenge in Iraq is a cycle of sectarian violence and revenge killings. He said any peace initiatives must give each ethnic group an incentive to support a united Iraq, including a share of oil revenues.

Biden proposes that the Iraqis set up three semi-autonomous regions, one each to be overseen by the Suunis, Shiites and Kurds, with a central government having limited federal powers.

He would also include countries neighboring Iraq in peace talks, including Syria, Iran and Turkey.

A War That Abhors A Vacuum (NYT)

THE niceties are up for debate: phased or partial withdrawal from Iraq would entail pulling troops back to their bases across the country, or leapfrogging backward to the nearest international border, or redeploying to bases in nearby countries.

But whatever the final prescription, the debate must include a sober look at the street-level impact of withdrawal. What will become of Iraqi villages, towns and cities as we pull out? Although past is not necessarily prologue, recent experience in Anbar Province may be instructive.

American units have already withdrawn from the western Euphrates River valley — twice, in fact. As the insurgency heated up in early 2004, the Seventh Marine Regiment pulled up stakes and went to fight insurgents in eastern Anbar, leaving the rest of the province in the hands of a battalion of troops. The Marines balanced obvious risk against the possible reward of overwhelming some of the insurgent groups in the east.

The consequences were immediate and bloody. Insurgents assumed control of several towns and villages. They tortured and executed police officers, local politicians, friendly tribal leaders and informants. They murdered contractors who had worked with the Americans or the Iraqi government. They tore down American-financed reconstruction projects and in a few cases imposed an extreme version of Islamic law. Many Iraqi military units collapsed in the absence of United States support.

The insurgents celebrated their self-described victory and exploited the withdrawal for propaganda purposes. Baathist-led insurgents used the opportunity to establish training camps and weapons caches in the farmland and along the river banks while other groups, including Al Qaeda, smuggled in fighters, suicide bombers and money to support operations in Ramadi, Falluja and Baghdad. Western Iraq became a temporary haven for criminals, terrorists and thousands of local thugs who made up de facto mini-regimes in the absence of a stabilizing force.

When the Seventh Marines returned to western Anbar it was essentially forced to retake some of the towns it once controlled. Many local Iraqis were openly hostile; the battle for the hearts and minds of the population was set back months, if not years. With the politicians murdered, local civil administration was almost nonexistent and any influence held by the central government was lost.

The Seventh Marine Regiment pulled up stakes again in November 2004 to join the second fight for Falluja. Conscious of the damage done by the earlier withdrawal, the Marines left behind more troops in an effort to stem the inevitable surge of insurgent and criminal gangs; Iraqi forces were not yet ready to assume control.

Despite this Marine presence, the results were similar. What had been rebuilt in the summer crumbled in the fall.

The two withdrawals left the western Euphrates River valley in a shambles. At the end of 2005 the Marines were forced to conduct sweep and clear operations from Anbar's capital, Ramadi, to the Syrian border town of Husayba. As they pushed west they uncovered hundreds of weapons caches, elaborate insurgent propaganda centers, carefully camouflaged training camps, suicide vehicle factories and complex criminal networks that were feeding a steady stream of money to insurgents and terrorists across the country. Marine units settled back in, spread out and brought attack levels to unprecedented lows.

Since 2005, the situation in Anbar has significantly deteriorated. But as bad as things have become, American and Iraqi forces retain some degree of control in even the most turbulent areas. The border cities of Husayba and Qaim are relatively stable and have effective security and government. Falluja, also stable, is a model for Iraqi-American military cooperation. Advisers are embedded with Iraqi units across the province. American-supported tribes are beginning to combat Al Qaeda in Iraq in the east. Anbar is down but not out, thanks to the American troops along the Euphrates River.

American presence might be likened to a control rod in a nuclear reactor: Leave it in place and the potential energy of the insurgents and criminals is mostly kept in check; remove it and the energy becomes kinetic. Withdrawal of United States presence from any town or city in Anbar will almost certainly lead to the creation of safe havens for western Iraq's impenetrable snarl of foreign fighters, nationalist insurgents and local thugs. Many abandoned cities and towns would come to closely resemble the Falluja of mid-2004.

If American forces conduct even a phased withdrawal before the full certification of Iraqi Army battalions, those units incapable of sustaining independent operations would be forced to pull back alongside their minders, or collapse as their logistics and fire support lifelines disappeared. Most local police forces would scatter, be co-opted or slaughtered wholesale, as they were in 2004.

Insurgents of all stripes would make the most of the combined American and Iraqi withdrawal, harassing the departing convoys with homemade bombs and small-arms fire. Videos of insurgents dancing in the streets would become prevalent on the Internet and international television. No public relations campaign could succeed in painting an early phased withdrawal as anything but a strategic defeat.

"Redeployed" in large bases far from the enemy centers of gravity, American troops wouldn't be able to keep insurgent groups from forming semi-conventional units. This pattern has repeated itself countless times across Iraq and follows historic guerrilla-warfare models: insurgents exploit any safe haven to strengthen and train their forces. The longer they are left alone, the stronger they become. As our presence in the countryside diminishes, our ability to gather intelligence and to protect valuable infrastructure, communications lines and friendly tribal areas will deteriorate rapidly.

Should the Iraqi Army stay in place as American units withdraw, the American advisers embedded within these units probably would have to be removed, leaving nobody to control air support, coordinate unit pay from Baghdad, supervise the monthly convoys to take troops home on leave, prevent gross violations of the Geneva Convention or shore up shaky leadership. Given patient support, most of these units eventually will develop the capacity to conduct independent operations. However, some adviser teams already report that their Iraqi counterparts have said they intend to desert if the Americans leave too soon.

Although Anbar may be the most violent province in Iraq per capita, it is relatively free of the sectarian tensions found in Baghdad and the center. The confusion caused by withdrawal would be compounded as religious, militia and political loyalties divided inadequately prepared military and police units. Full-scale ethnic killing would become a very real possibility.

For some, the collapse of Iraqi society into Hobbesian mayhem is inevitable no matter how many American troops remain on the ground. A few argue that disintegration of the Iraqi state actually would bring about the national catharsis that seems so elusive today — that absolute civil war would be a greater good.

This cold calculus ignores the very real impact of an American withdrawal on the people we now protect. Any debate that does not consider the bloody reality we would leave in our wake does a disservice to the people of Iraq and the troops who have fought so hard to defend them.

Stretched Too Thin (WP)

By Kevin Ryan

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

When America's top general in charge of Iraq, John Abizaid, told Congress last month that our Army was unable to increase the number of troops deployed in Iraq, it was a first-of-its-kind admission from a senior defense official: that our ground forces had reached their capacity for military action. "This is not an Army that was built to sustain a 'long war,' " Abizaid told students at a Harvard lecture two days later. This is an Army built to achieve victory with speed and precision. This is a short-war Army fighting a long war.

On Dec. 6, the day after Robert Gates told Congress that he is "open to the possibility of an increase" in the size of our ground forces, the Iraq Study Group released its report, which declared that "America's military capacity is stretched thin." And last week the Army's chief of staff, Gen. Peter Schoomaker, told Congress that the Army is prepared to add up to 7,000 soldiers per year to its ranks if authorized.

The stage has been set for a serious discussion about the appropriate size for our Army: a discussion that should balance resources with demands. Today the 37 combat brigades of the active Army are almost totally consumed by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. With all units either deployed, returning from deployment or preparing to deploy, there are none left to prepare for other contingencies. Active brigades have only 14 months at home before they are recalled for their next 12-month deployment. The National Guard can muster only two or three of its 15 enhanced brigades at any given time, largely because of crippling equipment shortages.

The lack of ground forces has an impact beyond the ability to commit more troops to Iraq. Our published defense strategy requires a military that can defend our homeland, sustain two major wars, be present in key regions abroad and fight a global war on terrorism. With Marine and Army ground forces barely large enough to fight the two major wars, the other security tasks are left to flyovers and ship visits from our Air Force and Navy. According to Schoomaker, America is "on a dangerous path that dictates we must increase our strategic depth, increase readiness and reduce our operational risk." If Afghanistan and Iraq are typical of the two-war capability called for in our defense strategy, our Army must be able to sustain a deployment of 14 brigades. To do this and achieve the Defense Department goal of two years at home for every year in combat, the Army would need 56 brigades in its structure. To meet the demands of homeland defense, foreign presence and a global war on terrorism, one could make a good case that America must be able to sustain an additional five to seven brigades in deployment, which would require 20 to 28 more brigades in the structure.

A rough estimate therefore of active and Guard brigades needed for our defense strategy would be between 76 and 84. And these numbers assume that America's other ground force, the Marine Corps, continues to provide the forces it already does in the Middle East and around the globe. Currently the Army has 52 brigades (37 active and 15 enhanced Guard) and has authority to build to 70 brigades (42 active and 28 Guard), but Congress has not authorized enough troops to man these units.

The 2007 defense budget pays for only 512,000 active-duty soldiers. The Army needs a minimum of 575,000 to man the brigades our defense strategy requires. America must bring its military capabilities back in balance with its strategic demands.

Support is building to correct this mismatch. Colin Powell, the former secretary of state and chairman of the Joint Chiefs, said yesterday that both the Army and Marine Corps need to grow in size. Former Army chief of staff Gordon Sullivan has called for the active Army to have between 560,000 and 600,000 soldiers. Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona has called for the active Army and Marine Corps to increase by 100,000 troops. The United States Army Relief Act, sponsored by Democratic senators Jack Reed, Hillary Clinton, Joe Lieberman and Bill Nelson, calls for an increase in end strength of 20,000 per year over the next four years. These recommendations all bring us closer to the mark.

DOJ_NMG_0107123

Throughout the 1980s we recruited an Army of more than 750,000 entirely from volunteers: the same Army that won the Persian Gulf War. It will take several years to recruit additional troops and build the organizations and facilities to house them, but these numbers are well within our reach.

Gunmen Kidnap Aid Workers In Baghdad (AP)

By Christopher Torchia

AP, December 18, 2006

Gunmen in Iraqi army uniforms burst into Red Crescent offices on Sunday and kidnapped more than two dozen people at the humanitarian organization in the latest sign of the country's growing lawlessness.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, in Iraq on his sixth visit since the 2003 invasion, appealed for international support for Iraq's fragile government, saying the bloodshed was being carried out "by the very forces worldwide who are trying to prevent moderation."

Blair and his Iraqi counterpart, Nouri al-Maliki, discussed preparations by British military units in Basra, the main city in southern Iraq, to turn over security to Iraqi forces. Britain expects to withdraw several thousand troops from Iraq next year, despite concerns that Iraqi forces are not ready to keep order on their own.

"Our task — ours, the Americans, the whole of the coalition, the international community and the Iraqis themselves — is to make sure that the forces of terrorism don't defeat the will of the people to have a democracy," Blair said.

In the latest violence, gunmen in five pickup trucks pulled up at the office of the Iraqi Red Crescent in downtown Baghdad and abducted 25 employees, police said. A Red Crescent official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of safety concerns, said the gunmen left women behind.

Pierre Kraehenbuehl, director of operations of the International Committee of the Red Cross, said in Geneva that seven abductees were released. The Dutch Foreign Ministry said three Iraqi security guards at its embassy building in Baghdad — adjacent to the Red Crescent offices — were also kidnapped, but were later released.

The Red Crescent, which is part of the international Red Cross movement, has around 1,000 staff and some 200,000 volunteers in Iraq. It works closely with the International Committee of the Red Cross, which visits detainees and tries to provide food, water and medicine to Iraqis.

"We don't know who they are. We don't know why they did this," said Antonella Notari, a Red Cross spokeswoman in Geneva.

She also said the organization was in contact with the Iraqi Interior Ministry, which denied any involvement and had assured that they were searching for the abductees.

Mazin Abdellaha, secretary-general of the Iraqi Red Crescent, appealed to the kidnappers to release the captives.

"They represent a humanitarian agency that works for the general good, and this agency helps all people regardless of their sect or ethnicity," Abdellaha said.

At least half a dozen mass kidnappings have been carried out in the Iraqi capital this year, possibly by armed groups linked to the sectarian conflict between Sunnis and Shiites.

The abduction comes just days after the organization's vice president, Dr. Jamal al-Karbouli, said American forces represented a greater danger to its work than insurgents.

"The insurgents, they are Iraqis, a lot of them are Iraqis, and they respect the Iraqis. And they respect our (the Red Crescent's) identity, which is neutrality," al-Karbouli said Friday.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, said in response that the U.S.-led coalition forces "strive to ensure they are respectful when they conduct interaction with the local population."

On Thursday, gunmen in military uniforms kidnapped dozens of people in central Baghdad, police said. The attackers drove up to the busy Sanak area in about 10 sport utility vehicles and began rounding up shop owners and bystanders. Police said 50 to 70 people were abducted, but at least two dozen were later released.

On Sunday, the U.S. military said a roadside bomb killed three American soldiers and injured a fourth serviceman north of Baghdad. The soldiers were clearing a route so another unit could move through the area on Saturday, the military said in a statement.

The toll raised to 57 the number of Americans killed in Iraq in December. At least 2,945 members of the U.S. military have died since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

British and Iraqi troops in Basra are conducting a neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep aimed at rooting out weapons and militants and launching reconstruction projects. Its completion in the new year will likely trigger an announcement that Britain is slashing its troop numbers.

Britain has some 7,000 troops in Iraq, most based around the city of Basra in the south — the largest commitment of any country after the United States. More than 120 British personnel have died in the country since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 that ousted Saddam Hussein.

"The operation there for the Iraqi forces to take control of security of the city is going well," Blair said.

Late on Sunday afternoon, Blair flew to Basra to visit some of the troops stationed there.

"Our country and other countries like it are having to rediscover what it means to fight for what you believe in," Blair told the soldiers.

"You are not fighting a state, but fighting a set of ideas and ideologies, a group of extremists who share the same perspective," he said.

Among those killed in violence were two policeman, an Iraqi soldier and a municipal official in Baghdad; and a police officer in Kut, southeast of the capital.

Baghdad Red Crescent Workers Abducted (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

— Gunmen wearing Iraqi army uniforms kidnapped more than two dozen people from the Baghdad offices of the Red Crescent humanitarian group on Sunday, and the U.S. military announced the deaths of three more American soldiers.

The gunmen pulled up to the Red Crescent building near downtown Baghdad's Andalus Square about 11:30 a.m. in two police cars and 20 other cars, a spokesman for the aid organization said. Staff members thought the men were police and allowed them to enter the building, he said.

Once inside, the kidnappers separated men from women and abducted an estimated 28 men, according to the spokesman. The victims included Red Crescent staff, visitors and three guards from the Dutch Embassy, which has been vacated but still shares the office, he said.

Red Crescent staff called the Iraqi Interior and Defense ministries and were told neither had troops in the area, said the spokesman, who requested anonymity because of concerns for his safety.

"We do not suspect anyone, as we are a humanitarian organization that does no harm to any bloc," he said.

The Red Crescent, which is affiliated with the International Committee of the Red Cross, has about 1,000 staffers and 200,000 volunteers in Iraq, providing food, water and medicine.

The U.S. military announced Sunday that three U.S. soldiers stationed in Baghdad were killed Saturday by a roadside bomb while on a combat mission north of the capital.

Their deaths bring the U.S. military toll so far this month to at least 57, on pace to surpass the 69 tallied in November, according to www.icasualties.org, which tracks casualties in the conflict. In October, 106 American soldiers were killed, according to the website.

So far, the website shows, 2,946 American troops have been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion began in March 2003.

Commenting on the dire situation in the war-torn country, former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell said Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation" that a temporary increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, an idea under serious consideration by the White House, would probably not quell sectarian violence in Baghdad because U.S. forces are already overextended.

"The American army isn't large enough to secure Baghdad," said Powell, a retired Army general who served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the 1991 Persian Gulf War. "I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purposes of suppressing this communitarian violence, this civil war, will work."

But Tariq Hashimi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents, argued on CNN's "Late Edition" that more U.S. forces were needed in the Iraqi capital. "Iraqi troops, across the board, they are insufficient, incompetent and many of them [are] corrupted," said Hashimi, who met last week with President Bush.

The incoming Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said on ABC's "This Week" that he would support a U.S. troop increase "for two or three months ... [if] it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year."

Also on Sunday, British Prime Minister Tony Blair met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in Baghdad and then with British troops in the southern city of Basra. It was Blair's sixth visit to Iraq since 2003.

Blair commended Maliki's efforts to end sectarian violence and added that British troops would continue to train Iraqi soldiers and police "so that in time the Iraqi people can take full responsibility for their affairs." More than 7,000 British troops are in Iraq, primarily in the south.

During the 24 hours ending Sunday night, meanwhile, Baghdad police found 36 bodies. All of the victims had been shot several times; some had been handcuffed, blindfolded and tortured, according to the Interior Ministry.

Sunni Muslim militias killed at least one woman in attacks on two villages near Taji, about 12 miles north of Baghdad, Taji police said.

Militia members, mainly former fighters loyal to Saddam Hussein, had been sniping and firing mortar shells into the area for the last four days, the police said.

The insurgents set up makeshift checkpoints and burned a house in an effort to evict residents, police said, adding that the woman who was killed had refused to leave.

In the city of Iskandariya, about 25 miles south of Baghdad, two men were killed late Saturday after gunmen opened fire at them, according to a relative who delivered the victims' bodies to police Sunday.

In Hillah, a roadside bomb killed a soldier and injured another Sunday. The U.S. Consulate and an American base in the southern city were hit in a mortar attack, according to police.

Kidnappers Strike Red Crescent's Iraq Office (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 17 -- The kidnappers had left his father's cellphone on a wooden desk in the Iraqi Red Crescent Society office Sunday morning. But Wathiq Adnan did not know that as he stood in the front yard, his face as gloomy as the cold, rain-soaked sky.

Outside the compound, a cluster of police vehicles and four U.S. military Humvees were parked. They had arrived too late to stop the gunmen, who had worn police uniforms and carried police-issued guns, witnesses said.

Inside, a police intelligence officer was questioning Ayad al-Ikabi, a Red Crescent official.

"Were those who were kidnapped from different sects?" asked the official, who wore a dark suit.

"We are all mixed," replied Ikabi, who wore a black leather jacket and had a black pistol tucked into his belt.

Moments later, Ikabi and other officials walked into the two-story, oatmeal-colored office in an affluent section of Karrada, a neighborhood in central Baghdad. Adnan, who works at a different Red Crescent office, followed them.

It has become a familiar story in Baghdad. Gangs of gunmen, dressed in camouflage uniforms and driving official police vehicles, abduct dozens of employees in broad daylight, motivated by sectarian tensions, a bid for ransom or merely a desire to undermine a weak government unable to provide security for its citizens. They leave the women but take the men, then calmly drive off without firing a shot.

Almost the only difference Sunday was the target: a humanitarian organization, linked to the International Committee of the Red Cross, that has helped Iraqis cope in a nation that offers little comfort. The kidnappers took about 25 employees and a few visitors, employees said. The assault began at 11:30 a.m. and ended 15 minutes later.

The office is located in a part of the capital that is surrounded by checkpoints and concrete barriers largely because the Dutch Embassy is nearby. The gunmen also seized three embassy guards as they left.

"I don't know why this happened," Ikabi said before going into the office. "We are not connected to any sect or any political party."

The kidnappings took place less than a mile from Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri-al Maliki's residence in the fortified Green Zone, where al-Maliki met with British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Sunday. Blair, who made an unannounced visit to Baghdad, pledged to keep his country's troops in Iraq "until the job is done."

"Don't be under any doubt at all, British troops will remain until the job is done, and that job is building up the Iraqi capability," Blair said, echoing statements by President Bush about U.S. troops.

"I reiterated our determination to stand foursquare behind you and the Iraqi people in ensuring that your democracy is not destroyed by terrorism, by sectarianism, by those who wish to live in hatred rather than peace," Blair said.

DOJ_NMG_0107126

Asked about Sunday's kidnapping, and whether the United States and Britain were responsible for the security breakdown, Blair responded testily.

"Who is creating the difficulty in Iraq today?" he asked. "Who is creating the challenges? Who is creating the bloodshed? Terrorists and former supporters of Hussein who are trying to destroy Iraq's new democracy."

The mass abduction Sunday was the third in Baghdad in just over a month. On Thursday, gunmen rounded up about 25 shopkeepers in a busy commercial district. And on Nov. 15, 150 employees were seized from a Ministry of Higher Education agency in Karrada. In both cases, the gunmen wore police or military uniforms, witnesses said.

Abu Kara, whose shop is near the Red Crescent office, said several dusty sedans and pickup trucks with tinted black windows pulled up Sunday morning. Some of the gunmen wore camouflage uniforms while others were in civilian clothes, he said. He quickly stepped into his shop, he recalled, but a couple of gunmen ordered him and three other employees outside and told him to sit on a small white chair outside his store.

"They placed a Kalashnikov to my head," he said. "They were afraid we would use our cellphones to call for help."

The gunmen passed the tall walls of the compound and entered the office through a glass door. They broke down locked doors and sought out the men. According to Ikabi, they stole nothing. Then they left.

"They didn't fire a single shot," Abu Kara said.

Down a short corridor on the first floor, Adnan caught a glimpse of what he considers the important part of what had happened. He walked into the office used by his father, who was in charge of distributing the charity's drugs. On his desk were papers and orange folders, the signs of a busy day interrupted.

That's when Adnan spotted the gray-and-black cellphone with the silver key chain. It showed 12 missed calls.

He picked it up and stared at it. Then it rang.

Adnan answered.

The caller's voice was unfamiliar.

"Who are you? Whom have you called? Abu Wathiq?" Adnan asked.

The man said he was calling for his father.

"Tell me who you are." Adnan pressed, his voice growing frantic. "I am his son."

The man told him he was a friend of his father's.

Adnan said he would talk to him later. It wasn't the kidnappers.

Then his own phone started to ring. It was a relative. Adnan gave him directions to the Red Crescent office, then walked outside again in a daze.

"I have no idea who would do this," he said. "Only God knows."

"This is not personal," he added. "This is a general thing. It happens all the time in Iraq. There is no security. If there was security, would there be kidnappings?"

His phone rang again. Another relative. More directions.

Clutching his father's cellphone, Adnan walked to the road. Qasim Mahdi had arrived to search for his nephew, Falah, also kidnapped. Falah's sister, who had come with Mahdi, began to scream, then wail and beat her chest. Some local residents took her into their house to comfort her.

Outside, Mahdi raised his hands to the sky.

"Is there a government?" he asked, addressing no one in particular.

Down the street, past the police vehicles, Adnan's phone rang again.

'Unanswered Questions' Cloud Decisions On Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 18, 2006

The chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence says he has traveled to Iraq eight times to assess U.S. intelligence collection, and each time he returns to Washington struck by the lack of knowledge about the insurgency that is killing hundreds of American troops.

"When I come back from Iraq, or even a briefing here, you learn how tough intelligence is," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican. "I don't walk out of there believing that I've got a crystal-clear picture of what the insurgency is, what the scope of it is, what the magnitude is, what the capabilities are. How much is international? How much is external? How much is al Qaeda? How much is Iranian? How much is Syrian? I walk out with lots of unanswered questions."

The fact that U.S. command lacks broad knowledge about the enemy in Iraq, in the opinion of Mr. Hoekstra and others, has brought a steady stream of criticism.

Most recently, the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, reported, "Our government still does not understand very well either the insurgency in Iraq or the role of the militias."

The Iraq Study Group report said intelligence agencies "are not doing enough to map the insurgency, dissect it and understand it on a national and provincial level. The analytic community's knowledge of the organization, leadership, financing and operations of militias, as well as their relationship to government security forces, also falls far short of what policy-makers need to know."

Defense sources have told The Washington Times that when field commanders return to the U.S. from Iraq, one of their chief complaints is a lack on information about the enemy.

Michael Ledeen, a military analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, said the U.S. will never gain the full support of the Iraqi people, and thus better tips, until the locals are confident of a U.S. victory.

"For people to think we have a good chance to win, they have to see us beating Iran and Syria," said Mr. Ledeen, referring to the two countries supporting the insurgency. "We will never have the full cooperation of the people of Iraq until people see we are waging war against Iran and Syria."

He said the Bush administration, which is reviewing Iraq strategy, should start by helping foment insurrection against Iran's hard-line Islamic leaders and provide support to dissidents in Syria.

The Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency labeled as "inaccurate" the Iraq Study Group's assertion that the DIA had fewer than 10 analysts with more than two years of experience examining the insurgency. The agency said it has more than 300 analysts focused on Iraq, 49 of whom look exclusively at the insurgency.

"DIA is committed to providing the best possible military intelligence to the men and women in uniform and to the nation in its ongoing war against terrorism and extremism," the agency said.

Mr. Hoekstra is sympathetic toward the intelligence community's challenge in Iraq.

"I think you have to take a look at it two ways," he said. "You have to take a look at it and say, 'The intelligence may be terrible, but does that mean the intelligence capability is terrible?' It just may be very, very hard."

He added, "This is one of the things I do have an appreciation with the intelligence community on, is that the standard has been, the information you give us has to be as clear as 'two plus two is four.' Anything less than that gold standard of giving us perfect information means that the intelligence is terrible. ... Sometimes I sense that policy-makers believe if they get perfect information from intelligence, it gives them the answer as to what to do. That is not going to happen. You'll only have more or less information with which to make a decision."

Blair Urges Support For Iraq Government (AP)

By Jill Lawless

AP, December 18, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair took his Middle East peace tour to Iraq on Sunday, urging support for its fragile government and seeking to draw the violence-wracked country into his vision of a global battle against extremism.

Standing in front of a Lynx helicopter in a cavernous hangar, Blair told some of the 7,000 British troops serving in southern Iraq they were fighting on behalf of "people of tolerance and moderation" around the world.

"This is real conflict, real battle, and it is a different kind of enemy — not fighting a state, but fighting a set of ideas and ideologies, a group of extremists who share the same perspectives," Blair said. "What we need to try to do is build an alliance of moderate people against the extreme."

Blair is President Bush's staunchest ally in the Iraq war, and Britain has some 7,000 troops in Iraq, most based around Basra in the south. It's the largest troop commitment of any country after the United States.

During what has become an annual holiday-season visit to the region, Blair told troops that extremism was causing havoc in neighborhoods from Basra to London — a reference to the July 2005 transit bombings in the British capital that killed 52 people.

"The crazy thing about today's world is it actually comes back to our own streets," he said. "All over the world the same struggle is going on, and if we don't stand up and fight for the people of tolerance and moderation who want to live together, whatever their fate, then the people of hatred and sectarianism will triumph."

Battling extremism has been the theme of Blair's trip to the region, which has included stops in Turkey and Egypt. He arrived in Israel Sunday night, and will later travel to the Palestinian territories and the United Arab Emirates.

Blair's visit to Baghdad early Sunday was a surprise stop on his tour, designed to demonstrate support for the fragile attempts to halt Iraq's seemingly unstoppable bloodshed.

After meetings with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Blair urged the international community to ensure that democracy is not defeated by terrorism. But as he flew into the heavily fortified Green Zone aboard a military helicopter, news broke of the latest violent episode — a mass kidnapping carried out by gunmen in Iraqi army uniforms at the office of the Iraqi Red Crescent aid organization.

Blair insisted Iraq has made progress since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

"The first time I arrived in this country there was no proper functioning democracy. Today there is," Blair said at a joint news conference with al-Maliki. "Our task — ours, the Americans, the whole of the coalition, the international community and the Iraqis themselves — is to make sure that the forces of terrorism don't defeat the will of the people to have a democracy."

The trip — Blair's sixth to Iraq since the U.S.-led 2003 invasion — was not announced in advance for security reasons. The British leader also met with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and senior U.S. officials in Baghdad.

Iraq's Sunnis 'risk Ethnic Cleansing' (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, December 18, 2006

Vice-president Tariq al-Hashimi, Iraq's most senior politician from the Sunni Arab minority, said on Sunday that more US troops were needed in Baghdad to stop the "systematic cleansing" of the Sunni community by Shia militias.

Some 3,000 Iraqis were fleeing the country daily and Iraqi forces were insufficient, incompetent and corrupted, he said. There is intense speculation in Washington that President George W. Bush will propose "surging" some 30,000 more US troops into Iraq in a last-ditch effort to secure the city and Anbar province.

However, in an interview broadcast by CNN, Mr Hashimi said there was "no consensus" between the US and Iraq on how to tackle security. He also said the Bush administration had told him last week that US troops were "insufficient to handle the security as required in Baghdad".

Colin Powell, former secretary of state, agreed. "We have tried this surge of troops over the summer. I am not persuaded that another surge of troops into Baghdad for the purposes of suppressing this communitarian violence, this civil war, will work."

Saudis Report Shi'ite 'State' Inside Of Iraq (WT)

By Sharon Behn, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 18, 2006

Iran has effectively created a Shi'ite "state within a state" in neighboring Iraq, defying both Iraqi Sunnis and neighboring Sunni nations, according to a Saudi security report.

Iranian military forces are providing Shi'ite militias with weapons and training, Iranian charities are pouring funds into schools and hospitals, and Tehran is actively supporting pro-Iranian Iraqi politicians, the report said.

"Where the Americans have failed, the Iranians have stepped in," said the report by the Saudi National Security Assessment Project, a Riyadh-based consultancy commissioned by the Saudi government to provide security and intelligence assessments.

The report, submitted to the Saudi government in March, has not been publicly distributed.

Citing interviews with intelligence and military officials in Iraq and surrounding region, the report states that the Sunni insurgency numbers about 77,000, while the Shi'ite militia forces total about 35,000.

According to the report, Iran also is infiltrating Iraq through its al Quds forces -- the special command division of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) -- which specialize in intelligence operations in unconventional warfare.

RAND Corp. senior defense analyst Ed O'Connell said the Iranian intelligence was trying to counter Saddam Hussein's former formidable spy network, Iraqi Intelligence Service (IIS), or the Mukhabarat. Under Saddam's regime, he said, roughly one of every six Iraqi adults was a paid or unpaid informant -- a network that did not disappear with the arrival of the U.S.-led coalition.

"The real story in Iraq is this below-the-surface 'unconventional war' between the old IIS, which could become a more overt Saudi proxy -- and the al Quds special directorate intelligence-counterintelligence," Mr. O'Connell said.

The Saudi security report was directed by Nawaf Obaid -- who recently was fired for writing an article in The Washington Post warning that Saudi Arabia would not stand idly by and allow Iraq's Shi'ites to destroy its Sunni population.

DOJ_NMG_0107129

Washington diplomats and analysts say Mr. Obaid's dismissal was more window-dressing than a real punitive action.

The report states that the Iranian levers of influence in Iraq include a broad network of informants, military and logistical support of armed groups, and social welfare campaigns.

It adds that Tehran has "sought to influence Iraq's political process by giving support to new various parties, in particular, to the SCIRI," or Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the leading Shi'ite party.

Analysts say some Saudi citizens are raising funds for Sunni insurgents.

"I have heard them say it is not hard to line up a couple hundred thousand dollars and send it to the insurgents across the border," said Isobel Coleman, a senior fellow at the Council for Foreign Relations.

Despite claims by SCIRI leader that the party's private militia, the Iran-backed Badr Organization, formerly known as the Badr Brigade, has surrendered its weapons, gun-toting Badr members are still visible on the streets of Baghdad.

The Saudi study says the Badr Organization is still about 25,000-strong, and the party has roughly 3 million supporters. Anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, is thought to number just under 10,000, while his party has the support of about 1.5 million Shi'ites.

"Each of these groups is beholden in some way to Iran and has ties to its intelligence and security services," the report says.

It adds: "Recent intelligence indicates that IRGC officers are currently operating in Iraq certain Shi'ite militias and actual army and police units."

U.S. officials have acknowledged that Shi'ite militias have infiltrated the police, but stopped short of saying that there is direct Iranian involvement in the security forces.

Mrs. Coleman cautions that the report, while not necessarily inaccurate, is not impartial.

"It is alarmist about the Iranians, and Mr. Obaid comes with a bias. Not that it is wrong, but it is not unbiased," she said.

The Saudi study was the result of five months of cooperation with Iraq and neighboring countries and dozens of interviews with current military and intelligence officials in the region, Mr. Obaid wrote in the preface to the 40-page report.

"Ordinary police and military officers now have a stronger allegiance to the Badr Organization or the Mahdi Army than to their own units," the report says, adding that the Badr Organization is the "key vehicle Iran is using to achieve its military, security and intelligence aims."

The study also provides details on the Sunni insurgency. It cites Iraqi tribal leaders as saying that the insurgency is run mainly by former commanders and high-level military officers of the Ba'athist regime. Only a smaller group is religiously inspired and includes foreign fighters.

Of the 77,000 active members of the insurgency, the "jihadis" number about 17,000, of which some 5,000 are from North Africa, Sudan, Yemen, Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

The remaining 60,000 are members of the former military or Saddam's paramilitary Fedayeen forces. The officer corps of the insurgency has "command and control facilities in Syria as well as bases in strategic locations, where Sunnis constitute the majority of the urban population."

Given the centuries-old tribal, familial and religious ties between Iraq's Sunnis and Saudi Arabia, the assessment concludes that "Saudi Arabia has a special responsibility to ensure the continued welfare and security of Sunnis in Iraq."

Its recommendations to the Saudi government included a comprehensive strategy that would include overt and covert components to deal with the worst-case scenario of full-blown civil war.

It also calls on the government to communicate the assessment to the United States; make it clear to Iran that if its covert activities did not stop the Saudi leadership would counter them; and extend an invitation to the highest Iraqi Shi'ite leader, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, to reassure the Shi'ite community.

Clandestine Military Teams Clash With CIA, Allies (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Special Forces teams sent overseas on secret spying missions have clashed with the CIA and carried out operations in countries that are staunch U.S. allies, prompting a new effort by the agency and the Pentagon to tighten the rules for military units engaged in espionage, according to senior U.S. intelligence and military officials.

DOJ_NMG_0107130

The spy missions are part of a highly classified program that officials say has better positioned the United States to track terrorist networks and capture or kill enemy operatives in regions such as the Horn of Africa, where weak governments are unable to respond to emerging threats.

But the initiative has also led to several embarrassing incidents for the United States, including a shootout in Paraguay and the exposure of a sensitive intelligence operation in East Africa, according to current and former officials familiar with the matter. And to date, the Special Forces espionage effort has not led to the capture of a significant terrorism suspect.

Some intelligence officials have complained that Special Forces teams have sometimes launched missions without informing the CIA, duplicating or even jeopardizing existing operations. And they questioned deploying military teams in friendly nations -- including in Europe -- at a time when combat units are in short supply in war zones.

The program was approved in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks by Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, and is expected to get close scrutiny by his successor, Robert M. Gates, who takes over Monday and has been critical of the expansion of the military's intelligence operations.

Senior officials at the CIA and the Pentagon defended the program and said they would urge Gates to support it. But they acknowledged risks for the United States in its growing reliance on Special Forces troops and other military units for espionage.

"We are at war out there and frankly we need all the help that we can get," said Marine Maj. Gen. Michael E. Ennis, who since February has served as a senior CIA official in charge of coordinating human intelligence operations with the military. "But at the same time we have to be very careful that we don't disrupt established relationships with other governments, with their liaison services, or [do] anything that would embarrass the United States."

Ennis acknowledged "really egregious mistakes" in the program, but said collaboration has improved between the CIA and the military.

"What we are seeing now, primarily, are coordination problems," Ennis said in an interview with the Los Angeles Times. "And really, they are fewer and fewer."

The issue underscores the sensitivity of using elite combat forces for espionage missions that have traditionally been the domain of the CIA.

After Sept. 11, the Bush administration gave expanded authority to the Special Operations Command, which oversees the Army Green Berets, Navy SEALs and other elite units, in the fight against terrorism. At the same time, Rumsfeld, who lacked confidence in the CIA, directed a major expansion of the military's involvement in intelligence gathering to make the Pentagon less dependent on the agency.

Officials said this led to the secret deployment of small teams of Special Forces troops, known as military liaison elements, or MLEs, to American embassies to serve as intelligence operatives. Members of the teams undergo special training in espionage at Ft. Bragg and other facilities, according to officials familiar with the program.

The troops typically work in civilian clothes and function much like CIA case officers, cultivating sources in other governments or Islamic organizations. One objective, officials said, is to generate information that could be used to plan clandestine operations such as capturing or killing terrorism suspects.

In a written response to questions from the Times, a spokesman for the Special Operations Command in Tampa, Fla., described MLEs as "individuals or small teams that deploy in support of (regional military commanders) in select countries, and always with the U.S. ambassador and country team's concurrence and support."

But critics point to a series of incidents in recent years that have caused diplomatic problems for the United States.

In 2004, members of an MLE team operating in Paraguay shot and killed an armed assailant who tried to rob them outside a bar, said former intelligence officials familiar with the incident. U.S. officials removed the members of the team from the country, the officials said.

In another incident, members of a team in East Africa were arrested by the local government after their espionage activity was discovered.

"It was a compromised surveillance activity," said a former senior CIA official familiar with the incident. The official said members of the unit "got rolled up by locals and we got them out." The former official declined to name the country or provide other details.

He said it was an isolated example of an operation that was exposed, but that coordination problems were frequent.

"They're pretty freewheeling," the former CIA official said of the military teams. It was not uncommon, he said, for CIA station chiefs to learn of military intelligence operations only after they were underway, and that many conflicted with existing operations being carried out by the CIA or the foreign country's intelligence service.

DOJ_NMG_0107131

Such problems "really are quite costly," said John Brennan, who was director of the National Counterterrorism Center before retiring from government last year. "It can cost peoples' lives, can cost sensitive programs and can set back foreign policy interests."

Brennan declined to comment on specific incidents.

There have also been questions about where teams have been sent. Although conceived to bolster the U.S. presence in global trouble spots, the units have carried out operations in friendly nations in Europe and Southeast Asia where it is more difficult to justify, officials said.

On at least one occasion, a team tracked an Islamic militant in Europe. "They were trying to acquire certain information about a certain individual," said a former high-ranking U.S. intelligence official who spoke on condition of anonymity. The official declined to name the country, but said it was a NATO ally and that the host government was unaware of the mission.

Critics said such operations risk angering U.S. allies with a dubious prospect for payoff. In some countries where MLE teams are located, "There's not a chance ... we're going to send somebody in there to snatch somebody unilaterally," said a government official familiar with the program.

At a time when the military is stretched thin, the official questioned the priority of using Special Forces for espionage, noting that the MLE program has not produced a significant success in terms of disrupting a plot or capturing a terrorist suspect.

"These are a highly trained, short-supply resource of the U.S. government," the official said. "What ... are they doing there instead of Pakistan or Afghanistan?"

Gates, the former director of the CIA poised to run the Pentagon, has voiced concern over the military's encroachment on CIA missions. In an opinion piece published this year, Gates said that "more than a few CIA veterans, including me, are unhappy about the dominance of the Defense Dept. in the intelligence arena and the decline in the CIA's central role."

In response to such conflicts, the administration previously designated the CIA director as the head of all U.S. human-spying operations overseas, with CIA station chiefs serving as coordinators in specific countries.

Ennis, whose position at the CIA was created last year, said the agency and the Pentagon are developing a more rigorous system for screening proposed military intelligence operations.

"Like a pilot with a checklist," CIA station chiefs will be required to sign off on all aspects of a proposed military intelligence operation before it is allowed to proceed, Ennis said. The CIA station chief, he added, "would look at the risk in terms of embarrassment to the government. Do they have the right level of training to do what they claim that they want to do, and is this already being done somewhere else?"

Col. Samuel Taylor, director of public affairs for the Special Operations Command, dismissed the suggestion of coordination problems with other agencies, saying, "We have an excellent, effective and productive working relationship with the CIA."

France To Pull Troops Fighting Against Taliban In Afghanistan (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

PARIS, Dec. 17 (AP) — France announced on Sunday that it intended to withdraw its approximately 200 troops, all of them special forces, from a southern Afghan city, where they are taking part with NATO troops in a counterinsurgency operation.

Despite the strong engagement by 32,800 NATO troops, fighters allied with the country's former Taliban rulers have been gaining strength.

France has been reluctant to have its forces in Afghanistan, a total of 1,100 troops, serve outside the relatively safe Afghan capital, Kabul. The decision would remove elite troops based in the southeastern city of Jalalabad.

"There is a general reorganization" of the French troops, Defense Minister Michèle Alliot-Marie said during a visit to Afghanistan. Her remarks were broadcast on France-Info radio.

Among planned changes is a "withdrawal of special forces from Jalalabad in the coming weeks," she said.

The NATO contingent will remain in Afghanistan, Capt. Sébastien Caron, the Defense Ministry press officer, said in Paris.

On Saturday, Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said that Afghan, American, Canadian, British and Dutch forces had done most of the fighting in Afghanistan over the past year at a time when ambushes, suicide bombings and other attacks had multiplied. Those nations have also borne the brunt of the casualties. Senator McCain called on NATO nations to send troops into more dangerous areas of Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0107132

The violence in Afghanistan this year has been the heaviest since the fall of the Taliban, in late 2001, with especially heavy fighting in the southern part of the country, and suicide attacks and roadside bombs.

The elite French troops have been deployed in southeastern Afghanistan since July 2003 to help in the fight against fighters believed to be linked to Al Qaeda and the Taliban and to help search for Al Qaeda's leader, Osama bin Laden.

Captain Caron said the decision to withdraw the special forces was made "in concert with our partners, notably the Americans."

Ms. Alliot-Marie said that France intended to maintain its air power, "which has backed up coalition forces numerous times," and that it was adding two helicopters in the zone between Jalalabad and Kabul.

She said that France also planned to train Afghan special forces "because it appears important to us that the Afghans see that it is their own forces which are retaking the theater" of war.

French Unit To Leave Afghanistan (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

PARIS, Dec. 17 -- France on Sunday announced the withdrawal of its 200-member contingent of elite special forces from Afghanistan -- all of its ground forces directly engaged in anti-terrorism operations in the country.

The elite troops have been deployed in Afghanistan since July 2003 to help bolster the fight against al-Qaeda and the Taliban militia.

A contingent of 1,100 French troops deployed under NATO command will remain in the capital, Kabul, Capt. Sebastien Caron, press officer for the French Defense Ministry, said in Paris.

Defense Minister Michele Alliot-Marie, on a visit to Afghanistan, announced "a general reorganization" of troops that includes a "withdrawal of special forces from Jalalabad in the coming weeks." Her remarks were aired on France-Info radio.

The decision comes during a resurgence by the Taliban, which has stepped up its attacks on NATO's International Security Assistance Force in recent months.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said Saturday that Afghan, U.S., Canadian, British and Dutch forces have done most of the fighting over the past year, as ambushes, suicide bombings and other attacks have multiplied.

Air War Costs NATO Afghan Supporters (CSM)

By Rachel Morarjee

The Christian Science Monitor, December 18, 2006

At a large gathering with Afghan President Hamid Karzai in this southern city last Tuesday, Abdul Ghafar sat among hundreds in the audience, clutching a piece of paper. On it were the names of 20 members of his family killed two months ago in a NATO airstrike.

"This was my uncle's family. Eleven children, six women, and three innocent men were killed. He lost everyone but one small girl," he said. Mr. Ghafar was hoping to receive compensation from the Afghan government. "We got nothing," he said.

Ghafar's extended family in the southern Panjwai district are among the nearly 4,000 people killed since the beginning of 2006 in a Taliban resurgence that is using civilians as human shields against escalating NATO air attacks.

The US-based Human Rights Watch estimates that more than 1,000 of those killed were civilians. A recent spate of suicide bombings here has stoked public anger even further.

The increased violence has left NATO generals begging for more troop contributions from reluctant member nations. Just Sunday, the French defense minister announced plans to withdraw the 200 special forces troops deployed under US command in southeastern Afghanistan.

But with so few boots on the ground, the increased reliance on air power has led to thousands of civilian deaths. The devastating air offenses are undermining support for the Afghan government, say human rights workers and Afghan officials, and are turning public opinion in the four southern provinces of Afghanistan against NATO forces, who took command of the south from the US in August.

The US Air Force dropped 987 bombs between June and November and fired some 146,000 cannon rounds as air support for NATO allies in the south. US aircraft fired more bombs in the first six months of this year than in the first three years of its campaign against the Taliban, according to figures released by the Pentagon.

President Karzai's meeting last Tuesday of NATO and US generals, ambassadors, and Afghan ministers in Kandahar - southern Afghanistan's largest city and a former Taliban stronghold - was an attempt to examine better methods for tackling the insurgency and curbing civilian deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0107133

But even as top military officials met, NATO troops posted at a checkpoint in Kandahar shot and killed a local tribal elder who was driving a motorbike. The man had failed to heed warning signals as he drove to the meeting with Karzai.

The Tuesday visit came three days after Karzai wept openly on national television about his helplessness to protect the Afghan people from US, NATO, and Taliban violence.

"We can't prevent the coalition from bombing the terrorists, and our children are dying because of that," he said with tears in his eyes during a speech to mark International Human Rights Day, Dec. 10. At the Kandahar meeting, Karzai saved some of his harshest criticism for his Pakistani neighbors, a country he says has been actively helping the Taliban.

"The problem is not Taliban, we don't see it that way," Karzai told reporters. "The problem is with Pakistan."

"NATO's strategy has eroded support for its mission as well as for Karzai - nothing could be more telling than Karzai weeping and complaining about NATO killing Afghan civilians," says Sam Zia-Zarifi, Asia research director for Human Rights Watch.

"We are extremely worried - it hurts us, it hurts Afghan civilians. We are worried by it, NATO is also worried by it, and we are working together to reduce such casualties," President Karzai told reporters in Kandahar. "We know that is damaging to our image, and more importantly we do not want to harm innocent people."

In contrast to the US, NATO has no unified approach to compensating civilians killed during fighting, instead placing the financial burden on the individual nations engaged in the fiercest fighting in the south: Canada, Britain, the Netherlands, and Romania.

By providing much-needed financial aid for the families of victims killed by airstrikes, the Taliban has been able to garner support in the southern provinces, says Sarah Holewinski of the Campaign for Innocent Victims in Conflict (CIVIC), a Washington-based human rights group.

"If NATO doesn't find a way to win the trust and support of the Afghan people, the Taliban will," she says. "In fact they already are."

Fighting against Taliban insurgents who are dressed in civilian clothes and hidden among the civilian population is a difficult task. But the sharp escalation in violence has many southern Afghans asking whether NATO troops are making their lives safer or, ultimately, more dangerous.

Many Afghans in Kandahar say that they would prefer NATO convoys to avoid the city, because they act as magnets for suicide bombs and the NATO soldiers tend to shoot indiscriminately into crowds.

"When we see a military convoy coming we stop our car and leave it where it is. We run and we hide," says Neamatullah, who fled his village in the nearby Panjwai suburb after NATO airstrikes in May killed dozens of civilians. "Both sides are fighting each other for power," he says. "But our lives and homes are ruined."

DOJ:

Conservatives' Grip On Key Virginia Court Is At Risk (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

A growing list of vacancies on the federal appeals court in Richmond is heightening concern among Republicans that one of the nation's most conservative and influential courts could soon come under moderate or even liberal control, Republicans and legal scholars say.

A number of prominent Republican appointees have left or announced plans to leave the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which has played a key role in terrorism cases and has long been known for forceful conservative rulings and judicial personalities.

Republican concerns also are fueled by the pending Democratic takeover of Congress, as several of President Bush's 4th Circuit nominees were already bottled up in the Senate when Republicans ran it. From the GOP's perspective, the situation now will worsen.

The 4th Circuit's rulings affect everyone who lives, works or owns a business in the area, which encompasses Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia and the Carolinas. The court's influence also has been widely felt nationally, and the emerging battle over it is part of a broader struggle for control of the federal judiciary.

"I think everyone is concerned because the 4th Circuit literally hangs in the balance here," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative American Center for Law and Justice, who has advised the White House on judicial nominees. "With the nature of the cases the court has been taking, especially on the terrorism issue, its direction is really critical."

Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice, said the new political landscape will force Bush to work closely with Democrats "to pick fair and open-minded judges who don't lean either to the right or the left" if he wants to get the administration's nominees confirmed. "If there were any way to appoint judges to move the 4th Circuit in a more moderate direction, that would be beneficial to both the circuit and to the country," she said.

The 15-member court has three vacancies, and a fourth judgeship will open in July. That would leave the bench with six Republican and five Democratic appointees by summer. In addition, one of those six Republican appointees has announced plans to take senior status as soon as a replacement can be confirmed. Senior judges receive full pay and hear cases but can take a reduced workload and are not considered active-service members of the court.

Some of the 4th Circuit's best-known rulings, upheld by the Supreme Court, include striking down a law allowing rape victims to sue their attackers in federal court and preventing the Food and Drug Administration from regulating tobacco.

In 1999, the 4th Circuit overturned the requirement that police read suspects their rights before interrogating them. The Supreme Court later reaffirmed the Miranda rights.

During the Bush administration, the 4th Circuit has been the court of choice on national security, issuing key rulings that backed the government on the detention of enemy combatants and the prosecution of Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. The court's conservative majority has included some of the nation's most prominent judges, including J. Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson III.

Jan LaRue, chief counsel for Concerned Women for America, said she and other conservatives are disappointed with Bush and Senate Republicans for not pushing harder to fill the vacancies before losing control of the Senate.

"Now all they've done is managed to kick the can down the road, and we've lost the majority," said LaRue, whose group advocates for conservative jurists. "That circuit in the wrong hands could certainly move toward the center-left."

White House officials blamed Senate Democrats for the logjam. "The president has nominated several highly qualified people to fill vacancies on the 4th Circuit, and the Democrats have succeeded in each instance in blocking them," White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said. "We will continue to work to find highly qualified nominees and look forward to their confirmations."

The overall struggle for control of the federal courts is expected to grow even fiercer as Democrats take charge of the Senate with a razor-thin majority, assuming that Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), who has been hospitalized in recent days, continues in office. Although some conservatives blame Bush for failing to reshape the lower courts as effectively as he has the Supreme Court, others are joining him in aiming frustration at Democrats, who have used their minority power to block 4th Circuit and other appointments.

A victory by a Democrat in the 2008 presidential election, Republicans and legal experts say, could accelerate a philosophical shift in the court. "Imagine the people Hillary Clinton would appoint to the 4th Circuit," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond.

The first of the current 4th Circuit vacancies has lingered since 1994, when Judge J. Dickson Phillips Jr. took senior status. Bush's nominee, U.S. District Judge Terrence W. Boyle Jr., has not overcome strong Democratic opposition.

In 2000, Judge Francis D. Murnaghan Jr. died. Bush nominated Virginia conservative Claude A. Allen in 2003, but he also was blocked by Democrats. Allen later resigned as Bush's top domestic policy adviser and pleaded guilty to shoplifting charges. Bush has not nominated anyone else for that vacancy.

Conservatives were then shocked when Luttig resigned in May to take a top corporate job at Boeing Co. Bush has nominated no one to replace him. Chief Judge William W. Wilkins Jr., a Ronald Reagan appointee who was the first chairman of the U.S. Sentencing Commission, recently announced that he will take senior status in July, creating a fourth vacancy. The new chief judge will be Karen Williams of South Carolina, the court's first female chief judge. She was appointed by President George H.W. Bush.

Another Republican appointee, H. Emory Widener Jr., 83, is planning to take senior status when his successor is confirmed. But Bush's nominee, Pentagon general counsel William J. Haynes II, has drawn strong opposition from Democrats and even from Republican Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.).

Even though the 11 judges who would remain by summer are split 6-5 in favor of Republican appointees, some court observers say that Democrats might gain effective control because Judge Allyson K. Duncan often votes with the court's moderate-to-liberal bloc. She was appointed by Bush in 2003, with strong support from John Edwards, a former Democratic senator from North Carolina and vice presidential candidate.

Yet predicting the court's precise direction is difficult. University of Pittsburgh law professor Arthur Hellman, for example, said two Clinton appointees -- judges William B. Traxler Jr. and Robert B. King -- are "fairly conservative."

DOJ_NMG_0107135

Hellman and some Republicans expressed surprise that Bush has not moved to fill Luttig's seat and keeps renominating Boyle and Haynes when they couldn't win confirmation in a Republican-led Senate.

Federal Rules Make Storing E-mail Mandatory (MH)

By Thomas J. Meeks

The Miami Herald, December 18, 2006

If your business is sued for copyright infringement, restraint of trade or employment discrimination, having a means in place to track electronic data is critical to successfully defending the case. Otherwise, you're likely to lose -- and pay hefty damages -- even before stepping into a federal courtroom.

On Dec. 1, new federal rules went into effect creating a legal obligation for Florida business owners to store their e-mail messages and other electronic documents for use on demand. The rules are mandatory in all federal cases, including copyright or trademark infringement matters, securities or antitrust claims, cases involving the Americans with Disabilities Act and other employment lawsuits.

Under the new rules, both parties in a lawsuit must disclose their electronically stored information, along with any other materials they plan to use to prove their cases.

That means Florida business owners need to know exactly what information is stored on their networks, individual computers and electronic archives -- and how that information can be used to support their legal position.

Small-business owners can no longer use the excuse that they have not been able to go through their e-mail archives in time for the initial disclosures.

Therefore, the failure to produce information may prevent business owners from using that information, which may be the best evidence in their favor at the trial.

What should you do as a small-business owner? Consult with legal counsel in advance rather than waiting to respond to a lawsuit and risk having important evidence excluded from your case. A lawyer will institute litigation hold procedures to preserve relevant electronic information if your business becomes the target of a lawsuit or if you file a lawsuit as the plaintiff. Holding and reviewing electronic data does not necessarily mean every file is delivered to the opposing attorney. That depends on the legal strategy in the case. But preserving electronic data prevents the opposing attorney from arguing that the business owner allowed vital evidence to be destroyed.

Florida's small-business owners must understand that all the e-mails and electronic files transmitted through their company's network and the Internet are now potential evidence in a federal lawsuit. Having effective processes in place to preserve and access this data is now one of the fundamental elements of any successful courtroom strategy.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ethics Hurdle Corruption Scandal At Siemens May Derail Restructuring Drive (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

FRANKFURT -- When turnaround artist Klaus Kleinfeld became chief executive of storied German conglomerate Siemens AG in early 2005, he vowed to shake things up.

Nearly two years later, Mr. Kleinfeld finds himself under intense pressure, haunted by his company's past. A widening money-laundering and bribery investigation is shining a harsh spotlight on management and threatening to unravel his aggressive restructuring drive.

Europe's largest engineering company said last week it has found about half a billion dollars in suspicious transactions spanning the past seven years -- twice the amount German authorities flagged in November after more than 200 police raided the offices and homes of employees. Prosecutors in Germany, Italy and Switzerland suspect company officials were running an elaborate network of secret bank accounts and sham consulting contracts to bribe potential customers, and more managers and employers could face arrest as the investigation continues. If authorities find that Siemens didn't do enough to thwart the alleged scheme -- or that senior management condoned it -- the company could face costly lawsuits and bans on lucrative public-sector contracts.

The cross-border investigation is focusing on alleged wrongdoing at the financially troubled telecommunications unit, the same unit Mr. Kleinfeld has been trying to dismantle rapidly to boost profits. That effort was thrown further into doubt last week after Siemens and Nokia Corp. of Finland, citing the criminal probe, said they would delay the planned merger1 of their network carrier businesses, which will have combined revenue of $12.23 billion.

Prosecutors say Mr. Kleinfeld is a witness in the fraud investigation, not a suspect. But the scandal represents the latest and biggest distraction for the 49-year-old executive. He spent much of the autumn wrestling with fallout from an ill-timed salary hike and a messy divestment that brought a barrage of criticism from unions and politicians. It also raises serious questions about oversight at the company, which books more than $100 billion in annual revenue.

The mounting challenges for Mr. Kleinfeld at the helm of the 159-year-old concern highlight how tough it is to push through radical change in corporate Germany, where a manager's hands often are tied by a culture of consensus and traditions don't die easily. The challenge may be particularly acute at Siemens, which is involved in huge infrastructure projects around the world and has faced a series of corruption allegations involving overseas sales practices.

Mr. Kleinfeld told investors in a conference call last week that Siemens had beefed up its compliance procedures in recent years. Still, he acknowledged the suspicious transactions that have been uncovered thus far are "quite staggering" and that Siemens needs to do more. "I want to make one thing crystal clear here: There is a zero tolerance policy by the management," he said.

Though his job is not seen to be in immediate jeopardy, Mr. Kleinfeld has been increasingly subjected to public criticism in recent weeks -- a far cry from two years ago, when a German magazine christened him "Wonder Boy" on its cover.

Mr. Kleinfeld, who declined to be interviewed for this article, was raised in working-class surroundings of the Bremen shipyards in northern Germany. He made his biggest mark in New York City, where he headed Siemens's U.S. unit from 2002 until the end of 2003 and quickly brought the huge, money-losing operation into the black by shuttering divisions and slashing more than 10,000 jobs. "It was kind of brutal, but it was exciting," recalls Scott Moyer, a former Siemens executive in the U.S. "We really wonder if he slept."

Mr. Kleinfeld didn't slow down when he returned to the head office in Munich in January of 2005 to succeed Heinrich von Pierer. He vowed that each of the company's dozen units -- which make everything from medical scanners and steam turbines to high-speed trains and light bulbs -- would meet ambitious profit margin targets by the spring of 2007 to finally bring them in line with top industry peers. Soon after, Mr. Kleinfeld announced that 5,400 jobs at the information-technology unit -- more than 10% of the unit's work force -- would be cut, including 2,400 jobs in Germany.

He moved quickly to reshape the company's portfolio to better capitalize on what he calls "megatrends" of the 21st century: growing urbanization, dwindling resources and aging populations. The company made a string of acquisitions in areas like medical diagnostics, water-filtration systems and clean-energy technologies.

At the same time Mr. Kleinfeld brought the ax down on the sacred -- if sickly -- cow of Siemens: its money-losing telecom-equipment unit. The division, Siemens's biggest, was embedded in the DNA of a company that started out making telegraphs. Shutting down entire divisions in Germany, where workers enjoy strong protections and can demand hefty severance packages, also is difficult and costly. He paid Taiwan's BenQ Corp. to take the struggling wireless-handset business off his hands last year.

He took an even bigger step in June of this year, agreeing to fold most of the remainder of the telecom business into a 50-50 joint venture with Nokia. After that deal and the planned sale of its enterprise networks business, which supplies telecom equipment to corporate clients, the rest of Siemens's telecom operations will be absorbed by other parts of the company.

In the process, Mr. Kleinfeld, who reports to a supervisory board of shareholder and labor representatives, antagonized workers at a company that is one of Germany's biggest employers. He sent emails in English to workers who quickly came to regard him as a ruthless American-style capitalist only interested in the company's bottom line and its share price. "Morale is very low," says Wolfgang Müller, a union representative on Siemens's supervisory board. "A lot of workers feel that no job, no business within the company is safe anymore."

Dissatisfaction bubbled over in September, when workers learned that Mr. Kleinfeld and other members of the management board would receive a 30% salary increase. A few days later, BenQ Mobile, the handset unit that Siemens had unloaded a year earlier, filed for bankruptcy. Labor leaders accused Siemens of not having done enough to protect the unit's 3,000 German workers during the sale process.

The political firestorm quickly spread. The country's best-selling tabloid published a picture of a grinning Mr. Kleinfeld on its cover alongside the headline "The Ruinator." Chancellor Angela Merkel urged Siemens to step in with help. Trying to quell the criticism, Siemens announced it would set up a $26.75 million fund to benefit workers at the unit -- even though the unit no longer belonged to Siemens.

Mr. Kleinfeld, acknowledging executives had been "put in a corner," said the management board also would forgo its salary increase. Siemens has set aside another $26.75 million for the fund since then -- and could be on the hook for more.

DOJ_NMG_0107137

At the company's annual news conference in November, Mr. Kleinfeld complained of being "attacked from left and right" in the German media over the pay hike and BenQ. "It's clearly a German phenomenon we have," Mr. Kleinfeld said.

He also delivered some good news: Net profit in the fiscal quarter ended Sept. 30 soared eightfold to $469.3 million as restructuring costs eased and signs of a turnaround surfaced. "2007 will be a good year for Siemens," he predicted. Investors were pleased with the result. The company's share price, long an underperformer among Germany's blue-chip stocks, rose 3% that day.

The following week, German police, responding to information gathered by authorities in other countries, raided about 30 offices and homes of current and former Siemens employees. Police seized 36,000 documents. Prosecutors have since arrested more than half a dozen suspects as they try to determine the scope of the alleged wrongdoing and how far up the corporate ladder it traveled. Siemens says it is cooperating fully with authorities. It attributes the alleged wrongdoing to "individual acts," adding that it appears confined to the telecom unit.

Prosecutors in Italy and Liechtenstein say Siemens tried to halt their inquiries in 2004, when they approached the company about suspicious transactions. Cuno Tarfusser, an Italian prosecutor, says Siemens filed repeated motions to block the review of bank data from an account in Austria involving about $75 million in transactions. On the company's balance sheet, the payments appeared to be for consulting fees -- but no consulting work was done, according to prosecutors.

Police searched Mr. Kleinfeld's office as part of the broader raid. He recently hired a high-profile lawyer to advise him on the investigation. Among those jailed thus far are Thomas Ganswindt, a former management board member who left Siemens at the end of September, and Michael Kutschenreuter, a former chief financial officer at the telecom unit who was heading Siemens's real-estate division at the time of his arrest.

Lawyers for the two men would not make them available for comment. Michael Rosenthal, a lawyer for Mr. Ganswindt, said his client is in jail "because he refuses to tell prosecutors what they wanted to hear." Mr. Rosenthal said his plans to appeal the detention could take months.

Mr. von Pierer, who became chairman of the supervisory board after running Siemens for nearly 13 years, is also feeling the heat. Some corporate-governance advocates have called on him to resign, citing a conflict of interest between his oversight role on the supervisory board and his position as chief executive when much of the alleged fraud occurred. Mr. von Pierer has rejected those calls2.

Siemens is no stranger to corruption scandals. In March, German prosecutors charged two former employees of the power-generation unit of offering $4.6 million in bribes to win Italian natural-gas contracts. U.S. authorities indicted a medical unit of Siemens in January, accusing the subsidiary of forming a sham business with a minority firm to win a $49 million contract from an Illinois hospital system. Last year, a United Nations-appointed panel accused three Siemens subsidiaries of paying $1.6 million in kickbacks tied to the U.N.'s oil-for-food program in Iraq.

The German case is pending after Siemens reached a financial settlement in Milan earlier this year without admitting or denying guilt. A Siemens spokesman said that the company hasn't uncovered any wrongdoing in the oil-for-food program, and that the indictment in Illinois is unjustified.

The current investigation dwarfs earlier accusations of wrongdoing -- and threatens to damage Germany's reputation as a clean place to do business. Corruption allegations recently have hit other corporate titans such as auto maker DaimlerChrysler AG, which is being investigated by U.S. authorities for alleged bribes and has acknowledged making "improper payments." German authorities say documented cases of white-collar crimes rose 10% in 2005.

The German chapter of corruption watchdog Transparency International suspended Siemens's membership two years ago and last week moved to expel the company, an unusual step. While the U.S. outlawed the bribing of foreign officials in 1978, German companies were allowed to write off bribes as expenses until as recently as 1999. "I think Siemens is deficient," says Joachim Schwalbach, a professor at Humboldt University's Institute of Management in Berlin. "They're not best in class."

One complicating factor for Mr. Kleinfeld was his role at the telecom business at the center of the scandal. After returning to Munich from the U.S. in 2004, he was given special oversight of the telecom business. He held that role for nine months, before handing it over to Mr. Ganswindt, who earlier had been responsible for day-to-day operations of the unit.

In a conference call with investors last week, Mr. Kleinfeld was asked how such large suspicious payments could have been missed. He said the alleged fraud at the unit started a few years before his arrival and that he was focused in 2004 on the strategic restructuring of the business, which he described as "a colossal task."

Still, he acknowledged the suspicious transactions uncovered thus far are "quite staggering" and that Siemens needs to do more.

Siemens recently hired an ombudsman and retained a law firm to conduct an independent inquiry into the company's financial controls. KPMG, Siemens's longtime auditor, is cooperating with prosecutors as a witness. Siemens also has hired Michael Hershman, a co-founder of Transparency International, as a compliance adviser. He is acting as a private consultant.

The scandal could have serious financial repercussions for Siemens, which lists its shares in Frankfurt and on the New York Stock Exchange. In a regulatory filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission last week, the company warned that the SEC and U.S. Department of Justice may launch investigations of their own to determine if the company broke U.S. laws. It also warned that proof of wrongdoing could have "a material adverse effect" on its business if foreign governments ban Siemens from competing for public-sector contracts.

As a result of the scandal, Siemens announced $128.4 million in deferred and current income-tax charges for the past seven years and restated its net income for the most recent fiscal year ended September, lowering it by $55.8 million, to $2.29 billion.

A tie-up between Siemens and Nokia to create the world's third-largest supplier of equipment to telecom carriers behind Alcatel-Lucent of France and Telefon AB LM Ericsson of Sweden will have to wait. The companies said last week they now expect to close the transaction in the first quarter of 2007 instead of Jan. 1 as originally planned. The merger is subject to a follow-up agreement based "on the results and consequences" of a compliance review by Siemens, they added.

The scandal also complicates Siemens's recent efforts to sell a majority stake in its unprofitable enterprise networks business. That business isn't included in the planned venture with Nokia and has a bit more than $2.29 billion in annual revenue.

Despite the uncertainty, investors haven't jumped ship. Many still believe that Mr. Kleinfeld is making the right moves and that the company's net income should keep climbing on the back of recent restructuring steps. Safa Muhtaseb, a portfolio manager at Brandywine Global Investment Management in Philadelphia, believes the investigation is likely contained and that the turnaround is progressing. But he also recognizes it could take time. "You can't unwind some of the decisions that took years, and in some cases decades, to make," says Mr. Muhtaseb, whose firm owns shares in Siemens.

The share price of Siemens has climbed 20% since Mr. Kleinfeld became chief executive -- far less than the 56% surge in Germany's blue-chip DAX stock index over the same period.

Did Ann Baskins See No Evil At HP? (LAW)

By Sue Reisinger

Law.com, December 18, 2006

A disheveled Ann Baskins stood on Sept. 28 before a congressional committee investigating the Hewlett-Packard Co. spying scandal. Baskins' eyes were puffy, her face wan, her forehead deeply lined, and her usually neatly kept hair was pulled back and askew. Just hours earlier she had made the painful decision to resign as general counsel of the giant computer company.

Standing before the committee, she held her right hand in the air and swore to tell the truth. Then, on the first question, Baskins exercised her Fifth Amendment right to remain silent and refused to tell anything.

While Baskins sat quietly, former HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and CEO Mark Hurd told the committee that Baskins was to blame for the mess. They said that she had given them bad legal advice, and that she knew about and permitted the use of "pretexting" -- using false pretenses to obtain personal information about others. Even Baskins' longtime friend and HP's outside counsel, Larry Sonsini of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, told Congress: "I think the record has become quite clear that who was in charge [of the spying] was the HP internal legal department. They took the responsibility on, rightly or wrongly."

THE TROUBLES BASKINS MAY STILL FACE

So far, that was the public low for Baskins' career. In private, the due bills keep rolling in. By mid-November, Baskins and Palo Alto, Calif.-based HP were facing investigations by the California attorney general's office, the U.S. Attorney in San Francisco, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Federal Communications Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission. (As yet, Baskins has not been charged with any crimes.)

At least one of five shareholder suits against HP accuses Baskins of insider trading and damaging the corporation. There are potential invasion of privacy suits from individuals whose phone records were stolen. And two phone companies have sued the detective agencies used in the pretexting; one of the suits also names as defendants "unidentified companies" and individuals that conspired with the agency to do the pretexting.

DOJ_NMG_0107139

By some measure, Baskins has dodged the worst of the fallout. HP ousted Dunn and Kevin Hunsaker, the senior counsel in Baskins' office who oversaw the spying efforts. The California attorney general has indicted the pair, along with three private investigators, on four criminal counts related to the spying. The AG alleges that Dunn and Hunsaker personally provided home and cell phone numbers to the private investigators. All five defendants pled not guilty and await trial. If convicted on all counts, they each face a maximum of 12 years in prison and $55,000 in fines.

HER ROLE IN THE SCANDAL

Little has been written about Baskins' role in the spying efforts, but an in-depth analysis of more than 1,500 pages of documents, as well as interviews with people close to the investigation, offers insights into how she let the spying probe spin out of control. The records, which include HP e-mails and interviews conducted by lawyers at Palo Alto-based Wilson Sonsini as part of the company's internal investigation, were made public by the House committee.

In the end, the HP scandal comes down to this: The spying probe became a runaway train. And Ann Baskins was the person in the best position to recognize the danger and stop it. But she didn't. In fact, the records show that from June 2005 to April 2006, Baskins raised legal questions about the tactics at least six times. But she never pushed for a definitive answer about whether the methods used were, in fact, lawful. Or, more importantly, whether they were unwise and dangerous to the company. In retrospect she could have, and should have, shut down the throttle on this train long before it crashed.

"Part of your responsibility as general counsel is to ask hard questions about whether conduct is just technically legal, or arguably illegal, or beyond the fringes of fraud," says Deborah Rhode, a professor of legal ethics and professional responsibility at Stanford Law School. "She was in the best position to see it and stop it."

Even Baskins concedes that she should have done more. Her attorney, K. Lee Blalack II, says Baskins would not comment for this story. But Blalack says that Baskins fully recognizes that instead of solely focusing on whether the investigation was legal, Baskins also should have questioned whether it was ethical. "She regrets that she did not do so," says Blalack, a partner in the Washington, D.C., office of O'Melveny & Myers.

BLEEDING HEWLETT-PACKARD BLUE

According to those close to her, it wasn't like Baskins to fail to ask the right questions. She had deftly managed the legal issues that arose in HP's $8 billion spin-off of Agilent Technologies Inc. in 1999. And she won praise in 2002 for her handling of the controversial $22 billion merger with Compaq Computer Corp., including the sensitive civil suit brought by the heirs of HP's founders, who tried to block the deal. Baskins was both a survivor of corporate politics and the very model of a good company soldier. Even during the congressional hearing, Dunn praised Baskins' commitment to the tech giant, adding, "Ann Baskins bleeds Hewlett-Packard blue ink."

A 1980 graduate of University of California, Los Angeles School of Law, Baskins spent only about a year in private practice. She joined HP in 1982 and slowly worked her way up the ranks. She was named vice president and corporate secretary in 1999 and general counsel in early 2000. Along the way she married Thomas DeFilipps, a Wilson Sonsini partner.

Philadelphia attorney Michael Holston, a longtime friend of Baskins, whose firm Morgan, Lewis & Bockius was brought in by HP execs to investigate the spying probe, calls Baskins "a terrific lawyer who did a great job for HP for nearly 25 years. And she is a woman of the highest ethical standards."

But the praise isn't universal. A former HP in-house lawyer, who requested anonymity because the attorney started a new job, is not surprised that the GC didn't step in to stop the spying. "Baskins was indecisive and disconnected as a manager," says the attorney, who declined to elaborate.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END: DUNN'S PROJECT KONA

The beginning of the end for Baskins, 51, came in February of 2005, when Dunn and her allies on the board forced out then-CEO and Chairwoman Carleton "Carly" Fiorina. The directors chose Dunn to chair the board.

On April 1 Hurd became CEO, but someone had leaked news of his appointment to the press a few days earlier. An irate Dunn hired a Boston-based private investigator named Ron DeLia to search for the leaker. (The California attorney general later accused Dunn of providing DeLia with the home, office and cell phone numbers of various HP directors and managers.) Records show that Dunn initiated those first spying efforts -- without Baskins' knowledge -- on April 19.

Dunn named the spy probe Project Kona because she was vacationing in Hawaii at the time. (Neither Dunn nor her lawyer, James Brosnahan, a senior partner at Morrison & Foerster in San Francisco, returned calls for this story. DeLia also declined to comment through his attorney, John Williams, of Manchester, Williams & Seibert in San Jose.)

Why did Dunn act on her own at first? Records suggest she may have done so because HP's internal corporate politics were roiling. Dunn suspected everyone, including Baskins, as a possible leaker. And Baskins noted in the Wilson Sonsini interviews that her working relationship with Dunn and the board was "strained" by all the distrust at that time.

Dunn brought Baskins into the loop two months later. On June 14, according to e-mails and congressional testimony, DeLia e-mailed a seven-page report to Dunn that discussed the phone record searches and used the word "pretexting." Dunn forwarded a copy to Baskins the same day. This e-mail is the earliest mention of Baskins' involvement in any document that has so far been made public.

Dunn told DeLia that Baskins would join them in a teleconference call the next day to discuss the report. During that June 15 call, DeLia told the two women that telephone records were obtained by ruse from a telecommunications carrier, and he explained the word "pretexting" to them, according to the complaint filed by the attorney general's office. Baskins made sketchy, handwritten notes referring to "pretexting."

According to an affidavit attached to the AG's complaint, "DeLia recalled that Baskins was curious about pretexting and concerned about its legality, and had asked DeLia whether it was lawful. DeLia replied that he was aware of no laws that made pretexting illegal, and was aware of no criminal prosecutions for such activities." Asked in later interviews why she didn't challenge the pretexting when she first learned it involved acts of deceit, Baskins said that Dunn hadn't asked for her opinion. Her relationship with Dunn was such, Baskins added, that "you answered what you were asked" and no more.

E-mails show that pretexting continued through August 2005. That's when Anthony "Tony" Gentilucci, the manager of HP Global Security investigations and a member of the spy team, reported that the probe still could not find the leaker. But his final report offered helpful suggestions for future spying efforts. He advised engaging "HP legal [department in order] to invoke the attorney-client privilege"; assigning an attorney to direct the investigation; and conducting all future briefings "verbally and keeping written work product to a minimum." With that advice, Baskins put the issue behind her -- or so she thought.

BASKINS LAUNCHES KONA II, RELIES ON HUNSAKER

A new leak occurred in January 2006. A story on CNET Networks Inc., a technology news service, reported confidential information about a potential HP acquisition. At Hurd's and Dunn's urging, Baskins quickly launched a new spy probe, dubbed Kona II. Baskins assigned Hunsaker, a six-year HP veteran and her senior counsel, to run it. He reported back to Baskins every other day, and to Dunn and Baskins together once a week, according to records. On Jan. 23, Hunsaker e-mailed HP security that he was heading the new leak probe, at Baskins' request, "in order to protect the attorney-client privilege in the event there is litigation or a government inquiry of some sort."

Baskins also asked Hunsaker to further explore the legality of pretexting. This was the second opportunity, after initially learning about the technique from DeLia six months earlier, that Baskins had to demand in-depth research by an expert in criminal law. But that didn't happen. Instead, on Jan. 30 Hunsaker sent the now-infamous e-mail to Gentilucci, asking, "How does Ron [DeLia] get cell and home phone records? Is it all aboveboard?"

Gentilucci replied that ruses are common in investigations. He said pretexting has been used in a number of probes, and "has not been challenged," although phone company employees could be held liable. His e-mail concluded: "I think it's on the edge, but aboveboard."

Hunsaker responded with four words that have haunted him ever since: "I shouldn't have asked." Then Hunsaker, in an e-mail, sought DeLia's assurances about the spying tactics. Again DeLia, as he had done in Kona I, insisted in e-mails that pretexting was lawful.

Michael Pancer, Hunsaker's attorney, says Baskins did nothing illegal here, and neither did his client. Pancer, a solo practitioner in San Diego, says Hunsaker would not comment for this story. But Pancer defends pretexting. "This [board leak] was a serious problem, and Kevin's ethical duty was to take every legal step necessary to help his client," Pancer says.

HUNSAKER'S RESEARCH ON PRETEXTING

In interviews with the Wilson Sonsini lawyers, Hunsaker explained how, at Baskins' urging, he researched the issue of pretexting. He said he did about an hour's worth of online reading. If he had looked at the Web sites of the Federal Trade Commission or FCC -- and there is no record that he did -- Hunsaker would have seen that those agencies have a serious problem with pretexting and consider it illegal. In fact, the FTC at the time was investigating five private eye companies for pretexting. FTC lawyers sued the five companies for "unfair and deceptive practices" in May. In addition, more than 10 states, as well as Congress, were considering specific legislation to outlaw pretexting. Several states have since made pretexting a crime.

Hunsaker admitted in the Wilson Sonsini interviews that he knew about a Verizon Communications Inc. privacy suit against an online company for pretexting. Actually, Verizon had filed two such privacy suits in 2005 against pretexters, and that fact also was available online. There is no record that anyone at HP thought to call the GC of Verizon or any other phone company to ask them about pretexting. Ironically, the president of Verizon is Lawrence Babbio Jr., who sits on HP's board of directors. But no one asked Babbio for his thoughts on pretexting. (Hunsaker would later say they did not pretext Babbio's phone records.)

So, steeped in blissful ignorance, the HP spy team kept on pretexting until Feb. 7, when the method faced its only real challenge. That's when two HP security employees, who were members of Hunsaker's spy team, saw some of the detailed phone records being collected. Former law enforcement officers, they went to their supervisor and questioned the legality and ethics of obtaining personal phone records. The supervisor confronted Hunsaker, who promised to relay their concerns to the "executives sponsoring this investigation" before proceeding or using the data.

There is no record available of whether Hunsaker kept his promise.

BASKINS HAS ANOTHER CHANCE TO ASK THE TOUGH QUESTIONS

Whether spurred by her own doubts or others', Baskins in early February ordered Hunsaker to undertake "a full process check" on the investigation, including the legality of its methods. This was yet another chance to ask the tough questions and to demand an outside counsel's opinion. Instead, she again turned to Hunsaker, who again merely asked DeLia to reassure them on the law.

To answer the question this time, DeLia, according to his Wilson Sonsini interview, turned to his outside attorney, John Kiernan, with whom he shared office space. Kiernan told DeLia that pretexting was not a crime. The attorney, a partner at Boston-based Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata, wouldn't comment for this story. But in the Wilson Sonsini interviews, Kiernan said that neither HP nor DeLia had ever hired him to research the issue. He had based his quick comments to DeLia on a study done a year earlier by a law student who was clerking in his office. The clerk, Valerie Kloecker, is now an associate with Kiernan's firm and also wouldn't comment.

But on the basis of Kiernan's snap opinion, DeLia e-mailed Hunsaker, saying that "right now" (February 2006) there were no state or federal laws prohibiting pretexting. DeLia's e-mail went on to say there "is a risk of litigation." And added: "Note: the Federal Trade Commission has jurisdiction."

There is no record available to show whether Hunsaker relayed this "risk of litigation" to Baskins, or whether he bothered to check with the FTC. Apparently satisfied with whatever Hunsaker did tell her, Baskins let the probe continue.

POSSIBLE SOURCE OF LEAK IS UNCOVERED

On March 10 Hunsaker sent an 18-page draft report to Dunn, Baskins and Hurd. It connected board member George "Jay" Keyworth II to the leaks, and said the investigation was still ongoing. It did not mention the word "pretexting," but said on page three that "the investigation team obtained, reviewed, and analyzed HP and third-party phone records to identify calls made to or from reporters or other individuals of interest." A footnote added: "It should be noted that, with respect to non-HP phone records, the investigation team utilized a lawful investigative methodology commonly utilized by entities such as law firms and licensed security firms in the United States to obtain such records."

Shortly before Dunn and Baskins were to discuss the report with Hurd at a March 15 meeting in Los Angeles, Baskins apparently grew uneasy. She asked Hunsaker to talk with outside counsel about pretexting in case Hurd had questions. Again, Baskins had a chance to demand a written opinion from an outside criminal lawyer. But once more, she relied on Hunsaker, who asked Gentilucci to call DeLia's lawyer, Kiernan.

This time Kiernan had a paralegal respond to HP. The paralegal gave Gentilucci an "update in which she said she could not find additional lawsuits or criminal charges to indicate that pretexting was (had become) illegal." Hunsaker reported back to Baskins that he had confirmed the legality of pretexting with outside counsel.

BASKINS, DUNN AND HURD CONSULT SONSINI

On March 15 Baskins and Dunn told Hurd that the probe concluded that Keyworth, a noted physicist, was the leaker. Before they confronted Keyworth, the executives decided to consult Larry Sonsini, who would later tell Congress that he was asked in mid-April only to look at "the sufficiency of evidence." Sonsini said he wasn't asked for, and didn't offer, any opinion about pretexting at this time.

E-mails between Baskins, Dunn and Hunsaker indicate that Baskins shared Sonsini's comments with them during an April 15 conference call. The records do not indicate what Sonsini said, but two incidents the following week suggest that Baskins was growing more cautious.

First, Hunsaker was moved out of HP's legal department to become director of ethics. His lawyer, Pancer, calls it a promotion for his hard work. In an e-mail to his spy team, Hunsaker says simply that he's "no longer a member of the HP legal department." His new title was "director of ethics and SBC [standards of business conduct] compliance," and he would report to a senior vice president in marketing.

In the other incident that hints at Baskins' fears, she asked Hunsaker once again to discuss the legality of pretexting, this time in a memo. On April 24 Hunsaker e-mailed a one-page copy of his note to Gentilucci and DeLia. The e-mail says it was prepared "per Ann Baskins' specific request."

DOJ_NMG_0107142

The note explains that the phone records were obtained using pretexting. To confirm the legality of pretexting, the memo cites three efforts. First, Hunsaker "conducted some preliminary legal research and determined that [pretexting] is not unlawful." Second, DeLia contacted the agency he subcontracted to do the pretexting, and the company said its methods "were not unlawful." Third, Gentilucci contacted attorney John Kiernan, whose firm "had conducted extensive research on this issue, and that the practice of pretexting ... is not unlawful."

Hunsaker concludes: "As a result, the investigation team is confident that all phone records information ... was obtained in a lawful manner." After reading this memo, was Baskins as confident? If not, she could have tried to derail this runaway train a final time before the report went to the board. But she didn't.

At HP's May 18 board meeting, the directors were told that Keyworth was the leaker. When the board voted 6 to 3 to ask Keyworth to resign, director Thomas Perkins angrily quit in protest.

HP'S INTERNAL INVESTIGATIONS GO PUBLIC

Throughout June and July, Perkins, a high-profile Silicon Valley venture capitalist, challenged the legality of the investigation and demanded answers from Baskins and Sonsini. Sonsini replied with his now oft-quoted e-mail: "I am sure Ann Baskins looked into the legality of every step of the inquiry and was satisfied that it was conducted properly."

That wasn't enough for Perkins, who made the entire mess public in late July. He told the attorney general's office, the SEC and others about the investigation, including the pretexting. He also told the SEC he objected to how HP had portrayed his resignation in an 8-K filing.

Now facing a public outcry, HP in August asked Sonsini's firm to conduct an internal "investigation of the investigation." Partners Steven Schatz and David Berger conducted phone interviews of the participants -- including four separate interviews with Baskins, and seven with Hunsaker. (Schatz said that no one at the law firm would comment for this story.) Baskins was allowed to sit in on several of the interviews, and even to participate in Kiernan's interview.

By the time the interviews were finished in late August, Baskins had to know she was in trouble. In her interviews with the lawyers, she was often evasive. For example, when asked about a July 2005 meeting on Kona I, Baskins "reported that her calendar does not show any meeting in mid-July of 2005." Baskins used a lot of "I don't recall" answers, and contradicted herself several times in different interviews, especially about her knowledge of pretexting and about her role in Kona I and Kona II.

The Wilson Sonsini report on Aug. 30 concluded that "all persons involved" acted in good faith, but that "certain errors in judgment were made." While the use of pretexting at the time "was not generally unlawful," the report said the subcontractors may have used Social Security numbers while pretexting, "which more likely than not violates federal law." The report did not fault Baskins or Hurd, who "reasonably relied" on Hunsaker's assurances.

THE SCANDAL SNOWBALLS

But Baskins still wasn't off the hook. The scandal snowballed through September, and HP hired another outside law firm, Morgan Lewis, to do a second internal investigation. The company also filed a new document with the SEC, outlining the spy probe and admitting that it had spied on at least two HP employees, seven members of its board, nine reporters and their relatives.

That's when the dominoes started falling. Morgan Lewis came up with undisclosed, and what Hurd called "disturbing," findings about the spying operation. Dunn immediately resigned. Gentilucci and Hunsaker were also forced out. Baskins offered her resignation, but Hurd at first refused it.

Then the law enforcers and regulators opened their investigations. And Congress got into the act by demanding that Baskins and others at HP appear before the House subcommittee. The subcommittee had introduced a bill making pretexting a federal crime in January, and used HP to make its point for passage on national TV.

Baskins flew to the hearing on an HP corporate jet, along with her second attorney, Cristina Arguedas, a partner in Arguedas, Cassman & Headley in Berkeley, Calif. At the time, Baskins' lawyers were urging her to take the Fifth Amendment and not testify. But Baskins knew that the general counsel of HP could not refuse to answer Congress' questions and still keep her job.

Early on Sept. 28 Baskins made the agonizing decision to resign and not testify. In a letter to the congressional committee, Baskins' lawyers wrote, "Given the current environment, Ms. Baskins simply has no choice" but to refuse to testify. (Baskins left the company with a $3.6 million severance package.)

DID BASKINS ACT ETHICALLY THROUGHOUT HP'S INVESTIGATIONS?

Baskins may not be criminally liable for her role in Kona II. But some legal experts say that her ethical decisions were not beyond reproach. One critic is Rhode, the Stanford law professor, who looks at the psychology of what she calls "a moral meltdown." Rhode points out that this wasn't misconduct spurred by greed or self-dealing. In Baskins' case, she was reacting to what she viewed as unethical behavior -- a board member's leak -- and probably felt that she had a right to do whatever necessary to track down the leaker. "These [Baskins, et al.] were individuals who felt they were morally justified," according to Rhode.

One GC who has overseen investigations for his Fortune 500 media company says that beyond the legal and the ethical issues, Baskins failed to ask the crucial question: "How will all this affect the company if it shows up on page one of The New York Times?"

In Baskins' defense, Blalack argues that she was supervising more than 250 lawyers, and more than 600 employees globally. Under those circumstances, Blalack says, Baskins often had to rely on assurances from her subordinates. "Ms. Baskins asked for and received multiple assurances [from Hunsaker] that these investigative techniques were lawful," he insists.

In the end, Baskins' downfall came because of what she decided not to see. Susan Hackett, senior vice president and general counsel of the Association of Corporate Counsel, argues that it is unfair to expect GCs "to see around corners." But the unfortunate truth is, when it came to the legality of spying, Baskins had blinders on.

Study Finds Outside Directors Also Got Backdated Options (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

Board members were not just blissfully ignorant or willfully blind bystanders when they backdated stock option grants for corporate executives, according to a new study. Some 1,400 outside directors themselves may have received manipulated grants over the past decade.

The research, to be released today, sheds new light on the stock options manipulation that has entangled more than 120 companies in a nationwide scandal. It suggests that what has been widely seen as a dot-com phenomenon to enrich managers in the executive suite probably extended to directors in the boardroom as well.

The study, sponsored by the Harvard Law School Program on Corporate Governance, also raises serious questions about corporate governance if the outside directors, who are supposed to act as a final backstop against bad practices, received — and in many cases may have even approved — fraudulent option grants.

“Opportunistic timing of directors’ grants is unlikely to have large dollar significance,” said Lucian A. Bebchuk, a Harvard Law School professor who is one of the study’s three authors. “But it has a large governance significance.”

The study is the latest in a series of papers by academic and governance research groups to explain the size and scope of the stock option scandal. More than 120 companies are under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, ranging from Apple to the United Health Group and dozens of technology companies. The Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service are conducting separate reviews. At least 60 executives and directors have been forced out or fired.

The study looked at about 30,000 directors at some 6,500 companies who were granted stock options from 1995 to 2005. By comparing the percentage of grants made at monthly low prices with the portion they expected had they been randomly assigned, the researchers were able to identify the proportion of the grants that appeared to have been manipulated.

They concluded that board members at about 460 companies, or seven percent of all publicly traded companies, probably received manipulated options. About 1,400 outside directors, or about 4.6 percent of board members, probably benefited from manipulated option grants.

However, the researchers attempted only to identify broad patterns in the data, not specific companies or board members. Nor did they calculate the potential dollar amount of the backdating benefit for the directors, which was probably far less than the potentially six- or seven- figure pay increase that the average executive received.

Backdating options is not necessarily illegal and the practice has been reduced by tougher reporting requirements introduced with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002. But even today, it can raise serious accounting, disclosure and tax issues. Most governance experts consider it bad practice.

The new research also helps debunk the common belief that outside directors would be immune to receiving manipulated stock options because their grants were typically awarded around the time of a company’s annual meeting.

In fact, about 29 percent of the time, a company’s directors were granted stock options on the same date as those given to executives, the study found. Those grants were much more likely to have been awarded at a favorable price than random chance might predict, and those odds increased when a grant was made at the same time as the chief executive’s.

DOJ_NMG_0107144

Other studies, such as one by the Corporate Library, has looked at whether directors on the boards at companies where stock option manipulation was commonplace may have passed along the practice to other boards. However, this appears to be the first study to measure the extent of outside directors who directly benefited from the practice.

The study comes at a time when the S.E.C. is indicating that it may take action against other so-called gatekeepers, including outside directors. One of the researchers, Yaniv Grinstein of Cornell, is working as a visiting scholar at the agency. And last summer, one of its commissioners publicly put board members on notice.

"If the facts permit, and I want to emphasize that all of our enforcement cases are very fact-specific, it wouldn't surprise me to see charges brought against outside directors," Roel C. Campos, an S.E.C. commissioner, said last August.

'Lucky' Stock Options Not Limited To Executives (WP)

By Terence O'Hara

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Chief executives weren't the only ones enjoying near-guaranteed profits from stock options in the past decade. Outside directors at hundreds of American companies also received option grants that are likely to have been manipulated, a new study found.

According to the study, 9 percent of 29,000 option grants to outside directors from 1996 to 2005 were granted on a day when the company stock price was at a monthly low. The likelihood of such a concentration of "lucky" grants is so low as to be statistically impossible, the study's authors said.

"It's like going to Vegas thousands of times and betting on red every time and winning more than half the time," said Lucian Bebchuk, the Harvard University professor who co-authored the report, titled "Lucky Directors," with Cornell University's Yaniv Grinstein and Urs Peyer, a professor at the French business school Insead. "From a numerical standpoint, it can't be random. There has to be some manipulation of the outcome."

The study found the "lucky grants" at about 460 firms, involving about 1,400 outside directors.

Outside directors are board members who aren't management, and they are the shareholders' chief representatives, responsible for overseeing management and making sure executives don't profit unnecessarily at shareholder expense. The Securities and Exchange Commission, following similar studies in recent years that focused on executive stock option grants, has been investigating options backdating.

More than 130 such companies have disclosed probes of their options-granting practices, and a handful of chief executives have lost their jobs because of backdating.

Options give the holder the right to buy company stock at a preset price, usually on the date the option is awarded.

When options are awarded to executives, they allow executives to profit from the rise in the stock price.

But when an option is priced at a date in the past when the price was low, it essentially guarantees a profit, thus negating the rationale for options.

Until this study, however, no one had focused on option grants to directors.

Bebchuk said the lack of attention was because the vast majority of options awarded to directors fall on the date of the annual meeting and are typically much smaller than executive options.

"In the data, we found that directors' grants are equally susceptible to manipulation," Bebchuk said.

A lucky director grant was more likely at companies where executives received lucky grants, the study found. And firms with a higher incidence of lucky option grants were more likely to have governance practices considered unfriendly to shareholders, such as a minority of independent directors on the board.

The firms were also more likely to have "entrenching" bylaws, which make it difficult for shareholders to remove directors.

The study is not the first to raise questions about a possible link between options backdating practices and board governance practices. A study by the Corporate Library of 120 companies implicated in backdating found a high incidence of interlocking directors, or directors who served on more than one company that backdated.

The study suggested that backdating practices may have spread from company to company through these interlocking director relationships.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Executions Drop As States Debate Lethal Injection (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0107145

By Oren Dorell, Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 18, 2006

The questions over lethal injection that have led executions to be halted in Florida and California are likely to curb the use of the death penalty across the USA, according to analysts who support capital punishment and others who oppose it.

However, it's unclear whether the increasing focus on whether lethal injection is unconstitutionally painful represents a significant and lasting turn against the death penalty or a temporary slowdown in executions that will end once procedures for injections are improved.

"I think we're headed towards fewer executions," says Deborah Denno, a professor at Fordham University Law School who was on the U.S. Sentencing Commission from 1994 to 1997. She says a range of problems in the nation's death penalty system — unqualified public defenders, the need for more DNA testing and questions about lethal injections, for example — have prevented capital punishment from being applied fairly.

Kent Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation, which supports the death penalty, disagrees that the decline will last.

He calls the controversy over lethal injection — which is used in nearly all of the 38 states that have the death penalty — "a significant but temporary setback" for capital punishment that will lead to fewer executions only until problems with injections are resolved.

He notes that public opinion surveys consistently have shown that about two-thirds of Americans support the death penalty.

Scheidegger says the debate over injections is somewhat overblown. "Why are we that concerned about whether a convicted murderer feels some pain at death?" he asks. "It's supposed to be punishment."

For years, executions have declined and courts have been increasingly reluctant to issue death sentences as a range of issues have raised questions about how the death penalty is used. The wrangling over lethal injection is the latest battle front in that debate.

On Friday, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush suspended executions in that state and appointed a panel to examine whether lethal injections represent an unconstitutional "cruel and unusual punishment" under the Eighth Amendment. Bush's decision came after it took a state execution team two injections and 34 minutes — more than twice the usual time — to kill convicted murderer Angel Diaz.

A state medical examiner determined that needles used to administer a three-chemical mix in executions were not inserted directly into Diaz's veins.

Shortly after Bush's announcement, federal Judge Jeremy Fogel in San Jose ruled that California's lethal injection system violated the Eighth Amendment, although Fogel left open the possibility that the state could come up with a protocol for executions that would be acceptable.

The moves by Bush and Fogel came a few days after the Death Penalty Information Center, a group in Washington, D.C., that opposes capital punishment, linked a decline in executions to legal disputes in Florida, California, Maryland, Missouri and several other states. The lawsuits challenge the expertise of the teams that implant the intravenous lines into condemned inmates and regulate the flow of the lethal drugs.

In agreeing that convicted killer Michael Morales' execution should be put on hold, Fogel cited a "pervasive lack of professionalism" in California's lethal injection protocols.

Among other things, Fogel said, prison execution teams were poorly screened and the chemicals used in executions sometimes have not been prepared properly.

State protocols for lethal chemicals vary, but most involve a barbiturate to make the inmate unconscious, a paralyzing agent and potassium chloride to stop the heart.

Cybercrooks Hold PC Data Captive (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, December 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — For ransom: your sensitive computer files.

In the latest online scam, cybercrooks are breaking into the PCs of small businesses and individuals, locking up data and demanding money in return for freeing it.

So-called ransomware is the latest iteration of extortion on the Internet. Typically, hackers threaten to disrupt the websites of companies with a deluge of data unless they are paid.

DOJ_NMG_0107146

With ransomware, however, online crooks implant malicious computer code on websites in hopes of breaking into the PCs of consumers and remotely encrypting a victim's files and photographs. The thieves demand a ransom through an online-payment service such as PayPal or e-gold.

According to security firm Websense, one recent victim was the tech administrator at a company in the Northeast. His PC was infected by malicious code, which scrambled company files. An e-mailed ransom note demanded $200 for the digital keys to unlock the files.

The victim did not pay because he doubted his data would be returned even if he paid, says Dan Hubbard, vice president of security and research at Websense. Most of the stolen files were recovered from a backup disk, Hubbard says.

Another recent ransomware case occurred at an Internet cafe in South America. The victims' e-mail accounts were held captive, and they received ransom notes in Spanish, according to Websense.

There are no known statistics on ransomware. But officials at Websense, McAfee and other security companies have noted more instances through their field operations in the last several months.

Employees or small businesses are the typical targets of the scam, security experts say. Ransoms are usually small so victims will pay and not report the crime.

Online crooks count on employees taking laptops home and, unprotected by a company firewall, inadvertently downloading ransomware code from infected websites onto their PCs, says John Thielens, vice president of security firm Tumbleweed Communications.

"Crooks may be toying with it to see if it's successful," Hubbard says. "They may be fishing for sensitive information at a Fortune 500 company for a big payday."

Security experts advise consumers to avoid unfamiliar websites and keep backups of important files on removable devices.

Nifong Probe Possible, U.S. Attorney General Says (WRAL)

WRAL-TV, December 18, 2006

Raleigh — The United States Attorney General suggested Sunday that his office might investigate the way District Attorney Mike Nifong has handled the Duke lacrosse rape case.

In an interview with Fox News on Sunday, United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales confirmed he received a letter asking for a federal probe into the investigation, in which an exotic dancer claims three lacrosse players raped her at a March 13 party.

"Well, that is a letter that we recently received," Gonzales told Fox News' Brian Wilson. "It's being evaluated at the (Department of Justice). I can't say anything -- anything beyond that."

Rep. Walter B. Jones, R-North Carolina, sent Gonzales the letter last week asking for a federal investigation into possible prosecutorial misconduct, and specifically, to determine whether the defendants' civil rights were violated.

"I was offended by the way (Nifong) has handled this case," Jones told WRAL last week. "I think he has been out of control."

Gonzales said that even though the case is a state and local matter, the federal government could still become involved "if an investigation is conducted in such a way that civil rights laws are violated, that would be something that we might look into," Gonzales said.

Last week, defense attorneys also filed several motions in the case. One, criticizing the way DNA evidence was revealed, indicated that no DNA from any of the defendants was found on the accuser's body but that there were numerous male matches.

"There was no attempt to hide anything from the way the report was done," Nifong told reporters on Friday. "If anything, we were trying to be fair to all the people who were not going to be involved in this case."

Other motions asked that a photographic lineup be dismissed as evidence, because it was slanted. A third motion asked for a change of venue, saying that Nifong has polarized the local community with comments he made during the initial stages of the investigation.

All three men charged in the case – David Evans, 23, Collin Finnerty, 20, and Reade Seligmann, 20 -- have maintained their innocence from the beginning.

The next hearing is scheduled for Feb. 5 when defense attorneys are expected to ask Judge Osmond Smith to throw out the photo identification lineup.

The accuser in this case is also expected to be in court.

Copyright Tool Will Scan Web For Violations (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

To deal with the mounting copyright issues swirling around video and other content online, a start-up founded by some respected Silicon Valley executives is taking a novel approach: combing the entire Web for unauthorized uses.

Privately held Attributor Corp. of Redwood City, Calif., has begun testing a system to scan the billions of pages on the Web for clients' audio, video, images and text -- potentially making it easier for owners to request that Web sites take content down or provide payment for its use.

The start-up, which was founded last year and has been in "stealth" mode, is emerging into the public eye today, at a time when some media and entertainment companies' frustration with difficulties identifying infringing uses of their content online is increasing. The problem has intensified with the proliferation and increasing usage of sites such as Google Inc.'s YouTube, which lets consumers post video clips.

Media and entertainment companies have so far relied on a combination of technology and their own scanning to protect their content online -- but with mixed results. Media companies have used digital-rights management technology designed to make it hard to copy or transfer files. But such measures have often proved to be clumsy, despised by consumers or quickly thwarted. That's the case for DRM technology built into DVDs to prevent them from being ripped onto computers, for example. Entertainment and media companies have also relied on their own staff to scan Web sites for infringing content. But even when such content is spotted and taken down, the companies often see the content pop up in the same places or elsewhere soon after.

"We all know that as soon as somebody comes up with a way to secure a piece of property, somebody else will come within days and crack it," says Lawrence Iser, a partner at law firm Kinsella Weitzman Iser Kump & Aldisert in Santa Monica, Calif., who represents musical artists and other entertainment industry clients.

Though its service isn't out yet, Attributor appears to go further than existing techniques for weeding out unauthorized uses of content online. While companies are tackling parts of the same problem -- Indigo Stream Technologies Ltd., based in Gibraltar, offers a free service called Copyscape that analyzes a Web page and then uses Google's search engine to see whether the text is duplicated elsewhere on the Web -- Attributor's approach is seemingly more comprehensive.

Its co-founders, former Yahoo Inc. executive Jim Brock, and Jim Pitkow, a Silicon Valley entrepreneur who has sold companies to Google and VeriSign Inc., claim to have cracked the thorny computer-science problem of scouring the entire Web by using undisclosed technology to efficiently process and comb through chunks of content. The company says it will have over 10 billion Web pages in its index before the end of this month.

"If it works, it's a fantastic invention," Mr. Iser says.

It's unclear whether such a service will be welcomed by Internet companies that allow users to post content. YouTube, News Corp.'s MySpace and others already face copyright lawsuits. In some cases, they're building systems to identify pirated materials consumers upload to their sites, and say they're open to sharing revenue with content owners.

Attributor plans to announce today that it has received about $10 million in funding to date from investors including Sigma Partners, Selby Venture Partners, Draper Richards, First Round Capital and Amicus Capital.

Attributor analyzes the content of clients, who could range from individuals to big media companies, using a technique known as "digital fingerprinting," which determines unique and identifying characteristics of content. It uses these digital fingerprints to search its index of the Web for the content. The company claims to be able to spot a customer's content based on the appearance of as little as a few sentences of text or a few seconds of audio or video. It will provide customers with alerts and a dashboard of identified uses of their content on the Web and the context in which it is used.

The content owners can then try to negotiate revenue from whoever is using it or request that it be taken down. In some cases, they may decide the content is being used fairly or to acceptable promotional ends. Attributor plans to help automate the interaction between content owners and those using their content on the Web, though it declines to specify how.

Company executives believe its system will provide transparency and accountability to encourage more owners to put their content online with confidence they'll be able to police its use, and share in any profits.

DOJ_NMG_0107148

"We believe that we can provide an infrastructure that will support all kinds of outcomes and remedies, which will align the interests of content owners, content hosts and search engines around legitimate syndication and monetization," says Mr. Brock, Attributor's chief executive.

"We see this as a way to take us out of the course we've been on, which is more litigation," says Mr. Pitkow, who is chief technology officer.

Attributor has begun testing the system, and won't release it officially until the first quarter of next year. The co-founders' track records, however, lend credibility to their claims. As Yahoo's first outside counsel, Mr. Brock tackled Internet copyright issues for the Internet company as far back as 1994 and later oversaw some of its core businesses as a senior vice president. Mr. Pitkow is a computer science Ph.D. who worked at Xerox's legendary PARC research facility. In 2001, he helped to sell the intellectual property of Outride Inc., where he was president and chairman, to Google. Last year, he sold Moreover Technologies, where he was CEO and chairman, to VeriSign.

"They're real guys who have solved hard-core problems," says Ali Aydar, chief operating officer of Snocap Inc., a digital-music registry start-up. Snocap and Attributor share a backer in Silicon Valley investor Ron Conway. "Content owners I've talked to outside of the music business would love a system which tells them where their content is being utilized," Mr. Aydar adds.

Attributor executives decline to say how frequently they will update their Web index, a key factor in their ability to stay on top of postings. They also say they won't at least initially monitor peer-to-peer file swapping systems, where large amounts of pirated music, movies, TV shows and software are traded.

The YouTube World Opens An Untamed Frontier For Copyright Law (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, December 18, 2006

LOS ANGELES

Larry Richard is one of the millions to have discovered the world of YouTube, the free website that allows people to post, watch, and share video clips. When he receives a link to the site, usually via e-mail, he spends a few moments to click and watch a clip on his computer screen - sometimes a video of a friend's singing recital, other times a snippet of a foreign commercial or a monologue from late-night TV.

"It's entertaining, it's information, it's a community of people sharing things," says Mr. Richard, a marketing consultant in Santa Monica, Calif. But is it legal, given that at least some of what he's watching is copyrighted material being disseminated by individuals who clearly do not hold the copyright?

The law on this matter is murky, and likely to get murkier before it gets clearer, say experts in intellectual property law.

Several companies such as Time Warner have been threatening YouTube with copyright infringement lawsuits. Now that Internet giant Google has purchased YouTube, experts expect that the rampant disregard of copyright law shown by early YouTube users, at least, is likely to get resolved - but they caution that each successive new technology can put early users, in particular, on nebulous legal ground, especially if financial profit is involved.

"As more and more technology comes along, the legal underpinnings governing them are not becoming clearer," says Mark McCreary, a partner in the Technology and Venture Finance Group of Fox Rothschild, which handles intellectual property cases. Increasing ability to download video clips from YouTube and to watch videos on iPods and cellphones will present users with more opportunities to violate copyright - wittingly or unwittingly, he says.

Still, those who watch videos at YouTube - whether or not such content is copyrighted - are unlikely to be pursued with the same fervor with which the music industry prosecuted those who downloaded music free of charge via the file-sharing website Napster, say Mr. McCreary and other experts.

"The very big difference between today's YouTube and the music-sharing of MP3 files of several years ago is that you have to watch and you can't - absent the knowledge of advanced hackers - copy it for your own use," says David Axtell, an intellectual property specialist at the law firm Leonard, Street and Deinard in Minneapolis. "During Napster's heyday, people were making their own digital copies and using them on their own."

But concerns should be higher for those who actually submit videos for posting and watching, say Mr. Axtell and others. Because copying and distributing copyrighted material is illegal, people who post that material on YouTube without permission are more likely to be held liable.

"There certainly will be more litigation, and Google has set aside hundreds of millions in a war chest in recognition of this," says Kevin Parks, a copyright specialist with the law firm Leydig, Voit and Mayer in Chicago.

DOJ_NMG_0107149

On the side of the YouTubites are those who argue that use of such copyrighted material falls into "fair use" provisions of the law.

"It's up to the courts to continually balance the rights of those who own copyrighted material with the need for society to adapt to emerging technology," says Perry Binder, assistant professor of legal studies at Georgia State University.

Copyright laws, which give exclusive legal right to a writer, editor, composer, publisher or distributor to publish, produce, sell, or distribute an artistic work are unambiguous, experts say. But how many copies of something a person may make for personal use is far more open to interpretation by judges and courts.

Mr. Binder says movie and TV industries are figuring out how to handle the more serious abuses, such as excessive downloading by casual users, profiting from the sale of a downloaded video, and having a website that links to copyrighted videos, particularly if the Web page profits from drawing traffic to the pages.

"These people should expect 'cease and desist' letters from attorneys and face the threat of a lawsuit if copyrighted material is not taken down immediately," says Binder.

For its part, YouTube directs users to common-sense "Dos and Don'ts" at its online help center. Users are asked not to send pornography, videos of dangerous or illegal acts (such as animal abuse or bombmaking), violence, and to avoid the malicious use of stereotypes.

"We ask our users to respect copyrighted material and to only upload videos they have made or obtained the rights to use," says Jenny Nielsen, marketing manager at YouTube. "Our policy prohibits inappropriate content.... Users can flag content they feel is inappropriate and once it is flagged, YouTube reviews the material and reserves the right to remove videos from the system."

Meanwhile, YouTube's power has prompted content creators to see how they can make money from the site's content that is copyrighted. Companies such as CBS and three major recording companies - Universal Music Group, Warner Music, and Sony BMG Music Entertainment - have inked deals with Google/YouTube to share revenues generated by copyrighted content on the site.

As part of an experimental "brand channel" at the site, CBS in October agreed to offer free video clips for downloading. By Thanksgiving, 300 such clips had drawn 30 million viewers. More than 35,000 have subscribed to the free channel and CBS claims its "Late Show with David Letterman" now boasts 200,000 more viewers and its "Late Late Show with Craig Ferguson" has 7 percent more viewers.

"YouTube has not only held the threats at bay, but also shown it can be a revenue boon for old media," says Chris Taylor, senior editor of Business 2.0 Magazine.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

In Houston, Questions Of Bias Over Tasers (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

HOUSTON -- Roiled by allegations of using unjustified deadly force against Latino suspects, the Houston Police Department began using stun guns two years ago so officers could avoid pulling the trigger of an automatic weapon.

Now officers are facing a new question: Are they using the high-voltage Taser -- what police call a less-than-lethal "intermediary" weapon -- indiscriminately against black suspects? The recent arrest and use of a Taser against a black professional football player has once again put the police department of the nation's fourth-largest city under scrutiny.

The incident occurred around 1 p.m. Nov. 14, when Houston Texans lineman Fred Weary was stopped by police for changing lanes without signaling. An officer said later that Weary "looked suspicious" inside the vehicle and that when the 6-foot-4, 308-pound National Football League player was asked to place his hands on his car, he became "verbally combative," failed to obey orders and made threatening moves toward police. Weary was zapped with a stun gun, which knocked him to the ground. He subsequently described the pain of the shock as worse than any he has experienced on a football field.

The arrest and Taser deployment might simply have been another number in police statistics, but for Weary's fame. Instead, the incident -- and a Houston judge's decision to dismiss charges of resisting arrest because of insufficient evidence -- have become a rallying point for black activists and some city officials who say police unjustly use stun guns against black suspects. Police data show that in almost 1,000 Taser deployments since December 2004, 63 percent of the suspects were black. Houston's population of 1.95 million is 25 percent black.

"If that brother was not a Texans football player, if that brother didn't have the resources that he has, he would have been another big brother that was Tased, and that's it," said New Black Panther Nation's Quanell X, who organized a community meeting with police officials earlier this month to discuss Taser policy and police treatment of blacks.

"Not until a high-profile African American football player was Tased did the city sit up and notice," he said. "We need a cease-and-desist order of those Tasers until there is a complete and independent study of their use."

For a year, Houston City Council member Ada Edwards, who is black, has sought a medical study on the effects of the Taser and also a moratorium on its use because "we have such a preponderance of minorities being Tased," she said. Now Houston Mayor Bill White has called for an independent review of Taser use.

City Council member Adrian Garcia, chairman of the council's public-safety committee, said an oversight group of civil rights advocates and residents had already been created to review Taser policy because of "concern about racial issues." But Garcia said he was convinced that Taser use had cut down on police shootings and saved lives.

In a letter published in the Dec. 2 Houston Chronicle, Police Chief Harold L. Hurtt said the department's Taser-training staff had identified 39 instances in which officers used Tasers against an armed suspect when they could have been justified in using deadly force. "That statistic easily could have translated into 39 more officer-involved shooting incidents," Hurtt wrote.

Facing a small, emotional crowd at the community meeting, Charles McClelland, executive assistant chief of police, said Taser use is minimal. About 3,500 police officers, who receive special training, carry stun guns. Tasers were deployed just under 1,000 times over the past two years -- against one-half of 1 percent of suspects arrested -- and half the people arrested in that period were black. During those two years, officers were assaulted 700 times.

"We're not Tasing 1 percent of the people that we arrest," McClelland said. "What this debate has sparked is a golden opportunity to move to the next level, and that's the Taser Cam."

Forty stun guns with tiny video and audio recorders in the handle are being tested by Houston officers. McClelland said the upgraded Taser would "protect the public from abuse, protect officers from frivolous complaints and . . . assist in court to sustain or exonerate suspects."

Michael Dirden, head of the police department's internal-affairs division, said 50 to 60 complaints have been filed against officers for inappropriate Taser use -- including against children. After investigations, one officer was fired, five officers were disciplined and almost two dozen officers were sent for additional training.

Although the resisting-arrest charge against Weary was dismissed, the Harris County district attorney's office is still reviewing the case to determine whether the NFL player should be charged with a crime such as interfering with the duties of an officer. Assistant District Attorney Paul Doyle said that the officers' radio-dispatch tapes had been subpoenaed and that his office is seeking video footage of the intersection where the arrest occurred.

Weary's attorney, Charley A. Davidson, said he has found two witnesses who will corroborate the player's account that, as he placed his hands atop the car, he asked officers why he was being arrested. "The way the two officers described the scene was different than the way everyone else described it," Davidson said.

Theory & Practice How Executives Are Pushed To Foster Diversity (WSJ)

By Phred Dvorak

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

TWO YEARS AGO, Rod Bond, an executive at a U.S. unit of French food-services company Sodexho Alliance SA, accompanied female colleagues to a meeting of the Women's Food Service Forum, where he was a rare man among roughly 1,500 women.

"That's a profound experience," says Mr. Bond, 57 years old. It prompted him to wonder how women managers of his generation had felt when they started their careers amid a sea of men. "I can begin to feel what it must have felt like to be different," Mr. Bond says.

That is the kind of reaction Sodexho and other companies hope to provoke in executives, as they try to help leaders -- still predominantly white and male -- come to grips with an increasingly diverse work force and customer base. Experts say such efforts can be a valuable addition to traditional diversity training because they can foster a deeper understanding of unfamiliar cultures and help executives see how they are perceived. "Dealing with difference is also dealing with how other people see you," says Hayward Bell, chief diversity officer at defense and aerospace manufacturer Raytheon Co.

Some companies, such as financial firm Wachovia Corp., urge executives to work with organizations representing other demographic groups. Wachovia's head of human resources, Shannon McFayden, who is white, serves on the board of the United Negro College Fund. John Cole, who heads banking for midsize businesses around New York, advises groups of women business owners and attends a year-end holiday gathering of one such group. "That puts me in quite the minority," says Mr. Cole.

Others encourage deeper immersion. Raytheon's missile-systems division in 2004 required managers to spend a day in a wheelchair in the office to better understand the concerns of disabled employees. Raytheon also asks executives to act as liaisons for employee "affinity groups," which bring together workers of specific races, genders, sexual orientations or religions.

"To really engage people, you have to create a series of epiphanies and take leaders through those epiphanies," says Rohini Anand, Sodexho's chief diversity officer.

Peter Bye, a consultant on diversity and former corporate diversity director for AT&T Inc., says working with people from other demographic groups can give executives insights that can't be learned in a class. However, he cautions executives need to mentally prepare themselves for the experience. Executives who have an "us versus them" attitude toward people who are different from themselves can get scared and defensive when suddenly thrown into a situation where they are in the minority, Mr. Bye says.

Experts say executives should be asked to do things that relate to their work, so they can see how diversity is relevant. "If it's a contrived experience, it's almost dismissible," says Anne McMahon, a management professor and workplace-diversity expert at the Williamson College of Business Administration in Youngstown, Ohio.

Sodexho's efforts complement an extensive diversity-training program that includes outside speakers. The company also encourages executives to mentor younger employees from different demographic groups. And it backs up the program with money: 25% of executives' bonuses are linked to diversity objectives independent of financial performance, such as hiring or training minority staff.

Ms. Anand asked Mr. Bond to sponsor the affinity group for women employees when it formed about four years ago. Mr. Bond, who runs the Sodexho division that serves public schools, says participating in the group helped him appreciate the concerns of women employees. One of the group's first requests was for a lactation room at headquarters, where new mothers could pump breast milk. "It's just one of those things I'd never thought about," says Mr. Bond.

Working with the group also made Mr. Bond more sensitive to women's feelings, he says. Recently, he found himself annoyed by a TV comedian making jokes about divorce, all at the wife's expense. Mr. Bond says he has also changed the social activities he plans for his colleagues, arranging excursions such as dinner cruises instead of golf outings, which he thinks appeal primarily to men.

Lorna Donatone, who ran a Sodexho unit that supplies food services for cruises, chaired the women's affinity group when Mr. Bond became its sponsor. She urged him to attend the Women's Food Service Forum event, arguing it would be a valuable experience, as well as a good networking opportunity. Ms. Donatone, who is of Swedish-German ancestry, later asked to sponsor Sodexho's Latino affinity group, to gain experience with a different culture.

Ms. Donatone says the experience of hearing a lot of Spanish spoken underscored for her the importance of language and prompted her to produce more bilingual promotional materials for her cruise services. Ms. Donatone says her work with the Latino group had an unexpected bonus: As she explored Latino culture, she started to reflect for the first time on her own roots.

"I grew up in Nebraska, and everyone looked exactly like me," says Ms. Donatone. "It was just never something I thought about much. Now I start thinking: 'That recipe from my mother was Swedish.'"

The Midas Touch (NYT)

By Marc Maurer

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

IN a ruling in a lawsuit last month, Judge James Robertson of Federal District Court said that United States currency discriminates against blind people because bills are all the same size and cannot be distinguished by touch. His decision was applauded by some advocates for the blind, including the American Council of the Blind, which brought the lawsuit. But as president of the National Federation of the Blind, the nation's oldest and largest organization of the blind, I believe that Judge Robertson's ruling is wrong.

Discrimination occurs when the blind are barred from enjoying benefits, goods or services. This definition of discrimination is what most people understand the word to mean. If a landlord refuses to rent an apartment to someone because of race, color, creed or disability, then discrimination occurs. Sometimes people with disabilities are barred from certain facilities or services because of the way they are designed. A person in a wheelchair cannot climb the steps of a public building; if the building does not have a wheelchair ramp, that person is prevented from entering it. In another example, my group is suing the Target Corporation because the company's Web site doesn't accommodate the special text-reading software that the blind use to surf the Internet. In both cases, a person with a disability is kept out of a public place or denied use of a service, just as African-Americans were not welcome at whites-only lunch counters.

But while blind people cannot identify paper currency by touch, that does not prevent us from spending money. When we hand merchants our money, they take it and provide us with the goods or services we have paid for, no questions asked. People with whom we transact business provide us with correct change if needed, and we then organize the money in a manner that allows us to identify it in the future. We transact business in this way every day.

There is no evidence that the blind are shortchanged more often than the sighted; if a question does arise about a particular transaction, it is the responsibility of the blind person to sort out the matter. Identifying money by feel, as the blind are often able to do in many other countries, may be more convenient, but inconvenience is not the same thing as discrimination.

While it is crucial that minorities have a voice in society, it is also the responsibility of every minority group to use that voice wisely and not to cry "discrimination" when no discrimination has occurred. The blind of America will fight discrimination wherever we find it, but we achieve nothing by falsely portraying ourselves as victims and engaging in frivolous litigation.

Blind Indifference (HC)

When it comes right down to it, there is no way to sugarcoat the Bush administration's objection to revamping the nation's paper currency to make it distinguishable to the visually impaired. It's contrary to federal law banning discrimination against the disabled in government programs. And it's downright mean.

On Tuesday the administration, through the Justice Department, appealed a ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson, which requires the Treasury Department to develop paper money with features that would allow blind people to tell the difference between denominations. Robertson's order had been prompted by a lawsuit brought by the American Council for the Blind, which asked that bills be made in different sizes or that textured features be added to aid in differentiating bills.

Such changes would not be ground-breaking. Of 180 countries that use paper money, only the United States prints bills that are uniform in size, color and feel in every denomination.

Justice Department lawyers countered that blind people simply should use portable money reading devices to make purchases, or they should use credit cards. But the government has no plans to provide these machines, which cost around $350. Nor does it have a plan to deal with people who are not eligible for credit cards, including children and some of the large percentage of visually impaired Americans who are unemployed because of their disability.

Sight-impaired adults, like the rest of us, value their ability to live as independently as possible. According to their advocates, when it comes to distinguishing between denominations of currency, the blind use folding systems that help them distinguish, say, a $10 bill from a $20. But that only assists a person in knowing which bill to hand a clerk. A person who cannot see still has to rely on the honesty of the sales clerk to return the correct change.

This is not as it should be. Yes, it will cost money to redesign the nation's currency, but the Treasury Department has been in the process of adding new, anticounterfeit features to paper money for years. Officials should have taken the opportunity to deal with the issue of fairness to blind consumers during that process. It's late, but it's not too late to make this long-overdue change for the better.

ANTITRUST:

CVS-Caremark Deal Faces A $26 Billion Threat (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

Pharmacy-benefit manager Express Scripts Inc. was last night preparing a $26 billion cash and stock offer for Caremark Rx Inc., in an effort to break up the company's existing takeover deal with drug chain CVS Corp., people familiar with the matter said.

An offer could be launched as early as today, these people said. It could set off a back-and-forth struggle for Caremark, of Nashville, Tenn., at a time when the company's deal with CVS was gaining credibility in the market. That transaction -- which awarded no premium to Caremark's shareholders -- initially failed to convince investors, who pushed shares in both companies downward.

Further terms of the offer weren't clear. An Express Scripts spokesman declined to comment. A Caremark spokesman couldn't immediately be reached.

Friday, Caremark's shares ended at $50.30 in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Maryland Heights, Mo.-based Express Scripts is a far smaller company than Caremark, with a market capitalization of $9.3 billion, and debt of around $1.6 billion. The intended offer shows how the immense financings used to fund private-equity deals are also being used by corporate buyers trolling for acquisitions. In many ways, an Express Scripts offer would be akin to a leveraged buyout, with Express Scripts putting far more debt on its books than currently, while also accepting a lower credit rating.

Pharmacy-benefit managers such as Express Scripts and Caremark control the flow of medications through retail stores and health institutions.

Relatively smaller players such as Express have little choice but to act forcefully, as both macro-economic factors and street-level competition are reshaping the business.

Amid growing overall health costs, distribution is one of the expenses that insurers and the government are trying to squeeze. In the meantime, retail behemoth Wal-Mart Stores Inc. said it would begin charging $4 each for certain generic prescriptions, further pressuring both drug stores and the pharmacy managers.

It is likely that the cost-savings of the combination would be greater for the two than for Caremark and CVS, which owns a relatively small PBM of its own.

Those savings probably factor in heavily to the premium that Express Scripts plan to propose.

Putting together Express and Caremark would be an aggressive maneuver, given that the two rank as the third- and second-largest PBMs, respectively. It was unclear last night whether Express would propose any specific plans to address federal antitrust concerns, though such issues would surely be of prime concern for Caremark's board of directors.

Antitrust cases have been very rare during the Bush administration, especially after the Justice Department suffered a stinging defeat in its 2005 case against Oracle Corp., in its hostile bid for PeopleSoft Corp.

Health matters, however, are likely to receive greater scrutiny from federal authorities and state officials, who have for years lodged investigations into how the PBMs price and market their drugs.

For the first six months of the year, Caremark reported net income of $483.9 million on revenue of $18.35 billion.

Drug Middleman Plans Hostile Bid For Rival (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

In an audacious takeover bid that could lead to lower drug prices for consumers, a company that manages employee drug plans will make a $26 billion hostile bid for a much larger rival, according to people briefed on the offer.

The bid by benefits manager Express Scripts for rival Caremark Rx tops a competing offer by the CVS drugstore chain in a bold move that evokes memories of the big buyout deals of the 1980s.

Pharmacy benefit managers act as the middleman between drug companies and employers that offer drug subsidies to their workers as part of health-care coverage. By acquiring Caremark Rx, which is double its size, Express Scripts would by far become the largest pharmacy benefits manager in the nation.

Together they would have even more clout when negotiating prices with drug makers for clients, typically big corporations and their employees. The deal would also save the combined company as much as $500 million a year by reducing overlapping costs.

Both pharmacy benefit managers and drug makers are under increasing pressure to keep drug prices low from all sides. Prices offered at the pharmacy counter have also come under threat in recent months by Wal-Mart, which said it would offer certain generic drugs for $4.

The takeover bid seeks to scuttle Caremark Rx's agreement last month to merge with CVS, the second-biggest drugstore chain in the country. That deal was expected to transform the drug industry.

Spokesmen for Express Scripts, Caremark and CVS could not be reached for comment.

The four largest prescription benefit mangers — Caremark, Medco Health Solutions, Wellpoint and Express Scripts — handle about 75 percent of the $235 billion spent on prescription medicines every year.

The takeover bid comes amid a record-setting year for mergers. As of the beginning of this month, there have been $3.3 trillion worth of deals in more than 32,000 transactions, according to Thomson Financial. Not since the days of the corporate raiders of the 1980's, as captured in films like "Wall Street" and books like "Barbarians at the Gate," have deal makers been so central in reshaping corporate America.

The bid will pit Express Scripts, with a market value of $9.3 billion, against the much-larger CVS, worth some $25 billion, in a battle over Caremark Rx. It is possible that a bidding war could ensue, with both suitors ratcheting up their offers. Any deal could face scrutiny from regulators in Washington.

The offer by Express Scripts is a throwback to the 1980's in two ways: it is a rare hostile bid that could spark a fierce bidding war, and it relies heavily on debt, some $14 billion.

Buyers do not like to get into bidding wars: they can get expensive quickly and they can drive away important employees and customers, eroding the value of the business they want. Even as merger activity has accelerated, the number of deals in the United States that had two or more bidders has fallen sharply this year, according to Thomson.

But companies are increasingly willing to use debt in deals. The $26 billion offer is a vivid illustration of the role that cheap credit is playing in fueling the explosion in takeovers. Historically, low interest rates and a flood of available cash have enabled private equity firms to buy out bigger and bigger companies.

In those cases, the firms typically put up a quarter or so of the value of the company and borrow the rest, planning to use the companies' revenues to pay off the loans. And even as the amount of debt used in these deals has risen to record levels, investors have stayed sanguine that the risks of default are low.

Now, Express Scripts is using the same weapon employed by private equity and leveraging itself or borrowing against the combined company to try to win Caremark. Other companies have also drunken deeply from the debt pool: the mining giant Freeport-McMoran Copper and Gold is essentially borrowing $15 billion to pursue its $25.9 billion takeover of Phelps Dodge.

The takeover bid by Express Scripts is being orchestrated by its chief executive, George Paz, who joined the company in 1998, as senior vice president and chief financial officer before becoming president in 2003 and then chief executive in 2005. Before Express Scripts, he was a partner at the accounting firm Coopers & Lybrand and then executive vice president and finance chief for Life Partners Group.

It is unclear how investors will react to Express Scripts' offer. Express Scripts had widely been considered a takeover target, not an acquirer, because of its small size. Indeed, its bid for Caremark could also put it into play. Kemp Dolliver, an analyst at Cowen & Company, wrote in a research note after the CVS-Caremark announcement that Express Scripts could be bought by Walgreen, Wal-Mart or Aetna.

The proposed merger between CVS and Caremark received a mixed reception by investors. When it was first announced, shares in both companies tumbled, but they have returned to close to where they started after the deal. In that deal, Caremark received no premium for its shares. Shares of Caremark closed Friday at $50.30.

Under the proposed offer by Express Scripts, Caremark shareholders would receive just shy of $58.50 a share in Express Scripts stock and cash, people briefed on the offer said, representing a 22 percent premium. Exact terms of the breakdown between stock and cash could not be learned.

Under Mr. Paz, Express Scripts has made several acquisitions, most recently acquiring Priority Healthcare Corporation for $1.3 billion in cash in July 2005.

Express Scripts, with some 13,000 employees, was formed in 1986 and went public in 1992. The company is based in Maryland Heights, Mo.

In 2003, New York's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, began an investigation into claims that Express Scripts had over billed the state's health care plans. In 2004, Mr. Spitzer sued the company in state court in Albany for breach of contract.

Latest Deal In Real Estate For $9 Billion (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

Realogy, the giant real estate franchisor that owns Coldwell Banker, Century 21 and Sotheby's International Realty agreed yesterday to be sold to Apollo Group, the private equity firm, for about $9 billion.

The deal marks the latest play by private equity firms to buy into the real estate business just as it appears to have peaked. Just two weeks ago, Blackstone Group led a $36 billion deal to acquire Equity Office Properties Trust, the nation's largest office building owner and manager, for about $36 billion, which was the biggest buyout in history.

The deal will be another huge payday for Henry R. Silverman, the architect behind Cendant, the conglomerate that Realogy was part of until it broke itself into four pieces earlier this year in an effort to revive its flagging stock price.

Mr. Silverman, who had been criticized for huge paydays while he was at Cendant, stands to make about $135 million by selling all of his shares and stock options as part of the deal. Mr. Silverman, who is now the chairman and chief executive of Realogy, is expected to stay on until his contract expires at the end of next year. However, Mr. Silverman will not be an equity participant with Apollo in the deal, and his out-of-the-money stock options (those below the strike price) will be canceled.

"I think it is a conflict to be the C.E.O. and to be the buyer," Mr. Silverman said in an interview, taking a swipe at management-led buyouts where the chief executive buys out his own company.

Realogy is among the biggest players in the real estate field, taking part in a fourth of all home sales nationally. It has more than 300,000 agents among its franchises, almost three times more than its closest rival, Re/Max International. It is also a player in commercial real estate through its Coldwell Banker Commercial arm.

Yet the company has seen its fortunes decline as the real estate market has slumped. Sales have dropped from 2005, a record year, and more homes are staying on the market longer. The rise in home prices has slackened to the slowest pace seen since 1998, according to government reports. And the National Association of Realtors said earlier this month that it expected home sales to continue to decline next year.

Moreover, Internet-based brokerages and discount shops may have dealt a further blow to traditional real estate brokerages. Commissions have fallen to an average of 5 percent from 6 percent a decade ago, although experts say that slide had begun before the entrance of the discounters.

For the quarter that ended Sept. 30, Realogy reported net revenue of $1.73 billion, a decline from the $2.08 billion it earned as a part of Cendant a year ago.

"Our earnings are going down," Mr. Silverman said. "We're probably not going to see a recovery until 2009. This deal is an insurance policy."

He said he had decided to pursue the deal with Apollo, which approached the company earlier this year, because, "we need to be owned by someone with a five-year time horizon," suggesting that many public shareholders, including hedge funds, have a "five-second horizon."

Under the terms of the deal, Realogy shareholders will receive $30 a share in cash, a premium over the stock's Friday closing price of $25.50. Apollo said it would commit $2 billion of equity to Realogy.

The deal is expected to close in the spring of 2007, but Realogy may solicit other buyout proposals until Feb. 14. in what is known as a "go shop" provision. Should it accept another offer, Realogy will pay Apollo a breakup fee.

Mr. Silverman said the company decided against a full auction because it could be "very destabilizing to the staff and customers." He said that the deal with Apollo meant "an outcome is guaranteed" that company would be sold and that a potential higher offer could still be sought.

Apollo, which said that it was strongly positioned to take Realogy forward, is no stranger to the company or the industry. In 1997, Apollo and Cendant formed NRT, or National Realty Trust, as a joint venture to consolidate various fragments in the residential real estate market. NRT revenues then grew to $3 billion by 2001, and it made 200 acquisitions and added $1.5 billion in annual commission revenues. Cendant bought out Apollo's stake in NRT in 2002.

"Realogy's powerful real estate brands and their long heritage of leadership in the industry serve as a strong platform for future growth and we are pleased to again have it as part of our investment portfolio," Marc Becker, a partner at Apollo, said in a statement.

Realogy, along with the rest of its former Cendant brethren, has long been seen as a potential target for a private equity buyer. Its $500 million in annual cash flow and relatively small debt were seen as attractive to such firms. And analysts have said that residential real estate companies like Realogy often find rough times on Wall Street, where the cyclical drops in the housing markets have taken a toll on such companies' share prices. Some of Realogy's competitors, like Re/Max, are already privately held.

Evercore Partners advised Realogy on the deal, while Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom served as legal counsel. J. P. Morgan Chase and Credit Suisse were Apollo's financial advisers, while Wachtell Lipton Rosen & Katz worked as its legal counsel. J. P. Morgan, Credit Suisse and Bears Stearns will provide Apollo with debt financing.

Realogy Agrees To $6.4-billion Sale (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, December 18, 2006

Realogy Corp., the largest U.S. residential real estate broker, agreed to be acquired by private equity firm Apollo Management for about $6.4 billion amid a slump in the U.S. housing market.

Residential brokers including Realogy have been hurt by a U.S. housing market slowdown.

Home prices fell in about a third of U.S. metropolitan areas in the third quarter as the slump forced sellers to accept lower bids, the National Assn. of Realtors said last month.

DOJ_NMG_0107156

Although the company's takeover would allow stockholders "to realize the value of Realogy's fundamentally strong businesses," the purchase price "takes into account the substantial pressures and uncertainties facing the residential real estate markets that may well continue for some time," Chief Executive Henry R. Silverman said in a statement.

Realogy shareholders would receive $30 a share, Parsippany, N.J.-based Realogy said Sunday in a statement. That's 18% more than the stock's closing price Friday. Including debt, the deal is valued at about $9 billion, Realogy said.

The purchase must be approved by the holders of a majority of Realogy's shares and receive antitrust and insurance approvals. Realogy and Apollo plan to complete the purchase by the middle of next year.

Under the terms of the agreement, Realogy may solicit proposals from other potential buyers until Feb. 14. Any proposals would be considered by a special committee and independent advisors, Realogy said.

The company is the world's largest real estate franchisor. Its companies include Century 21, Coldwell Banker, Coldwell Banker Commercial, ERA and Southeby's International Realty. It has 15,000 employees worldwide and 320,000 brokers and sales associates.

Harrah's Close To Accepting $16.7 Billion Buyout (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders And Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

Gambling giant Harrah's Entertainment Inc. yesterday was poised to accept a bid valued at roughly $16.7 billion from two private-equity firms, which are expected to retain its current management and strategy, people familiar with the matter said.

If a deal with Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group is completed, Chairman and Chief Executive Gary Loveman is expected to stay at the helm of Las Vegas-based Harrah's, the world's largest casino operator by revenue. The company's plans -- including a redevelopment of its numerous properties and vast land holdings along the Las Vegas Strip -- also are expected to proceed, these people said.

The two sides continued last night to haggle over the final details, and it was unclear whether they would reach an agreement today. A deal, which would value Harrah's at $90 a share in cash, would be one of the largest private-equity buyouts.

Harrah's plan for Las Vegas, delayed for months but due to be announced early next year, is expected to include not just new hotel rooms, but also huge retail and restaurant offerings intended to keep visitors on Harrah's property as long as possible. Industry observers have speculated that a buyout by private-equity firms would let the plans proceed without pressure from Wall Street and public investors, who have worried that the Las Vegas construction market has grown increasingly crowded and expensive in recent years. The Harrah's redevelopment faces competition from a $7 billion MGM Mirage project and a proposed $4 billion complex from Boyd Gaming Corp., among others.

If a sale is reached, Harrah's could shed some of its 39 casinos around the nation in order to streamline an organization that ballooned with new employees and properties after its 2005 acquisition of rival Caesars Entertainment Inc.

On Friday, shares of Harrah's were up 40 cents in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading to $79.50, 13% below the final offer price. They had climbed as high as $83.33 after the initial unsolicited bid was announced more than two months ago. Harrah's had a market value on Friday of about $14.8 billion. Last year, the company earned $236.4 million on revenue of $7.1 billion. As of Sept. 30, Harrah's was carrying about $11 billion of debt.

A deal, which would require top executives from Apollo and Texas Pacific to undergo the lengthy casino-licensure process in every jurisdiction where Harrah's operates casinos, would be expected to close within 12 to 18 months, according to people with knowledge of the details. There will likely be a provision in the proposed deal that includes penalties for Apollo and Texas Pacific should the deal take longer to close.

Harrah's has been mum on the status of any deal since it first received an $81-a-share offer from the private-equity firms on Oct. 2. That bid was quickly raised to $83.50 a share in cash, but Harrah's never acknowledged the updated offer or any subsequent movement by potential bidders.

The company set a Dec. 12 deadline for any bids, and it received one for $87 a share from Apollo and Texas Pacific as well as an $87-a-share cash-and-stock offer from regional casino operator Penn National Gaming Inc., Wyomissing, Pa. Harrah's board began meeting last Wednesday and reviewed the offers through the weekend, according to people close to the matter. Officials from Harrah's and the private-equity firms declined to comment. An official from Penn National didn't immediately return a call for comment.

Harrah's is just the latest target in a private-equity buying binge this year that shows no sign of abating during 2007. With so much cash to spend, the buyout shops are plunging deeper into areas where they were once loathe to tread. Such areas include casinos, which deliver reliable cash flows but require the rigorous licensing process that delves into individuals' financial and personal backgrounds.

Earlier this month, Station Casinos Inc., a Las Vegas casino company that caters largely to the city's local gamblers, announced it had received an offer of $81 a share from a management-led consortium to take the company private. The company's board continues to evaluate that bid.

Consolidation Sweeps Through Chipmaking Industry (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, December 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Computer chip companies are in a dealmaking frenzy — gobbling up rivals or going private — as they attempt to adjust to a changing industry.

Nearly $40 billion worth of deals have been announced or closed since August, and chip analysts say more are on the way. The biggest so far:

·Freescale Semiconductor, the former chipmaking arm of Motorola, was bought out by a consortium of investors for $17.6 billion this month. A majority stake in Philips Semiconductor was similarly purchased for $11 billion in September. It is now named NXP.

·Computer processor-maker Advanced Micro Devices bought graphics chipmaker ATI Technologies in September for $5.4 billion. A few weeks later, ATI rival Nvidia bought PortalPlayer, best known for making chips for Apple's iPod media player, for $352 million.

·LSI Logic has announced plans to buy Agere Systems for $4 billion. Both make chips for consumer electronics and other devices.

Among smaller deals: SanDisk's $250 million purchase of Matrix Semiconductor and Cisco Systems' $12.5 million purchase of Nemo Systems. Cellphone chipmaker Qualcomm made two recent acquisitions: Airgo Networks and a division of RF Micro Devices. Terms were not disclosed.

"You're seeing consolidation," says LSI Logic CEO Abhi Talwalkar. "It offers you at least some immunity to this crazy market."

The semiconductor industry has always been competitive. But the tech boom of the 1990s created dozens of midsize chipmakers, says semiconductor analyst John Barber at researcher Gartner.

Many went after specialty markets, because there used to be big technical differences between products. A PC and a cellphone, for example, didn't share many parts.

Now, digital technology has eliminated many of the differences, says Michael Hara, a vice president at Nvidia. That's allowed bigger chipmakers such as Nvidia, best known for its PC chips, to push into phones, music players and other once-specialized markets.

At the same time, development costs are soaring as chips get tinier. In 2000, a typical chip cost between $5 million and $10 million to design, Barber says. Today, it's between $10 million and $20 million.

That makes it hard to be a midsize chipmaker. "You either need to niche yourself or get bigger," Talwalkar says.

Going private is another option, says chip analyst Jim Feldhan at Semico Research. Eliminating the day-to-day pressure of Wall Street can make it easier to do business in a tough market, he says.

Feldhan and others say they expect consolidation to continue. "Smaller companies are looking for help," says Hara.

But don't expect the industry to shrink to one or two big players, Feldhan says. Start-ups keep entering the market, because chipmaking can be lucrative, he says. Some will quickly be acquired or go out of business; others will likely become the next generation of major players, he says.

Congress Prepares For Hearings Over Airline Mergers (AZREP)

By Marilyn Geewax, Cox News Service

The Arizona Republic, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - Even though the new Congress won't convene until January, key lawmakers are preparing for hearings to examine the economic impact of possible airline mergers.

Many members of Congress are condemning the potential deals, while few, if any, are supporting the idea of industry consolidation.

Congress has no direct role to play in approving mergers, but it could help sway public perceptions and increase political pressure on the Department of Justice to reject the airline transactions on antitrust grounds.

advertisement

Perhaps the most controversial of the potential acquisitions involves US Airways Group Inc.'s unsolicited $8.7 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. The two carriers have routes that overlap significantly along the East Coast, and hubs relatively near each other in the West.

Congressmen representing Phoenix, Atlanta, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Salt Lake City, Charlotte, N.C., and other cities where the two airlines have major operations fear that a merger would wipe out jobs, diminish air service and drive up ticket prices, said Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga.

Concerns about a loss of competition grew dramatically last week when UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, and Continental Airlines Inc. announced they are considering a possible merger. In addition, AirTran Holdings Inc. offered to buy Midwest Air Group Inc. for about $290 million. With so many carriers now in play, the number of concerned congressmen is on the rise.

"We can voice our opinion," Lewis said, "and because we all represent different parts of the country, speaking out could have a tremendous impact on what happens."

James Oberstar, D-Minn., is incoming chairman of the House Transportation Committee. He said recently that if it appears that the US Airways takeover of Delta would be going forward in the new year, he would hold a hearing into the matter. Teri Rucker, a spokeswoman for Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the incoming chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, said that panel also plans to hold a hearing.

Oberstar said by publicly exposing the potential dangers of airline consolidation, his committee may be able to "throw cold water" on merger mania.

"We can nudge the Justice Department to take the action" it must to prevent a loss in competition, he said.

Oberstar also said opposition to consolidation is bipartisan.

"I've heard from members on both sides of the aisle," he said, as worries have grown about the economic impact on jobs and service.

"I haven't heard anyone come forward and say this is a really good deal," he said.

Michael Boyd, president of the Boyd Group Inc., an aviation consulting firm, agreed that Congress would become involved because so many lawmakers represent cities with huge stakes in the outcome.

"There are a lot of dogs in this fight," he said.

Delta management opposes the transaction with US Airways, but if it were to go forward, the two carriers would have to drop routes to avoid expensive redundancies and overcome antitrust concerns.

That could eliminate jobs and flights, especially in smaller cities, like Savannah, Ga., and West Palm Beach, Fla.

"Any Georgia legislator who doesn't stand up against this merger isn't doing his constituents any good," Boyd said.

Earlier this month, the two chief executives, Delta's Gerald Grinstein and US Airways' Doug Parker, each met with Oberstar to discuss their views.

Darryl Jenkins, an industry consultant based in northern Virginia, said that whether Congress gets deeply engaged in the issue of airline competition may depend on the views of creditors owed money by Delta, which is under the protection of Bankruptcy Court.

If by next month those creditors are in favor of the deal, then the bankruptcy judge may in turn support it, and the transaction could be completed. That would push the other deals forward, too.

"Everyone is interested in this (Delta deal) because if one merger goes through, then two or three other mergers will follow," Jenkins said.

Unfriendly Skies (WSJ)

By Robert W. Crandall And Clifford Winston

DOJ_NMG_0107159

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

Almost on cue, members of Congress have responded to US Airways' interest in acquiring Delta Air Lines, and a possible deal between United Airlines and Continental Airlines, with predictions that fares will rise, service will be reduced, and more mergers will surely follow. Not to appear soft on threats to competition, the Justice Department has expressed its concern that the proposed mergers raise antitrust concerns and has vowed to conduct thorough investigations.

Mergers may harm consumers if they are the route to (or the root of) market power and ultimately allow the combined firm to increase consumer prices and reduce service. In such cases, enforcement of the antitrust laws could improve consumer welfare by blocking the mergers before they occur and by discouraging future harmful mergers. But our research suggests that government efforts to address such threats do little to improve consumer welfare and sometimes actually reduce it. More importantly, government often misses fruitful opportunities to benefit consumers because it eschews market-oriented policies.

The empirical evidence on the main factors that influence airlines to merge their operations does not suggest that these mergers are driven by a desire to obtain market power. In a 2000 paper, Steven Morrison and Clifford Winston analyzed the determinants of all the actual and attempted airline mergers since the 1978 deregulation. They found that carriers are generally not motivated to merge for anticompetitive reasons, but rather by the acquiring carriers' desire to expand their international routes -- which are far more profitable than most domestic routes due to government-to-government agreements that limit entry -- and by the acquired carriers' need to be rescued from financial distress.

Clearly, gaining access to additional international routes is an important consideration in the two mergers under discussion. US Airways would gain from having access to international routes currently served by Delta, and United and Continental could gain from expanding their portfolio of international routes. Because Delta is in the process of emerging from bankruptcy, it appears to have solved its financial problems on its own and is therefore not enthusiastic about a merger with US Airways.

What about evidence on the effects of previous mergers on travelers? In the aforementioned paper, the authors found that the USAir-Piedmont merger and the Northwest-Republic and TWA-Ozark mergers, which were opposed by the Justice Department but approved by the U.S. Department of Transportation (at the time DOT had jurisdiction in the matter), had benign effects on fares while increasing travelers' accumulation of frequent flier miles.

Today's airline industry has become very competitive because of the expansion of low-cost carriers such as Southwest, JetBlue and AirTran, whose combined market share currently approaches one-third of the domestic market. Any potential anticompetitive effects of a US Airways-Delta merger or a United-Continental merger would be quickly tempered by the responses of these low-cost carriers. The larger "legacy" (pre-deregulation) carriers now face competition from low-cost carriers on nearly three-quarters of their domestic routes. Low cost carriers have expanded their presence even to such markets as Philadelphia and Pittsburgh that had traditionally been dominated by legacy carriers, and they are poised to provide additional capacity in any markets that are adversely affected by any of the proposed mergers. Low-cost carriers can and do move very quickly to mitigate any increase in fares initiated by the legacy carriers -- whether caused by a merger or simply by unilateral action.

Ultimately, the effect on travelers of changes in airline market structure caused by mergers or other forces depends on the specific carriers that exit a market and the specific carriers that take their place. For example, a recent study found that in the year 2000 travelers would have been $20 billion worse off due to higher fares and less frequent service if Southwest Airlines did not exist at all. In contrast, consumers would actually have been better off during that year if US Airways had left the industry because more efficient carriers, such as Southwest, would have entered its routes. Because any initial contraction in service and increase in fares by merged legacy carriers is likely to attract entry by low-cost carriers, fares would quickly decline to or possibly below pre-merger levels and return service frequency to or possibly above pre-merger levels. Trustbusters would be prudent if they simply exercised a reasonable degree of patience in the wake of such combinations.

Rather than attempt to combat airline mergers, government policy makers could have a much more beneficial impact on the welfare of air travelers by pursuing policies that increase competition on international and domestic routes. With one swift stroke, deregulation of international markets would eliminate a major motivation for many of the mergers. The U.S. government has been negotiating so-called "Open Skies" agreements with other countries for several years, but negotiations have invariably stalled for a variety of reasons. One issue is the government-mandated limit on foreign ownership of U.S. carriers, currently capped at 49%. Ending any limits on foreign ownership would also make it easier for struggling U.S. carriers to attract foreign capital to help solve their financial problems and possibly eliminate another major reason that carriers seek a merger.

Allowing foreign carriers to serve U.S. domestic routes (cabotage) would provide another source of competition that would benefit air travelers. Think of how foreign transplants have transformed the automobile and steel industries to the benefit of consumers. Sir Richard Branson has expressed an interest in starting up a Virgin Airways operation in the U.S. but faces ownership issues, among other obstacles.

Still another way that policy makers could potentially stimulate airline competition is to privatize U.S. airports, thereby allowing them to compete aggressively for air carrier service. Competitive entry at some airports is constrained by insufficient gates and terminal space. Given the contractual relationship governing publicly owned airports and the incumbent airlines that help pay their bonds, some airports have limited incentives to attract additional carriers.

Federal policy makers' attempts to correct market failures, such as those deriving from monopoly power, have in practice frequently been an abject failure, and missed opportunities to improve market performance. The latest round of proposed airline mergers illustrates the problem: Policy makers will undoubtedly find it politically expedient to use the antitrust laws in an inappropriate manner, instead of standing up to the entrenched interests who oppose changes in current government policies that would have a far more beneficial impact on competition in the airline industry.

National Meddling Presents Serious Challenge To Brussels (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, December 18, 2006

The European Commission has regularly courted controversy by blocking mergers and takeovers. Last week, the Brussels-based regulator learnt that defending such deals can be just as hard.

The Commission could only look on in frustration as Spain's Abertis and Autostrade, the Italian motorway operator, abandoned a €25bn ($33bn) merger that would have created a new pan-European infrastructure group.

The deal was waved through by Brussels in September, but the groups came under such intense political and regulatory pressure from the Italian government that they decided to call off the deal on Wednesday.

Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, and Charlie McCreevy, the EU internal market commissioner, had warned Rome repeatedly to mind its own business. Both ruled that Italy's objections violated EU law and threatened to file a legal challenge - but their intervention still failed to save the deal.

Worryingly for Brussels, Abertis/Autostrade is noisolated case. While cross-border mergers and takeovers in the European Union have increased during recent years, a growing number of deals face stiff opposition from governments and national regulators.

To the Commission - which by law has the exclusive power to scrutinise and approve big pan-European mergers - such national meddling presents a serious challenge to its authority.

To business leaders, it serves as a powerful reminder that large cross-border deals can be torpedoed by political and national sensitivities - in spite of the regulatory and political backing from Brussels.

The first sign of trouble came last year, when the Commission fought a fierce battle with the Italian central bank governor over his attempt to derail two foreign takeovers of domestic banks.

After months of legal wrangling and political drama, Antonio Fazio was forced to leave office, clearing the way for ABN Amro's takeover of Banco Antonveneta.

The next clash over banking takeovers took place in Warsaw, after the Polish government tried to prevent Italy's UniCredit from winning control of the nation's second largest bank, BPH.

Brussels launched legal proceedings against the government in March this year, but was sidelined when UniCredit struck a deal with Warsaw that allowed the takeover to go ahead in return for selling 200 of BPH's 466 branches.

By far the biggest test of the Commission powers and ability, however, is still being played out. Eon, the German energy giant, has been waiting for almost a year for Spain to drop its objections to its €37bn take-over bid for Endesa, the Spanish utility. Brussels has already ruled the government's objections illegal under European law, and has opened infringement procedures against Spain.

The problem for the Commission is that Brussels lacks the instruments to bring recalcitrant governments into line.

Although the regulator enjoys sweeping powers to police the internal market and crack down on antitrust abuses and illegal subsidies, it usually takes several years for the Commission to bring its cases to an end.

Infringement cases - in which governments are prosecuted for breaking EU laws - require the Commission to send out a first warning, which is followed by a formal ruling and, eventually, a challenge before the European Court of Justice.

The court then takes two to three years to issue a final ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0107161

As Mr McCreevy told the Financial Times in a recent interview: "Companies can't wait around forever. They can't wait for law to take its course. Some member states know that. They know that time is their friend."

While in the past the mere threat of Commission action could be enough to bring recalcitrant member states into line, many officials fear that a growing number of member states today have no qualms about ignoring Brussels' edicts.

The waiting game is made even easier, as one senior Commission officials pointed out last week, by the recent "proliferation of national regulators" in EU member states.

This means that many obstacles to cross-border takeovers are not directly thrown up by governments, but by more or less independent bodies not directly answerable to Brussels.

What Green Activists Don't Want You To Know (WSJ)

By Senator James Inhofe (R., Okla.)

Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

I write to applaud your Dec. 4 editorial "Global Warming Gag Order1." I also read with interest the responses from your readers ("Senators' 'Chill Out' Letter to Exxon Creates a Heated Reaction2," Letters to the Editor, Dec. 13). As chairman of the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works for the past four years, I have held several hearings examining the fears of manmade catastrophic global warming, and I have spoken publicly on this issue more than any other senator.

Those who wish to quell opposing viewpoints on manmade global warming do so because of a number of inconvenient facts about both the science of climate change and the economic harm their proposed "solutions" would cause the American people.

What the activists and special interest groups don't want you to know is that 60 scientists wrote an open letter to Canadian Prime Minister Harper this year stating, "If, back in the mid-1990s, we knew what we know today about climate, Kyoto would almost certainly not exist, because we would have concluded it was not necessary."

They don't want you to know that Claude Allegre, a leading French scientist who is a member of both the U.S. and French National Academies of Sciences, recently defected from the alarmist camp, and now says the cause of global warming is "unknown." They don't want you to know that the U.N.'s Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change is expected to revise downward significantly its estimate of man's contribution to global warming in its upcoming Fourth Assessment Report or that another U.N. report recently found that emissions from cows were more damaging to the planet than C02 from cars.

And they certainly don't want you to know that their favored solution, the Kyoto Protocol -- often referred to by supporters as merely a "first step" -- would cost the average American family more than $2,700 a year while having no measurable impact on global temperature.

Despite enjoying a huge advantage in funding over skeptics, liberal special interests groups have had almost no impact in convincing policymakers to pass economically destructive climate legislation in the U.S. Now it appears those same alarmists are panicking and adopting a new agenda: to silence those who disagree with their views. I find it troubling that two of my colleagues in the Senate would join the campaign to shut down the ongoing debate on the science of global warming.

Europe V. America On CO2 (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 18, 2006

Climate-change activists and Democrats on Capitol Hill are gearing up to push the U.S. to limit so-called greenhouse gases. In their telling, America must save mankind from an eco-Apocalypse by adopting the arbitrary targets popular with Europe and other Kyoto Protocol signatories.

Well, let's look at results in the real world, as opposed to this Kyoto spin. Recent data show that placing artificial limits on emissions hasn't done all that much to reduce emissions, and may even be counterproductive. Contrary to caricature, the American approach offers more promise than Europe's.

As the nearby chart shows, CO2 emissions growth in the U.S. far outpaced that of the 15 "old" members of the European Union from 1990-95 and especially from 1995-2000, when Mr. Climate Change himself, Al Gore, was the second-most powerful man in America. But, lo, the U.S. has outperformed the EU-15 since 2000, according to the latest

U.N. data. America's rate of growth in CO2 emissions from 2000-04 was eight percentage points lower than from 1995-2000.

By comparison, the EU-15 saw an increase of 2.3 points. Only two EU states, Britain and Sweden, are on track to meet their Kyoto emissions commitments by 2010. Six more might meet their targets if they approve and implement new, as yet unspecified, policies to restrict carbon output, while seven of the 15 will miss their goals.

Cynics play down America's improvement, noting that its economy cooled from the earlier years to 2000-04. True, but the EU-15 also had lower economic growth in the latest period and still saw its emissions growth rate double. What's more, the U.S. economy expanded 38% faster than the EU-15 in 2000-04, and its population twice as fast. So the trend lines, for now, are reversing. That may frustrate the green lobby because so much of its fund raising depends on vilifying the U.S. But facts are facts, no matter how underreported they are.

Europe's dismal record is explained by its approach to reducing emissions. The centerpiece of the Continent's plan is a carbon-trading scheme in which companies in CO2-heavy industries receive tradable permits for a certain amount of emissions. If they emit more CO2, they must buy credits from firms that are under quota. The idea is to force companies to emit less CO2 by making it prohibitively expensive to keep the status quo.

All this scheme has done so far is provide further proof that government cannot replicate the wisdom of markets. A red-faced European Commission recently admitted that it allowed more permits than there were emissions in 2005-07, keeping permit prices low and undermining the entire system. When Brussels tried to make amends by ordering several member states to cut carbon permits by 7% more than expected for 2008-2012, industry and national capitals squealed. The market hadn't priced in such a dramatic reduction. With carbon permits trading relatively cheaply, firms have been able to get by with minimal changes to the way they do business. That has minimized Kyoto's economic impact.

Once the supply of permits is more in line with the eurocrats' ambitious environmental goals, though, expect European industry to take a big hit. The number of firms moving manufacturing work to countries without emissions caps, such as China and India, will only grow. That might make Europe's emissions data look good, but it will have zero net effect on the world's production of greenhouse gases.

Some companies may elect to purchase cleaner equipment, but the rising cost of compliance -- i.e., buying more carbon permits at higher prices once the supply is slashed -- will eat into the money available for developing the next generation of clean technology. In short, Europe offers no magic solution for capping greenhouse gases.

America may even have a few things to teach the Old World. The U.S. strategy has been to keep economic growth strong and provide incentives for private industry to develop cleaner technologies. For instance, the Bush Administration has proposed $1 billion in tax credits for nine new coal-fired power plants that will double efficiency and reduce pollution compared with older generations. China is picking up on these tactics. This year it bought $58 million in machines from Caterpillar Inc. that trap methane in coal mines and use it to power electric generators.

If global-warming activists were as interested in lowering air temperatures as they are in expanding the role of the state, they'd understand that the key to reducing carbon emissions lies in unleashing the private sector, not capping it. That's the real lesson from the policies -- and the results -- in Europe and the U.S.

Marin Changes Course In War On Marijuana Growers (MIJ)

By Joe Wolfcale

Marin Independent-Journal, December 18, 2006

The dope growers who ripped up Marin parkland to plant acres of marijuana valued at more than $100 million this summer, then got away as authorities moved in, might not be as lucky next year.

County sheriff, federal park rangers and other officials are planning a crackdown aimed at ensuring extensive growing operations don't take root again.

"There's no doubt we'll be intensifying our efforts next year," said Marin County sheriff's Lt. Scott Anderson, who coordinates county marijuana eradication efforts. "I don't think anyone thought we'd see the level of marijuana cultivation on public lands that we did this season."

Authorities say 43,356 marijuana plants were discovered in 24 plots, many on both sides of Bolinas Ridge, with most flourishing in elaborate, sophisticated grow sites on public land.

Marin County Sheriff Robert Doyle said deputies will coordinate plans with other Marin authorities to thwart the growers.

DOJ_NMG_0107163

"Not only is it illegal, it's also a huge threat to the safety of our residents," Doyle said. "We'll do everything we can to eradicate the problem.

"We fully intend to flush it out."

Point Reyes National Seashore Superintendent Don Neubacher wants federal aid so rangers can step up eradication efforts next season.

Neubacher said Point Reyes authorities have already met to discuss the problem.

"We need more aerial surveillance and more of a presence and adequate personnel to prohibit this from happening again," Neubacher said. "What happened this summer was shocking to us. These growers are bold. I'd say there's a good chance they will come back. I think the money will be well spent."

The grow sitesA total of 26,165 marijuana plants were found on Marin Municipal Water District land, 10,335 on national seashore land and 6,856 on private property between July 21 and Sept. 20.

In one grow site, plants more than 10 feet tall were so laden with plump sinsemilla buds, the stalks sagged parallel to the ground because of the weight.

Law enforcement agencies seized the plants in a series of raids that included agents of the National Park Service, U.S. Park Police, the Marin County Water District, Sonoma and Marin County sheriff's offices and the Marin Major Crimes Task Force. Aerial support was provided by the California Highway Patrol and Air National Guard.

No one was charged with growing the marijuana, although two Hispanic men from the East Bay were arrested for allegedly carrying a concealed weapon in a car and possession of cocaine and methamphetamine. They were found in a remote West Marin area during the harvest season.

Police did come close to nailing some of those tending the marijuana gardens, however - so close that officers found plates of steaming scrambling eggs left behind by the growers.

Another time, three Hispanic men were seen in the pot fields, but fled.

"Take a walk on Mount Tamalpais and see the vastness of the area and you can certainly see how someone could pull this off," Doyle said. "Growing and harvesting marijuana is big business. It's high-quality stuff. I know an exhaustive search was done and I think we made a significant dent."

In early September, authorities discovered 1,200 plants that were cut and stacked near Kent Lake waiting to be destroyed the next day, were stolen overnight. The pot was valued at $3 million.

Doyle said stationing deputies overnight at the remote site was not worth the risk of a confrontation with growers.

"It just wasn't worth it," Doyle said. "I don't know if there's any sense of embarrassment on our part," in light of the stolen pot, he said. "We just couldn't put deputies out in the middle of nowhere. If there had been some sort of shootout, people in the community would have vilified us."

Drug sophisticates

The growers used complex irrigation systems, sometimes running several hundred feet of plastic tubing through trees and shrubs to provide water. Some farms were discovered 30 to 40 yards from a trail, while others were accessible only after lengthy hikes in rugged terrain.

Some sites had man-made reservoirs that used water siphoned from streams and creeks. Remote hillsides were terraced. Trees were cut, pesticides and fertilizers used, and small game slaughtered. Piles of debris were found.

The camp sites providing shelter for the growers included propane stoves and sleeping quarters. Most grow sites were several years old - tree roots had begun to grow over camp structures.

Most camps had escape routes. Ammunition was found, but no guns.

"Putting a pricetag on the environmental damage is difficult," Point Reyes National Seashore spokesman John Dell'Osso said. "This type of large-scale planting threatens the very mission of the park service. We want to provide the natural resources of the area while providing safe recreational opportunities for our residents, both of which were threatened."

He noted the farms in remote areas, sometimes hidden by a canopy of trees, were nurtured by rich soil and nearby water sources. "These plants have incredibly ideal situations," Dell'Osso said.

Marin Conservation Corps and National Park Service personnel worked last week to clear debris from the grow sites. A helicopter from the Air National Guard lifted out more than 60 cubic yards of waste, including irrigation pipes, garbage bags, fertilizer and pesticides.

Point Reyes National Seashore officials said it cost more than $100,000 to clean up the mess.

"We are now at a point where we can safely say we have removed all of the debris left behind," Colin Smith, the seashore's chief enforcement ranger, said. "We hope this will discourage these individuals from coming back."

Statewide problem

Marin's situation is similar to what is happening across California.

Marin was ranked 12th this year in marijuana seizures, according to statistics from the state attorney general office's Campaign Against Marijuana Planting.

The state reported 1,675,681 plants confiscated in 2006, up from 1.1 million the year before, with most seized on public lands. Estimated wholesale value of the statewide haul was put at $6.7 billion.

"Certainly for us it was a record seizure year," said Kent Shaw, assistant chief of the Department of Justice's Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement in Sacramento. "We definitely realize we have to put more resources in that direction. We're definitely seeing signs we're having an impact on some of these organizations. I'm not surprised at all by what we're seeing.

"They're not only growing more of it, the potency of what they can produce is getting better" and far more potent, he said. "Some of these stalks look like trees."

Authorities say they believe cultivation efforts are the work of major Mexican drug cartels that find growing pot in California is easier than smuggling it across the border.

Authorities back the assertion by pointing to similarities in the construction of the marijuana camp sites, evidence found at the sites, including food, trash and gear, and intelligence gathered across the state by narcotics investigators.

State authorities estimate more than 50 percent of marijuana sold in the United States originates from California. The growers are predominately Mexican nationals in the United States illegally, state and local officials say.

"We've found cells operating numerous grow sites," state narcotics chief Shaw said. "They're large organizations. It just depends on how far their tentacles reach. In some counties, these people operate with fairly liberal impunity.

"They select areas that will create the greatest return and where they're less likely to go to jail."

Frank Egger of Fairfax, who served on the Town Council for four decades, said more needs to be done to protect the community.

"Our residents hike and recreate all over that mountain," Egger said. "I think that's the issue no one's looking at. This county's going to have to get a handle on it, and they better do it fairly quickly.

"It's clearly a safety issue," he said. "We could be doing more."

Water board member Alex Forman was shocked about the scope of the operation.

"I think it shows how incredibly vast the wild open spaces are in these areas," Forman said. "I wouldn't blame local law enforcement. I'm not surprised no one's been caught. I don't think anyone was expecting they'd be so clever about it.

"We know now there's a problem. We just have to control it."

National parks officials said the drug sweeps this summer might scare off growers.

"We're hoping that the effort we put out this summer will hopefully deter this type of illegal activity," Dell'Osso said.

Doyle said before next year's growing season begins, officials with the sheriff's department will sit down with other authorities and devise a coordinated plan.

"It's not going to be easy," Doyle said. "People have to realize these are vast areas and these people are dangerous."

But Doyle said one thing is for sure.

"We'll do everything we can to eliminate those groves."

IMMIGRATION:

Swift Raids (NYT)

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

When federal immigration officials raided six plants owned by Swift & Company, the world's second largest beef and pork processor, last Tuesday, they brought Spanish translators. They knew exactly what kind of worker is found in low-paying, strenuous jobs in this country: recent Latino arrivals with limited skills and, in many cases, no legal papers. Nearly 1,300 people — almost 10 percent of Swift's work force — were taken away in what the government said was the largest but not the last assault on the underground immigrant economy.

The raids have led some people to heap scorn on Swift and, of course, on the illegal immigrants, particularly the dozens of detainees who have been charged with identity theft and other crimes. But doing so misses the bigger picture. Swift and its workers are merely Exhibit A in an immigration system that is failing in all of its parts.

It is a system that rewards illegality and pays lip service to lawfulness and order.

Swift insists that it is a model corporate citizen. It obeyed the rules, which require it to check workers' identity papers and file so-called I-9 forms attesting to that. And it went further, participating in the federal Basic Pilot program, a system of checking Social Security numbers that President Bush has touted as a way to crack down on immigration fraud. The company says that prying any more aggressively into workers' legal status would leave it open to civil rights lawsuits.

The Swift raids are powerful evidence that I-9's and Basic Pilot are ineffective and disingenuous, a nod to by-the-books technical lawfulness that allows a far vaster world of illegality to flourish. Swift and other large-scale employers of immigrants, like farms and hotels, may insist that they never knowingly hire people illegally. But as long as the jobs they offer are the kinds whose pay and conditions consistently fail to attract native-born Americans, their protests will ring hollow. This system is brilliantly efficient at bringing lots of cheap products and services to market, which is great unless you mind its essential lawlessness, anonymity and reliance on an enormous work force of silent, compliant, frightened people whose bitter choice is to stay here illegally or go home and be desperately poor.

Swift, by its lights, was doing the right thing. The federal government was doing the right thing, waking up, belatedly, to workplace enforcement. And yet it's impossible to see how this will work over the long term. Immigration reform built on piecemeal enforcement — factory raids and border walls — won't solve the problem of the 12 million illegal immigrants already here. The American economy wouldn't stand the shock if the Swift raids were multiplied to levels beyond the merely symbolic.

The system needs what Mr. Bush and Congress have refused to give it: a way to end the sham. Comprehensive immigration reform is good for the economy, giving companies access to a secure and stable work force. It is good for national security, allowing law enforcement to go after real criminals and leave honest working people alone. And it is good for the immigrant workers across the country, terrorized by Tuesday's raids, who just want to keep doing their jobs, no matter how hard and distasteful.

Focus Shifts North Amid Terror Fears (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, December 18, 2006

Police, lawmakers say 'the forgotten border' is difficult to secure — and too easy to cross

Along slim sections of the nation's vast northern border, anyone can drive the back roads that flow from Canada into the United States.

So it's only natural for Caribou (Maine) Police Chief Michael Gahagan to be concerned that terrorists could be in some of those cars.

"It worries us every day," Gahagan says.

It worries local police, Border Patrol officers and members of Congress alike.

Many say the USA's northern border — more than 4,000 miles of open and largely unprotected land — remains a dangerously weak link in the nation's post-9/11 effort to shore up security against terrorist attacks.

To cross it legally, people can pull up at any of 89 official points of entry from Seattle to eastern Maine. Some are huge, multilane crossings that process tourists and commercial trucks; others are small crossings, open only certain hours of the day, that generally handle only cars.

But it's still easy to cross illegally, across hundreds of small back roads, through the woods or over the mountains.

"It's a big, porous border and it's very difficult to secure," says Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., who made headlines in 2001 when he held up an orange traffic cone in the Senate as an example of the kinds of barriers often used to block roads on the Canadian border.

Five years later, Dorgan says, northern border security has improved — but not nearly enough. "There should be no less anxiety about it," he says. "Terrorists will search for the weakest link when trying to enter this country."

The flood of illegal immigrants across the U.S. border with Mexico has focused the government's attention south for years.

Roughly nine out of 10 of the nation's 12,000 Border Patrol agents work along the Mexican border, in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California. The Homeland Security Department's new multibillion-dollar plan to tighten security with more cameras, sensors and fences is being set up along the southern border, starting in Arizona.

The northern border "really is the forgotten border," says T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, the union that represents Homeland Security's Border Patrol agents. "We're just so vulnerable up there."

Critics of the government's southern-border focus, such as Dorgan, acknowledge the need to concentrate on the area where hundreds of thousands of people illegally enter the country each year to look for work and sell drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0107166

Intelligence officials long have said the northern border is no less of a security concern when it comes to the potential for terrorists to sneak in to the United States.

Homeland Security Department chief intelligence officer Charles Allen won't talk about classified intelligence reports, but he says not a day goes by when he doesn't worry about the northern border.

The arrests in Canada last June of 17 alleged terrorists with 3 tons of ammonium nitrate, the same kind of fertilizer used to make the deadly Oklahoma City bomb in 1995, intensified those concerns in Allen's department and at police stations along the border.

Local police such as Gahagan say that although security at official points of entry — including at big, busy crossings such as Detroit and Buffalo — has tightened considerably, there are still hundreds of easily accessible routes into the USA.

And just as technology has helped the Border Patrol zero in on suspects, it also has helped those trying to sneak people or drugs into the country, Gahagan says.

Smugglers, who are paid up to $10,000 per person to get people across the border, drop illegal immigrants in the woods with a Global Positioning System device so the person picking them up can easily find them, Gahagan says.

And in his remote area, Gahagan says he has no way of knowing how many people make it across — or, disturbingly, why they're trying to get through.

"It's very rugged country and extremely difficult" to protect, says Rep. Norm Dicks, D-Wash. "We need more agents. And we're gonna have to use more technology."

Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar says more resources are on the way, including new helicopters and more agents. He disputes the notion that the Canadian border has been "forgotten" by the Homeland Security Department. "The northern border is at the forefront of our concerns about security and enforcement," he says.

But agent Darryl Schermerhorn, who works in northwest Washington state, says the equipment the Border Patrol relies on now is nearly useless in some cases. Cameras along the border are poorly placed and often fog up or shake, the ground sensors fail, and the old four-wheel-drives and ATVs break down. He added that there are too few agents to read camera images and to patrol remote areas.

If a camera does pick up someone crossing a remote road, by the time an agent can get there to check it out, the person is long gone — into the United States.

"It happens all the time," Schermerhorn says. He says the agents on the northern border are no better off in terms of protecting the country than they were on 9/11.

"If someone has a vested interest in getting in here," he says, "they'd probably be better off coming across the northern border."

TAX:

Some Americans Abroad Turn In Passports (NYT)

By Doreen Carvajal

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

PARIS, Dec. 17 — She is a former marine, a native Californian and, now, an ex-American who prefers to remain discreet about abandoning her citizenship. After 10 years of warily considering options, she turned in her United States passport last month without ceremony, becoming an alien in the view of her homeland.

“It’s a really hard thing to do,” said the woman, a 16-year resident of Geneva who had tired of the cost and time of filing yearly United States tax returns on top of her Swiss taxes. “I just kept putting this off. But it’s my kids and the estate tax. I don’t care if I die with only one Swiss franc to my name, but the U.S. shouldn’t get money I earned here when I die.”

Historically, small numbers of Americans have turned in their passports every year for political and economic reasons, with the numbers reaching a high of about 2,000 during the Vietnam War in the early 1970s.

But after Congress sharply raised taxes this year for many Americans living abroad, some international tax lawyers say they detect rising demand from citizens to renounce ties with the United States, the only developed country that taxes it citizens while they live overseas. Americans abroad are also taxed in the countries where they live.

“The administrative costs of being an American and living outside the U.S. have gone up dramatically,” said Marnin Michaels, a tax lawyer with Baker & McKenzie in Zurich.

So far this year, the Internal Revenue Service has tallied 509 Americans who have given up their citizenship, said Anthony Burke, an I.R.S. spokesman in Washington. He said complete figures were still being calculated.

DOJ_NMG_0107167

Applications to renounce citizenship are on the rise at the American Embassy in Paris, according to an official who spoke on condition of anonymity. At the embassy in London, the number of applications was reported to be fairly stable over the past two years, though it would be hard to spot a recent surge because applications are taking longer to process there than in past years. Neither embassy would disclose exact figures. A spokeswoman for the American Embassy in London, Karen Maxfield, said Americans living abroad usually took the step "because they do not have strong ties to the United States and do not believe that they will ever live there in the future."

"All have two citizenships and generally say they would like to simplify their lives by giving up a citizenship they are not using," she said.

Andy Sundberg, a director of the Geneva-based American Citizens Abroad, has been tracking renunciations dating back to the 1960s through annual Treasury Department figures. He considers the numbers low compared with some stretches in the past, like the early 1970s. But he has also noticed a recent increase in interest among Americans in renouncing their citizenship.

"I think the cup is boiling over for a number of people living abroad," Mr. Sundberg said. "With the Internet and the speed and the ubiquity of information, people are more aware of what's happening." With the changes in the tax laws, he said, some Americans living abroad fear "they're heading toward a real storm."

He cited a survey by the American Chamber of Commerce in Singapore, which polled its members in October and November and found that many were considering returning to the United States because of the higher taxes.

Concern about taxes among Americans living abroad has surged since President Bush signed into law a bill that sharply raises tax rates for those with incomes of more than $82,400 a year. The legislation also increases taxes on employer-provided benefits like housing allowances.

The changes, enacted in May, apply retroactively to Jan. 1, 2006.

Matthew Ledvina, an international tax lawyer in Geneva, said demand for legal counsel on the citizenship issue was coming largely from American citizens who held second passports and who had minimal ties to the United States.

"There are incentives to do it before the end of the year so that you can minimize your future reporting," he said.

Mr. Ledvina said the waiting period for appointments at the American Embassy in London had increased from a few days to more than three and a half months. He said he had recently approached embassies in Vienna, Bern, London, Paris and Brussels before finally getting an appointment in Amsterdam for a client's renunciation application.

The legal ritual of renunciation is largely unique to the United States because other countries base taxation on residency, not citizenship, according to Ingmar Dörr, a tax lawyer with Lovells in Munich.

"We don't have that issue," he said. "We only have the problem that rich people who don't want to pay taxes in Germany just move to a lower-tax country in Switzerland."

For some Americans abroad, motivations for renunciation are mixed and complex, involving social concerns, political displeasure with their government and other reasons. But it is clear that taxation plays a large role for many, even though few are willing to admit that because of penalties enacted a decade ago.

In 1996, Congress tried to address a wave of tax-driven expatriation by the wealthy by requiring former citizens to file tax returns for a decade and forbidding Americans who renounced their passports for tax reasons from visiting the United States.

But in practice, the government is mainly interested in wealthier ex-citizens with a net worth of more than $2 million — few of whom pay further United States taxes because they generally avoid making American financial investments after giving up citizenship, Mr. Ledvina said. As for the rule barring entry to tax refugees, he said, it has not been enforced by the authorities.

Still, that possibility prompts ex-citizens to tread carefully and remain discreet about their choices.

"I didn't give up my citizenship with a sense of hostility," said an importer in Geneva who renounced her citizenship as President Bush was taking office in 2001. "I gave it up with a sense of fairness."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Judicial Nominee's Chance May Be Coming To End (JH)

By Alicia Wittmeyer

Jackson Hole Star-Tribune, December 18, 2006

BOISE, Idaho -- If President George W. Bush renominates a controversial Republican Idaho lawyer for a seat on the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, he's going to have a tough fight ahead of him, Senate leaders say.

The nomination of Boise lawyer William Gerry Myers III, which has been stalled in the Senate for three years, may have almost reached an end. Now that Democrats have control of Congress, a consensus has formed on Capitol Hill that Myers -- who has stirred up some of the fiercest Democratic opposition of all Bush's judicial nominees -- has almost no chance of getting through.

"I think he's definitely a well-qualified nominee, but whether he can make it through a Democratic Congress is a different story," said Dan Whiting, spokesman for Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho, who first submitted Myers to Bush as a potential nominee.

That's especially true now that some have suggested Myers may have misled senators about meeting lobbyist Jack Abramoff during questioning by the Senate Judiciary Committee, lawmakers say.

"The reality is this president's nominee hasn't been able to win support for the past two years from a Congress controlled by his own political party," said Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., incoming chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Leahy said in a speech last week that Bush "squandered an opportunity to fill Idaho's vacancy" on the 9th Circuit by renominating Myers on Nov. 15, in a last-ditch effort to push his nominees through before Congress changed hands.

Myers, the former top lawyer at the Interior Department, was first nominated to the seat in May 2003 to fill a vacancy left by retiring Idaho Judge Tom Nelson.

He's one of two Bush nominees from Idaho -- along with Idaho 6th District Judge Norman Randy Smith -- up for judgeships on the 9th Circuit, which hears appeals from courts in nine Western states, as well as the territories of Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands. Republicans have supported Smith and Myers, saying they would bring ideological balance to one of the most liberal courts in the nation.

When Myers was nominated, liberal groups immediately attacked his record of opposing environmental protections when he worked as a lobbyist for cattle and mining interests. American Indian groups have also spoken out against him, in particular for an Interior Department decision that cleared the way for a gold mine in California that they say threatens tribal lands.

"I think the Senate ought to only confirm individuals who merit the highest respect in the country," said Nan Aron, President of the liberal judicial watchdog group Alliance for Justice, which has been a major voice against Myer's nomination. "And certainly William Myer's record proves that he's unqualified for a lifetime seat on the 9th Circuit."

A report in The Denver Post raised more questions for the embattled nominee earlier this month. The story, based on information obtained through a public records search, showed Myers was among two dozen people who attended a dinner party with Jack Abramoff in September 2001.

But in a March 2005 letter to Leahy, Myers wrote that after "searching his memory and files" he couldn't remember having any contact with Abramoff.

Abramoff, a once-powerful lobbyist, pleaded guilty in an influence-peddling scandal and is cooperating with a wide-ranging Justice Department probe of alleged corruption on Capitol Hill and in the executive branch.

If Bush renominates Myers, the nominee will have many questions to answer about his ethics record, Leahy said in the Dec. 8 speech.

Leahy suggested this month that Bush nominate Smith for the judge seat that would be filled by Myers. California Democrats have opposed Smith's nomination, because he would replace a California judge, but have had less to say about his record than Myers'.

But Republican lawmakers say they're skeptical of the chances for even the less controversial potential judges.

"I think it's going to be tough to get any of President's Bush's nominees through a Democratic Congress," Whiting said. "We'll see what Chairman Leahy has in store."

Green Laws No Slam-dunk In New Congress (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Steps to curb global warming. Tougher fuel economy standards for automobiles. Repeal of massive tax breaks for the oil industry.

Environmentalists are busy these days crafting their holiday wish-list, giddy about the prospects for success in the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

But industry groups are gearing up to fight, and their forces may include more than the usual Republican allies.

"We're confident that there are plenty of Democrats who know and understand us," said Charles Drevna of the National Petrochemical & Refiners Assn.

DOJ_NMG_0107169

Drevna's confidence is probably well-placed. The politics surrounding environmental issues have proved hard to predict, largely because the potential economic impact of stronger regulation tends to scramble partisan loyalties. Democrats from auto-making states, for example, have fought efforts to mandate stricter miles-per-gallon rules for vehicles.

These crosscurrents could cause the push for an aggressive environmental agenda to become an object lesson on the limits of what can actually be achieved in the Congress that will convene in January.

New chief for key panel

Key to the enthusiasm among environmentalists is the impending change at the helm of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who has called global warming "the greatest challenge of our generation," will replace Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), who has dismissed man-made climate change as a "hoax."

Perhaps no other transfer of committee chairs is as dramatic. Boxer drives a hybrid Toyota Prius. Inhofe drives a Jeep.

Boxer says that California's new global warming law — whose goal is to reduce emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases by 25% by 2020 — should be a model for the nation. Inhofe derides it as a "job killer."

Boxer received a perfect score from the League of Conservation Voters for her Senate votes this year. Inhofe received a 0.

Environmentalists say that after years of fighting GOP attempts to roll back environmental laws, they now can go on the offensive.

"It's as if the winds have shifted and proponents of environmental controls finally have the winds at our backs," said Frank O'Donnell of Clean Air Watch.

The precarious nature of this shift was driven home last week when Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) underwent brain surgery.

Should Johnson die or resign and be replaced by a Republican, the GOP would regain control of the closely divided Senate, denying Boxer and other Democrats committee chairmanships. With Johnson's condition improving, however, plans for the Democratic takeover are proceeding.

Difficult goals

Boxer has set an ambitious agenda that includes advancing legislation on global warming and reinstituting a tax on the oil and chemical industries to pay for clean up of contaminated sites. She also has pledged tough oversight of the Environmental Protection Agency.

But she faces a daunting task in trying to move her bills through Congress — and past President Bush's veto pen.

For anything controversial, such as mandatory caps on emissions linked to global warming, she probably would face Senate filibusters — perhaps joined by some of her fellow Democrats.

Nor will assent from the House be an easy matter.

Asked to assess Boxer's prospects for enacting a law to cap emissions, Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) said: "She hasn't called John Dingell."

Dingell, a Michigan Democrat who will chair the House Energy and Commerce Committee, has been a champion of automakers, who have opposed California's effort to reduce tailpipe emissions linked to global warming. He also has helped thwart congressional efforts to toughen miles-per-gallon rules for vehicles.

Although noncommittal about specific legislation, Dingell made clear that his approach differs from Boxer's.

"Democrats want a sound environment," he said. "But remember, this is a big country, and different parts of the country are affected differently" by environmental laws.

He did say, however, "I cannot support destituting the United States to address the problem of global warming. If we're going to pitch in … then everybody is going to have to do so."

Boxer plans to hold hearings on climate change, including calling California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger to Washington to testify about the state's cutting-edge laws on the issue.

Boxer pledges to take global warming legislation "as far as we possibly can take it" with the makeup of the new Congress.

And even if her efforts fall short, environmentalists say she and like-minded lawmakers could play a crucial role in laying the groundwork for future federal action.

House maneuvering

As industry lobbyists prepare to battle Boxer, they also are looking for help from Democrats to block an effort planned by House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) to repeal tax breaks for oil and natural gas industries.

DOJ_NMG_0107170

"We do have a lot of Democrats who understand the importance of domestic oil production," said Jeff Eshelman of the Independent Petroleum Assn. of America, a trade group for independent oil and gas producers.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), incoming chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, has taken a cautious posture on repealing the tax breaks.

"Many of those tax breaks were put in place to encourage production here in this country," he said in a recent interview on CNBC. "It's very much in our interests that we maximize production here and not depend more and more on foreign oil."

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu (D-La.), who represents an energy-producing state and sometimes votes with Republicans on energy issues, also looms as a potential obstacle to Pelosi's efforts.

"Programs such as those that encourage deep water [energy] exploration or help keep our small, independent energy producers in business are among the keys to American energy independence," she said in a statement.

No easy job

Evidence of the daunting task facing environmentalists — even when dealing with a Democratic Congress — was provided during debate on a wide-ranging energy bill in 2005. A proposal to significantly increase fuel-economy requirements for automobiles drew 28 votes in the 100-member Senate.

"On several occasions over the past six years, members of Congress have rejected, by an overwhelming bipartisan majority, legislative attempts to increase fuel economy standards," said Charles Territo, director of communications for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, a trade association.

Environmentalists acknowledge the obstacles they face.

"It took a long time to bring about some of our core environmental protections that have been in place for decades," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, legislative director for the League of Conservation Voters. "This is not going to happen overnight, and we recognize that."

Just Do It (NYT)

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

The Democrats promised sweeping ethics reform in this year's campaign, and now they have control of Congress. But procrastination is a legendary Capitol vice, and there are worrisome signs that the Democrats may already be indulging.

The most glaring lapse of the Republican-controlled Congress was the abject failure of the House ethics committee to police misbehavior, highlighted by the panel's studied avoidance of the Jack Abramoff lobbying mess. Members were shielded and allegations muffled.

The need for an independent body staffed by nonpartisan professionals to investigate complaints would seem beyond debate. Good ideas for that were circulating this year, notably a proposal for the creation of an office of public integrity by Representatives Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, and Martin Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts.

Rather than committing wholeheartedly to the need for an independent panel, the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi, is opting to create a bipartisan task force to study the issue and report back by mid-March. If the motive is a careful sales pitch to secure the idea on both sides of the aisle, voters may tolerate a two-month study approach. But the task force should not be an excuse for more delay or to dumb down a much-needed anticorruption monitor. The fact that the Republican leader, John Boehner of Ohio, has signed on to the study is hardly encouraging, since he was a principal in the failure of the last Congress to pass effective ethics controls.

We are more encouraged by early papers prepared by Ms. Pelosi's office that outline other needed reforms, beginning with the banning of gifts, meals and travel money from lobbyists. Putting the brakes on lawmakers' borrowing corporate jets for regal-class travel is another promising step reported to be on the Democrats' agenda, as are requirements to disclose and limit the earmarking of pork spending for favored pleaders.

But Ms. Pelosi hasn't shared these ideas with the public yet, and each detail can attract a thousand devils in the muddlers' art of Washington deal-making. Ms. Pelosi and Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, have a great opportunity to lead the way with clear proposals, offered up front before the usual Congressional scrum blurs the issue.

The two new leaders should keep foremost in mind the voters' anticipation of a cleaner, more quickly responsive Congress.

Unions Hope Democrats Will Counter GOP Policy Changes (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

DOJ_NMG_0107171

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

As a member of the Democratic minority, Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.) fought a Bush administration policy that increasingly opened up federal jobs to private contracting.

Although he and colleagues had some success, Van Hollen said that when the 110th Congress takes over next month and the Democrats are in the majority, he will have greater ability to combat the administration's policies on federal employees. "It's had a demoralizing effect on the federal workforce," he said. "I do think now we're in a better position to fix things."

For the past six years, unions that represent most federal employees have argued that the Bush administration has been hostile to the needs of workers -- keeping pay raises low, trying to prevent employees from organizing in the departments of Defense and Homeland Security, and outsourcing government jobs to the private sector.

Now, the change in control of Congress gives unions much more powerful allies in the legislative branch. Democratic lawmakers pledge to work on issues of central concern to the unions, but the administration outlines other priorities for the workforce and disputes any notion it has not pursued a course beneficial to workers.

The election of Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) as majority leader is seen as a boon for federal workers. Hoyer, who will be the House's second most powerful figure, represents Southern Maryland's 5th Congressional District, home to thousands of government employees.

Hoyer said he will work to create a "more cooperative relationship with the White House" to ensure pay raises and to contain rising health premiums. While he praised several Republican colleagues, such as Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), outgoing chairman of the Government Reform Committee, Hoyer said: "Republicans made it much harder to ensure federal employees received fair and competitive annual pay adjustments. . . . They also did virtually nothing to help resist the White House effort to outsource federal jobs to private contractors."

John Gage, national president of the American Federation of Government Employees, said that as soon as the Bush administration came to power in 2001, it wiped out "our partnerships with agencies, and since that time our ability to sit down with the agencies and work out problems and differences has really declined." AFGE is the largest union of government employees, representing 700,000 federal and D.C. government workers.

With the new Congress, Gage said, "we're hoping not only we'll have more access to committees and Congress, but that word will get down to the political appointees in the departments."

Labor unions were a major source of support to Democrats in the midterm elections. The AFL-CIO spent roughly $40 million on a get-out-the-vote operation, and union members contributed substantial sums to Democratic candidates. Hoyer was not in a competitive race but received more than $300,000 in money from labor-affiliated political action committees.

Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, called labor's criticisms of the administration "rhetoric."

"The idea that management would be hostile to employees is just foreign to me," Johnson said. "Everybody's focused on what we can do that's smart and professional and effective, to make sure we have the best and most effective workforce possible."

Johnson said the administration's goal in its final two years is to strengthen a management system that rewards employees who perform exceptionally. "I believe that employees want to be respected. They want to be challenged. They want to be held accountable. They want to grow professionally," he said.

According to the unions, federal workers have more pressing needs.

"We expect the Democratic Congress to support the federal employees with regard to wages, health insurance and retirement," said Beth Moten, AFGE's legislative and political director. "We expect them to support federal bargaining rights, and we expect them to work for reforms so that federal workers don't lose their jobs because of procedures or political influence,"

No issue has been more divisive than "contracting out," the phrase critics use to describe the outsourcing of government jobs to private contractors. Unions have fought efforts to transfer jobs at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, the Internal Revenue Service and elsewhere. Colleen M. Kelley, national president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said one worrisome trend is the IRS's interest in using private debt-collection agencies. "There are going to be problems with taxpayer privacy," she said.

In 2003, the administration revised Circular A-76, which lays out the rules for job competitions, to direct agencies to evaluate whether more jobs could be privatized. The effort has faced stiff resistance on Capitol Hill. Democrats have argued that agencies are under pressure to privatize jobs that should be confined to government workers.

"I am not opposed to privatization, but if it occurs with federal jobs, then it must be legal and fair," said Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.), incoming chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on commerce, justice and science, which will have authority over many of these issues. She also has many government employees as constituents.

The debate over privatization, among other disputes, is occurring against a backdrop of profound demographic change in the civil service. In the next 10 years, as much as 60 percent of the government's 1.8 million workers will become eligible to retire. "The long-term challenge for the federal government is to continue to attract the best and the brightest people. We've got to make sure we can replenish the federal workforce," Van Hollen said.

Appropriate Appropriations (NYT)

The New York Times, December 18, 2006

The incoming Democratic chairmen of Congress's appropriations committees announced last week that a big chunk of the federal government will operate next year under 2006 budgets. That will allow the new Congress to focus on programs where needs are great — and rising — like veterans' health care and low-income housing. It will also free up time to pursue a fresh legislative agenda.

Under normal circumstances, operating under old budgets would be a dereliction of lawmakers' duty to weigh needs and resources, and spend tax dollars accordingly. But the current situation is hardly normal. The departing Republican-led Congress was supposed to nail down the government's spending plans for 2007 before it adjourned, but it neglected to do so, passing only 2 of the 11 required appropriations bills.

The delay was initially due to infighting among Republicans, sparked by President Bush, who gunned for a spending limit that was so low that many Republicans were unwilling to support it openly. The delay dragged on as Republican leaders refused to hold difficult votes before the midterm elections. Then, during the lame duck session, they did not even try to complete the spending bills — a crass attempt to force the new Democratic majority to expend time and energy cleaning up the mess.

By choosing to operate much of next year's government at the 2006 level, the Democrats avoid that trap. But solving the political problem creates some practical ones. President Bush, for example, will have to step up during the year to ask for more money as needed.

But Mr. Bush is to blame for this problem in the first place. Next year he will have the chance to make amends, if only he will take it.

OTHER NEWS:

So Long, Farewell, Auf Wiedersehen, Rumsfeld (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has been on the "farewell" circuit of late, going to see the troops in Iraq, saying goodbye to various folks at the Pentagon and around town.

On Friday we had the fine Pentagon parade featuring the Army fife and bugle something. (Marching with the Army you've got, not the Army you want.) Earlier this month, he did interviews with two news folks -- Laura Ingraham and, for balance, Cal Thomas.

Rumsfeld told Thomas he hadn't given much thought about what he'd do after today's departure. Thomas invited him over to his home theater -- complete with surround sound -- to watch a movie.

"I have not been in six years to the movies," Rumsfeld said.

"It'll be fun," Thomas said in the broadcast interview. "I got one for you that'd you'd really love. . . . It's called 'Akeelah and the Bee.' Starbucks is involved in it. It's about a little African American girl, 11 years old, growing up in Crenshaw in L.A. Her father's been killed by some hoodie. Her brother's about to become a hoodie. And they discover that she has this great gift of spelling. Laurence Fishburne is in it, Angela Bassett. She goes out and redeems everybody. I mean, this is about every value we care about. Hard work, overcoming, honesty, integrity. I'm sitting there, I'm bawling away. I'm cheering for the kid."

"It's A-K-E-E-L-A-H -- maybe," Thomas said, " 'and the Bee' as in 'spelling bee.' I guarantee you I'll give you your money back if you don't love this movie. You will absolutely love this. It's got everything. There's not a white guy -- the only white guy in it is the principal of the school. Everybody else is minority, everybody else gets along."

"Did you like 'The Sound of Music'?" Rumsfeld asked.

DOJ_NMG_0107173

"Of course I liked 'The Sound of Music,' " Thomas said.

"Well, so did I," Rumsfeld said. "People laugh at that."

"Well, I want to [tell] you something," Thomas said. "I stalked Julie Andrews for 40 years before I finally got her."

"Is that right?"

"On our shelf, a picture of us having tea together in New York," Thomas said.

"How long ago?" the defense secretary asked.

"Two years. But I . . ."

"She's showing her years," Rumsfeld observed.

"Yeah, well -- no, she looks great," Thomas said.

Rumsfeld laughed.

"I waited for her outside the Majestic Theater in 1962 in the rain," Thomas continued. "That's when it started."

Rumsfeld laughed.

"And that's how I opened the letter to her, you know," Thomas said, according to the transcript. "So anyway, you got more important things to do." Well, maybe not.

"Good to see you," Rumsfeld said.

"Good to see you," Thomas said, "and let's stay in touch."

Maybe lunch sometime?The Replacements

The rumor mill is working overtime at the Agency for International Development, where morale is said to be a bit low these days. Word is that the administrator, former Eli Lilly and AT&T top executive Randall Tobias, is leaving early next year after his big reorganization plan, putting the office of reconstruction and stabilization into AID and rearranging a bunch of other offices, is finalized.

There were even candidates being mentioned as likely prospects to replace Tobias -- John Herbst, who runs the reconstruction office, and James Kunder, assistant AID administrator.

Tobias was said to be going back to Indiana to run for governor or senator or something. But the governor, Mitch Daniels, is a Republican and is apparently running again in 2008. Sen. Richard Lugar (R) was just re-elected and Sen. Evan Bayh (D) isn't up until 2010.

Asked Friday whether Tobias was on his way out, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "He's got no plans to leave in the near future."After State, State School

While we're at it, the rumors at Foggy Bottom were that counselor Philip Ze likow, who had been advising his close friend of many years, Condoleezza Rice, on Iraq and other matters, was eased out last month because he wasn't on the same page with the administration.

Some insiders felt there were suspicious leaks of his internal memos -- taking issue with administration policy on Iraq and the Middle East -- in books and articles, culminating with one at the end of November in the New York Times that was headlined: "Rice's Counselor Gives Advice Others May Not Want to Hear." That one was called the last straw.

Rice, cornered by The Washington Post's Peter Baker after her visit last week to The Post, said she didn't give him the boot. "Nooooo," she said. "Philip and I had an understanding that it would be about two years. So he had to go back or he'd lose his chair" at the University of Virginia.

Must be a really tough crowd down there in Charlottesville.

Justice? (WP)

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

NINE YEARS, four months and 18 days: That's the amount of time that Lawrence Banks spent in a Maryland prison for murdering two people, one of whom was his 17-year-old son. The appalling details of this case -- which have come to light only because Mr. Banks is now a figure in a new double-murder investigation -- raise troubling questions about Maryland's justice system. So far, there haven't been any answers -- only the spectacle of public officials trying to shift the blame.

The facts, as reported by The Post's Ruben Castaneda and Eric Rich, are chilling. A 22-year-old woman and her 9-month-old baby were shot to death in Laurel last week. The woman had recently sought a protective order against Mr. Banks, a man with a history of violence -- including tossing his infant daughter through a glass window in 1976 and the separate murders of his son and another man on the same day in 1991. For those two murders, Mr. Banks was able to get a remarkable deal from prosecutors in Baltimore City and Anne Arundel County. Instead of the 30-year maximum set out by Maryland sentencing guidelines for each second-degree murder, he got 20 years for each, served concurrently.

The Baltimore prosecutor said she wanted to avoid putting Mr. Banks's teenage daughter, who had been subjected to abuse, through the ordeal of testifying. Anne Arundel prosecutors said they had no evidence or motive. Each looked to the other to see that a dangerous murderer was put away. Why didn't Anne Arundel push for Mr. Banks to serve his sentence consecutively with the Baltimore sentence, rather than concurrently? Was Baltimore consulted about the bargain brokered in Anne Arundel? Should the sentencing judges have rejected the plea agreements? It is noteworthy that the Baltimore judge who sentenced Mr. Banks for his son's murder denied his 1993 appeal for a reduction saying the "sentence was too low to begin with."

There are always extenuating circumstances in the prosecution of criminal cases. But this was a botched case, and it raises new questions in Maryland's long-running debate over truth in sentencing. Mr. Banks served less than half of his sentence, and his release came about not as a result of being judged eligible for or worthy of parole but because of diminution credits granted for good behavior. It makes sense to reward inmates who have model records or earn educational credits, but because the lenient treatment afforded Mr. Banks is not unusual, it is time for a thorough examination of the system. We hope that need is noted by Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) and the incoming members of the General Assembly.

Flag-Burning Foe Says Law Not Needed (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 18, 2006

Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens has twice voted to outlaw burning the U.S. flag, in memorable dissents that emphasized the flag's great symbolic value.

Now, however, the 86-year-old justice says there is no need to amend the Constitution to protect Old Glory.

In 5-to-4 decisions in 1989 and 1990, the Supreme Court held that burning the flag is protected by the First Amendment.

"Ironically, those decisions seem to have solved the problem because no one burns flags anymore," Stevens said in a speech to the Chicago Bar Association in September, recently aired on C-SPAN.

Congress has continued to try to amend the Constitution to permit legislation that would prohibit desecration of the flag. The Senate fell one vote short of the required two-thirds majority in June.

In 1989, Stevens, a World War II veteran, evoked images of the D-Day assault on Omaha Beach in writing that if liberty and equality are worth fighting for, "it cannot be true that the flag that uniquely symbolizes their power is not itself worthy of protection from unnecessary desecration."

He allowed then for the possibility that the court's majority might have gotten it right. "Conceivably, that value will be enhanced by the Court's conclusion that our national commitment to free expression is so strong that even the United States, as ultimate guarantor of that freedom, is without power to prohibit the desecration of its unique symbol. But I am unpersuaded."

Stevens said in Chicago that he remains convinced that he interpreted the Constitution correctly and continues to be proud of his dissents in the flag desecration cases.

Yet he paid homage to the five justices -- William J. Brennan Jr., Thurgood Marshall, Harry A. Blackmun, Antonin Scalia and Anthony M. Kennedy -- who carried the day in both cases.

"If one were to burn a flag today, the act would convey a message of freedom that ours is a society that is strong enough to tolerate such acts by those whom we despise," Stevens said. "Today, one could not burn a flag without reminding every observer that we cherish our freedom."

Internet Critical Tool For Political Cash (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, December 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Retired naval officer Joe Sestak out-raised incumbent Republican Curt Weldon to seize a House seat in suburban Philadelphia — aided by nearly $900,000 in Internet contributions. "Netroots" activists helped propel Virginia's incoming Democratic Sen. Jim Webb in the early days of his race. And in 18 hours, the Internet-based political action committee MoveOn.org Political Action raised $500,000 online to buy airtime for advertising that targeted Republicans in four congressional races.

This year's midterm elections offered fresh examples of the ways the Internet is changing how candidates in both parties raise money as they scramble to collect the $20, $30 and $50 donations needed in the aftermath of changes to campaign-finance laws in 2002 that banned large donations. Online fundraising has proved a cost-effective and lightning-fast method to raise cash, rally the faithful and promote or smear office seekers.

It also could transform fundraising in presidential races. "It's inevitable that the Internet will become the principal means of fundraising from now on," said Anthony Corrado, a campaign-finance expert at Colby College in Waterville, Maine. "It's the only way you get a million people to each give you $10 on the same day."

ActBlue, an online clearinghouse that has raised more than $17 million since 2004, plans to use that power. It recently won approval from federal regulators to stockpile cash for yet-undeclared presidential candidates.

While Democrats have scored many of the high-profile campaign successes on the Web, Republicans say they are not far behind in capitalizing on the Internet's potential.

ABCPAC.com, a GOP website launched in September, has raised $300,000 for candidates, said its chairman, Frank Donatelli, a public-affairs consultant and longtime Republican activist. Following ActBlue's lead, the PAC also will raise money to draft presidential contenders.

It's hard to quantify Internet contributions in campaigns because candidates and political parties are not required to disclose which donations came via the Web, but online activity played a role in several closely watched races this year.

In Pennsylvania, online cash to Sestak helped catapult the political newcomer ahead of the 10-term congressman in the money race. Campaign-finance reports show Sestak raised nearly $3.2 million to Weldon's $2.7 million through Nov. 27. Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral, said he had no clue of the role the Web would play in the race when he announced his candidacy Feb. 2.

He caught on. Sestak called for U.S. troop withdrawals from Iraq by the end of 2007 — a message that resonated with netroots activists opposed to the war. In June, he spoke to liberal bloggers at the first YearlyKos convention. (Attention to the race also spiked with news of an FBI probe into whether Weldon used his influence to help his lobbyist daughter. Weldon has denied wrongdoing.)

The Web became "an absolutely critical source" of money, Sestak said. In four days, a single e-mail solicitation raised $88,000.

Candidates such as Jesse Ventura, the former pro wrestler who became Minnesota governor in 1999, and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who sought the presidency in 2000, were among those with strong Web appeal years before former Vermont governor Howard Dean outpaced better-known rivals through online fundraising before the 2004 Democratic presidential primaries.

"Television benefited candidates who were telegenic and, most importantly, people who had money because TV is so expensive," said Carol Darr, director of the Institute for Politics, Democracy & the Internet at George Washington University. "The Internet tends to benefit the mavericks who have a compelling message."

Web-based activists such as Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn.org, relish their new role. In the 2005-06 election cycle, MoveOn.org Political Action, the group's PAC, raised $28 million, he said. That's almost on par with the $30 million the group collected during the high-profile presidential campaign two years ago, Pariser said.

"The presidential race that's coming up is one where online fundraising has the power to completely level the playing field," he said.

Benjamin Rahn, the 29-year-old president of ActBlue, said the Web opens up politics. "Anyone can get up and running and have a website for free. People don't need to go through the traditional party structures."

That said, online watchers say Internet givers have more in common with large donors than they do the general population. "They don't have as much money as big donors, but they are still middle-aged, upper income and highly educated," Darr said.

Just because the midterms are over, that doesn't mean the race for cash via the Internet is done. Recently, the National Republican Congressional Committee issued an e-mail plea to supporters to help retire $2 million in debt. Donors who sent in $100 or more were promised a 2007 daily planner.

Outgoing committee spokesman Ed Patru declined to say how much the appeal has raised. Contribution amounts garnered from the Internet are "not something we discuss," he said. "It's something that gets into the strategy side of things."

TERRORISM NEWS:

British Pilots Oppose Armed Air Marshals. The Washington Times (12/17, Hudson, 88K) reports that British pilots "oppose a proposed change in the United States' visa-waiver program that would require participating countries to provide armed security on U.S.-bound foreign airlines or allow U.S. air marshals to protect such flights. 'Any need to carry weapons on aircraft should be recognized as a failure of the airport security systems,' the British Air Line Pilots Association (BALPA) said. British pilots favor 'proper passenger profiling' through a 'database of potential terrorists, their known aliases and all their known associates as well as known disruptive passengers,' the association said in a statement."

NYTimes Sees "Unfinished Business" In Bush's War On Terror. In a lengthy editorial entitled "Unfinished Business," the New York Times (12/17, WK11, 1.16M) criticizes "the legacy of a Republican Congress that enabled the President's imperial visions of his authority. It leaves the new Democratic majority with much urgent, unfinished business to restore due process, civil liberties and the balance of powers." The Times discusses how military tribunals used a "broad definition of 'illegal enemy combatant,' which could subject legal United States residents to summary imprisonment; its repudiation of the Geneva Conventions to allow the president to decide what prisoner abuse he will permit; its denial of the basic right of appeal to any noncitizen designated as an 'illegal enemy combatant'; and its stripping of the powers of federal courts. The law is also far too lax on the use of coerced evidence and secret evidence." The Times condemns CIA secret prisons "which house foreign citizens who are often abducted off the streets of their hometowns and brutalized," and also outlines the presidential and congressional initiatives that "authorized the National Security Agency to ignore federal law and eavesdrop on telephone calls and e-mail between the United States and other countries without a warrant" while "Republican lawmakers have introduced bills that would legalize the program after the fact." The Times ends its list with a discussion of American "spy agencies' prewar failure to figure out that there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, and promised to deliver a report on whether Mr. Bush and his team pressured the agencies to cherry-pick or hype evidence — or lied outright to Americans." The Times concludes that "the midterm elections prove that…the American public has not been blinded or deafened to what this country stands for and the need for truth."

Columnist Examines Jurisprudence In Hamdan Case. In her Washington Post (12/17, B2, 690K) column, Emily Bazelon writes that "on Wednesday, a federal judge dismissed the habeas corpus petition of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a detainee at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." Bazelon asserts that Hamdan's petition "was dismissed because of the Military Commissions Act, which Congress passed last fall to take away the habeas rights of Guantanamo Bay detainees. The MCA is a classic example of 'jurisdiction stripping.'" Bazelon argues that the judiciary branch is weakened when Congress is able to "take cases away from judges." Bazelon asserts that "the MCA is such a law" that can strip "the right to habeas corpus granted by federal statute." Bazelon asserts that Congress should not be able to "strip the courts of the authority to hear certain claims or cases" and that "these days it's more often judges whom we can count on, if we can count on anyone, to stand up for the procedural rights of murder defendants and Guantanamo Bay detainees."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Democrats Will Push To Limit Domestic Spying Program. The AP (12/16, Kravets) reported that while federal agents "continue to eavesdrop on Americans' electronic communications without warrants a year after President Bush confirmed the practice, and experts say a new Congress' efforts to limit the program could trigger a constitutional showdown. High-ranking Democrats set to take control of both chambers are mulling ways to curb the program Bush secretly authorized a month after the Sept. 11 attacks. The White House argues the Constitution gives the president wartime powers to eavesdrop that he wouldn't have during times of peace." The AP added that the President, "however, can veto legislation, including a law demanding the National Security Agency obtain warrants before monitoring communications. Such a veto would force Congress to muster a two-thirds vote to override;" which remains probable since Bush "said he had no intention of halting what he called a "vital tool" in the war on terror."

Federal Court Takes Closer Look At Padilla Case. The Los Angeles Times (12/17, Serrano, 850K) reports that a federal judge in Miami "will soon make one of the most important rulings in the Bush administration's war on terrorism and decide whether to publicly explore evidence that an accused terrorist was brutally mistreated for years inside a one-man isolation cell," Jose Padilla. Padilla's lawyers "have asked U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke to set him free because of the abuse they say he suffered. Though federal judges rarely dismiss criminal charges before trial, the allegations are so extreme that they may prompt Cooke to hold a pretrial hearing in what would be the first public court examination into how detainees were handled after the Sept. 11 attacks." The Times points out that Padilla has asserted that he has been tortured in many ways during his federal detainment and much of this case "is weighing on the judge" who "began her career as a Legal Aid attorney and public defender in Michigan" and who has ruled "in August that there were overlapping charges" and "she dismissed the most serious conspiracy charge, which could have brought a life sentence, and left intact two counts that could get Padilla 20 years for providing material support to terrorists."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Takes "Most Dramatic" Options For Iraq Off Table. Coverage of President Bush's deliberations on Iraq saw a troop increase as likely while simultaneously questioning the depth of his commitment to rethinking his strategy.

The AP (12/16) reports President Bush "has taken the most dramatic options off the table as he tries to change direction in Iraq, leaving him with a list of modest military and diplomatic moves to announce in the new year." He is seen as likely to "reject the Iraq Study Group's recommendation to pull back most combat forces by early 2008," as well as the idea of "a firm exit timetable." On the other hand, "he is likely to endorse the basic idea recommended by the commission and others to condition at least some U.S. military and economic engagement to the performance of Iraq's government." A diplomatic option that Bush is "almost certain to reject: stop trying to recruit greater Sunni participation in a unified government and cast U.S. fortunes with the Shiite and Kurdish majority." Other diplomatic options include wooing "the Sunni elite by guaranteeing them a share of oil revenue and reversing the previous policy of 'de-Baathification'" and building "a more structured network of Arab nations with a goal of clamping down on the violence in Iraq." He "also is likely to endorse a renewed effort to resolve other Middle East conflicts as a means to an end in Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/17, A1, Baker, 690K) reports that Bush faces a "difficult" question: "At what point does determination to a cause become self-defeating folly? ... The notion of bending to critics or even popular will cuts against his grain. Yet it is also true that at key moments in his career, Bush has been willing to abandon his position and shift gears dramatically," such as when he embraced creating DHS "as if it were his own" idea. The Post continues, "Still, history shows that Bush does not change easily or quickly. For years, he ignored calls to fire" Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "even when the idea was endorsed by his own top aides. He waited to oust Rumsfeld until the day after midterm elections handed Congress to Democrats." Reagan-era DOD Assistant Secretary Lawrence Korb said Bush "has basically confused stubbornness with steadfastness."

Bush Ponders Sending More Troops To Iraq. All three networks reported on the possibility of more troops being sent to Iraq. ABC World News (12/16, lead story, 2:05, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "We begin with the war in Iraq and the very real possibility that many more American forces will soon be headed there. In the wake of the scathing report from the Iraq Study Group, President Bush promised to come up with a new plan." ABC (Morrell) added, "Officials close to the process tell ABC News Mr. Bush will likely call for a major surge of US troops in Iraq. That surge could include more than 30,000 additional troops, bringing the total to 164,000, the highest level yet. Most would go to Baghdad, more than doubling the number there. The rest would head to al-Anbar Province, a last-ditch attempt to stabilize the heart of Iraq." Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker,: "As it currently stands, the army is incapable of generating and sustaining the required forces to wage the global war on terror." Morrell: "Still, President Bush has asked his military planners to figure out how to get the extra forces he wants. Among the ideas being considered, extending tours of duty from 12 to 15 months for soldiers, from seven to nine months for Marines."

The CBS Evening News (12/16, story 4, 2:15, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "In the battle for Iraq, the surge in US troops…could be launched within days after Christmas.

Here's the plan: boost the current 134,000 troops by another 15,000 to 20,000." CBS (Pinkston) added, "In an unusually quiet day for Baghdad, car bombs and kidnappings gave way to a new effort to negotiate a way out of a nightmare of violence. At an Iraqi reconciliation conference, embattled Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki issued a surprising invitation. Asking former members of Saddam's army to come back to fight insurgents. But there's a growing feeling in Washington that the key to ending the violence is not the Iraqi but US troops. President Bush seems prepared to send more troops."

NBC Nightly News (12/16, story 3, 1:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "We turn now to the war in Iraq and the options facing President Bush. While the White House says tonight that all options are still on the table, the President is considering one plan to increase the number of US troops in Iraq." NBC (Corke) added, "For some time here in Washington, there has been talk of increasing US force levels in Iraq, but there appears to be a sharpening of that debate here as the White House is to be strongly considering an increase of 20,000 troop or more to that region. That number could actually grow to more than 30,000, we're also told and that's significant because when you think about it, there are only about 17,000 or so troops in and around Baghdad. ... Most of the additional forces there would be there to train the Iraqis, not simply to increase the number of boots on the ground patrolling the streets of Baghdad."

Ex-DOD Secretary Perry Warns Of Iraq "Quagmire." The Washington Post/AP (12/17) reports that former Defense Secretary William Perry "said Saturday that Iraq could turn into a 'quagmire' if the Bush administration fails to change strategy." Perry delivered the "Democratic Party's weekly radio address," in which he "reiterated the recommendations of last week's report from the Iraq Study Group" and said, "I believe that [quagmire] is likely to happen if we 'stay the course' in Iraq."

Composition Of Bush's Advisers Shifts. ABC World News (12/16, story 2, 2:15, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "John Hendren takes a look at who will have the President's ear." ABC (Hendren) added, "President Bush's listening tour already marks a dramatic change from the small group of advisers he called on in the lead-up to the war in Iraq. Paul Wolfowitz, then the deputy Defense Secretary, first proposed invading Iraq in an emergency cabinet meeting at Camp David less than a week after the 9/11 attacks." Observer "fear while he may be hearing many options in the end he may end up only listening to the same key advisers whose counsel he's followed all along. ... While Donald Rumsfeld is already out as Defense Secretary, some are suggesting the top generals in this war, Peter Pace and John Abizaid, should also go."

Maliki Considers Including Nonviolent Baathists In Iraqi Government. ABC World News (12/16, story 3, 0:35, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "Iraq's deep political and ethnic divisions are very much in evidence this weekend. A national reconciliation conference opened in Baghdad with plenty of buildup from the Iraqi government and the White House. While Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki is, again, urging former members of Saddam Hussein's forces to join the new Iraqi Army, key Sunni and Shiite leaders are boycotting the meeting, dimming hopes the talks will accomplish much of anything."

NBC Nightly News (12/16, story 4, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Baghdad, an attempt today by an Iraqi government to bring together Sunnis and Shiites." NBC (Arraf) added, "It was one of the defining US acts in Iraq. ... Many believe it helped launch the insurgency. ... This conference is billed as the best, maybe last hope for bringing together political leaders who can help stop the fighting. Former [CPA head] Paul Bremer declared Saddam's Baath Party illegal in 2003. Tens of thousands of ordinary Iraqis were left without work in a policy called debaathification. This politician says they now have a new word less offensive to many Iraqis: De-Saddamfication, excluding only those most loyal to Saddam but not all Baath Party members."

CNN (12/16, Whitfield) reported, "The latest bid to end Iraq's religious and political turmoil: a national reconciliation conference. Iraq's Shiite prime minister offered a gesture to Sunnis at the two-day conference. He proposed constitutional amnesty for members of the Sunni-dominated Ba'ath Party who have committed no serious crimes."

Roadside Bombs Killing US Troops At Record Rate. The Boston Globe (12/17, Bender, 413K) reports in a highly critical article, "US troops in Iraq are dying in roadside bombings at a higher rate than any period since the war began ... but commanders still have no effective means to monitor the deadliest routes for patrols, according to Pentagon officials and documents. ... In October, 53 US troops died from improvised explosive devices, while in November, 49 troop deaths were blamed on so-called IEDs -- the second and third highest monthly tolls of the war." The Globe continues, "Officials at the Joint IED Defeat Organization admit that most of the billions of dollars they get each year goes to developing high-tech gear to detect or disarm bombs rather than addressing the root of the problem: finding out where the bombs come from and who is planting them. ... That has spurred outrage among military officers, Pentagon contractors, and members of Congress. They charge that, after spending billions of taxpayer dollars to address the problem there is still virtually no solid intelligence on how the bombers operate." In addition, blame goes to "commanders in the field, who some specialists say aren't forthcoming about the extent of the problem. A previously unpublicized assessment generated by the Republican staff of the House Armed Services Committee and obtained by the Globe effectively accused the generals of hedging the truth when Congress asks what they need to protect the troops."

US Trainers Fault Iraqi Forces' Quality. The Los Angeles Times (12/17, Perry, 850K) reports pessimistically, "As U.S. forces train Iraqis to take more responsibility in fighting insurgents in Al Anbar province, they say that leadership in the Iraqis' enlisted ranks remains in short supply." Trainers fault the Iraqis for lack of independence and untrustworthiness. Maj. Sean Riordan said, "They are particularly dependent on strong, forceful leaders, and when they lose one, they have trouble continuing." The Times continues, "At this station, Marines and Iraqi soldiers went on joint missions but details often had to be withheld from the Iraqis for fear they would inform the insurgents." The Marines try to work closely with the Iraqi army but "appear more distant from the Iraqi police. While the army is mostly composed of Shiites, the police, recruited locally, are nearly all Sunni Arabs. ... one former police officer from Karmah was shot and killed by a Marine while planting a roadside bomb in nearby Saqlawiya."

Iraqi Legal System Crushed By Weight Of War. The New York Times (12/17, A1, Moss, 1.16M) reports in a pessimistic article exceeding 5,000 words, "The United States established the Central Criminal Court of Iraq three years ago, envisioning it as a pillar of a new democracy. But like the faltering effort to create effective Iraqi security forces, the system for detaining, charging and trying suspects has instead become another weak link in the rule of law in Iraq, according to an examination of the justice system by The New York Times. ... Almost every aspect of the judicial system is lacking, poorly serving not just detainees but also Iraqi citizens and troops trying to maintain order. Soldiers who have little if any training in gathering evidence or sorting the guilty from the innocent are left to decide whom to detain. ... Tens of thousands of detainees have been released by the Americans, often under political pressure from the Iraqis, but American soldiers complain they are apprehending many dangerous insurgents again and again. At the same time, detainees are held for long periods by the Americans without being charged, in some instances for as long as two years."

Gunmen Stage Mass Baghdad Kidnapping. The AP (12/17) reports, "Gunmen in Iraqi army uniforms staged a mass kidnapping on Sunday at the office of the Iraqi Red Crescent in downtown Baghdad, police said. An [anonymous] official of the Iraqi aid group said the assailants abducted 20 to 30 employees and visitors, but left women behind. ... Several mass kidnappings have been carried out in the Iraqi capital in recent months, possibly by armed groups on either side of the sectarian conflict between Sunnis and Shiites."

Reserves, National Guard Strained By War. McClatchy (12/17, Montgomery) reports, "The nation's National Guard and Reserve forces are displaying signs of strain after five years of deployments in what has become the biggest active-duty mobilization since the Korean War. ... many Guard units are struggling with chronic equipment shortages and funding problems that threaten their ability to respond to disasters and other emergencies in their home states. Thousands of reservists are serving in patchwork units cobbled together in piecemeal fashion from other units, often with little or no sense of cohesion."

LATimes Contributors Debate Value Of Talks With Iran, Syria. Two Los Angeles Times op-eds discuss negotiations with Iran and Syria. In the Los Angeles Times (12/17, 850K), researcher Joseph McMillan writes that US negotiators with the two countries should remember, "Fighting and talking are two sides of the same coin," "keep expectations realistic," "understand the role of passion," and "patience, patience." McMillan emphasizes, "If our adversaries perceive that the primary aim of U.S. policy is the fastest possible extrication of U.S. troops from Iraq, then, just as happened in Vietnam, it will become impossible for American diplomats to achieve anything more than that."

Also in the Los Angeles Times (12/17, 850K), Republican attorneys David Rivkin and Lee Casey argue against any negotiations with the two countries, saying, "Other than an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, it is difficult to conceive a course of action more perilous to our interests in the Middle East than seeking the Baker-style assistance of Iran and Syria. ... What does not make sense is to open a dialogue with two of Washington's bitterest enemies without a clear notion of whether their help in Iraq would be worth the price in the long run."

Military Rehearsing For Detainee Hearings. The AP (12/17, Melia) reports the US military "is rehearsing for hearings on whether 14 top terror suspects can be held indefinitely without charge as enemy combatants, but defense lawyers say the outcome is preordained." Khalid Sheikh Mohammed "and the 13 others will be the highest-profile detainees to undergo the so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, and the first to do so in two years."

DOJ:

Gonzales Urges Employees To Report Child Pornography On Workplace Computers. In a letter to the editor in the New York Times Magazine (12/17) Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzale responds to advice dispensed by the magazine's ethicist. Gonzales writes, "When a technician discovered child pornography on the company president's computer, the Ethicist advised 'silence' (Dec. 3). This advice was reckless and naïve. Each image of child pornography is a crime scene, and its possession is a felony in 42 states and under federal law. Furthermore, reproducing such images again victimizes the innocent child. The Ethicist flippantly advises silence because speaking up would be 'too ineffectual in protecting children.' But real children have been rescued by the discovery of images. Without the images, we cannot find and rescue victims or punish the predators. … I urge all Americans to reject this poor advice."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Pendulum May Be "Swinging Back," Away From Federal Oversight. The New York Times (12/17, Labaton, 1.16M) reported, "Is the pendulum swinging back, to less federal oversight and more self regulation? The question arises because prosecutors and regulators in Washington took steps last week — almost exactly five years after Enron filed for bankruptcy — to roll back some of the tough new measures adopted in that first blush of scandal. … The timing was somewhat jarring. Fannie Mae, the nation's largest mortgage finance company, was suing its auditors last week for claiming they were negligent in helping to prepare financial statements that led to a $6.3 billion restatement of earnings, and The Wall Street Journal was uncovering a new scandal involving the improper back-dating of executive stock options." The Times added, "The Sarbanes-Oxley law was approved in 2002 as lawmakers grew concerned that they might be swept out of office by millions of middle- and lower-income investors who owned their share of the marketplace through mutual funds, I.R.A.'s, 401 (k)'s, and 529 college-savings programs. Since then, as the scandals and trials have receded to the back pages, investors have poured even more money into the markets and a new and deregulatory-minded mood has taken hold in Washington. … Some business groups, as well as the treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson, have raised concerns that more companies are listing their stock overseas because of the regulatory climate in the United States." The AP (12/17, Gordon) refers to the new rules as "two early Christmas gifts for corporate America -- with potentially far-reaching effects for investors and the financial landscape."

New Rules Offer Require More Information On Executives' Pay. The AP (12/16, Gordon) reports, "Investors are getting access to clearer and more detailed information from public companies on their top executives' pay packages and perks under federal rules that took effect on Friday. Companies' 2006 annual reports issued early next year will reflect the changes, which were ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission in July in a major overhaul of disclosure rules for executive compensation. The new requirements include disclosure of the dating of stock option grants to executives. Companies must provide detailed information on how they determine when executives receive option grants and, if they do so, how and why they backdate options."

Federal Investigators Subpoena Information From Georgia City's Finance Office. The Macon Telegraph (12/17, Fain, 59K) reports, "Federal investigators served the city of Macon's finance office with two subpoenas in the past three months, seeking massive amounts of information in an ongoing Justice Department inquiry into the city's use of federal grants. The subpoenas, released to The Telegraph under the Georgia Open Records Act, commanded the city to turn over financial data as part of a Justice Department investigation into 'allegations of misconduct. … Federal investigators, by law, cannot comment on an ongoing investigation or even confirm its existence, U.S. Attorney Max Wood said. But several city sources, including Macon Finance Director Adah Roberts and Mayor Jack Ellis, said the subpoenas appear to target the city's so-called faith-based program."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Boston Street Violence Draws Gonzales' Attention. The Boston Herald (12/16, Johnson, 184K) reports, "The blood spilled on Boston's streets this year drew the attention of the nation's top prosecutor yesterday as he attended a conference on gang violence at a time when the city hopes a fractured gang truce can stop a street war from erupting." Attorney General Roberto Gonzales: "I am concerned that, despite the diligence of the men and women in this room, preliminary crime reports in Boston for the first six months of this year show an increase in violent crime." The Herald adds, "Gonzales, who was in town to speak at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood Conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center, said the feds have put street violence under a microscope, not just in Boston, but across the country."

Rape Down, But Victims' Advocates Say Rape Remains Underreported. The Stamford Advocate (12/17, Lee, 24K) reports, "Rape has dipped more than 85 percent since the 1970s, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. Last year, the number of rapes decreased by nearly 2 percent nationwide, even as other violent crimes increased, the FBI reported. Law enforcement officials say the trend could be the result of an increased jail population, and that rapists, who often commit other crimes such as burglary and robberies, are behind bars. Although the national statistics might be applauded, some experts and advocates aren't clapping just yet. Victim advocates and experts say the numbers are unreliable, and that despite greater awareness and outreach with crisis centers, support groups and hot lines, rape remains an underreported crime."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Racial Disparity Leads San Francisco Police To Probe For Possible Discrimination. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/17, Sward, 384K) reports, "San Francisco police arrest African Americans for serious crime at a much higher rate than officers in California's other biggest cities. The disparity between San Francisco's black felony arrest rates and the seven other largest cities' -- measured by the number of African Americans arrested per 1,000 black residents -- is so large that many experts and civic leaders who reviewed the numbers said they are "disturbing" and require an investigation. The numbers prompt several questions, all of which basically boil down to this: Is the high arrest rate of African Americans because of the way the San Francisco Police Department does its policing, or because of criminal activity within the community?" Merrick Bobb, "nationally recognized expert in police practices:" "The strongly disparate impact of San Francisco policing on African Americans begs for a convincing set of reasons based solidly on empirical fact."

Port Chester's Residents Have "Wide Range" Of Reactions To Discrimination Suit. The Lower Hudson Journal News (12/17, Hughes) reports that Port Chester "residents had a wide range of reactions yesterday to the news that federal officials have filed a lawsuit aimed at forcing an election district system that would increase the likelihood a Hispanic candidate could win a seat on the Board of Trustees. Out of dozens of residents interviewed yesterday, only a handful were aware that the U.S. Department of Justice has been pressuring the village to address concerns that a municipality where more than 46 percent of the population self-identified as Hispanic in the last census does not have a single Hispanic elected official on its six-member Board of Trustees. … Among those who knew about the situation, there was wide disagreement about whether there even is a problem and what, if anything, should be done by the federal government."

DOJ Intervenes In Indians' Challenge To Elections. The AP (12/17) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice is intervening in a federal lawsuit in which five American Indians are challenging Fremont County's system of holding at-large elections. The department filed notice Thursday that it is intervening in the case for the limited purpose of defending the constitutionality of the federal Voting Rights Act. … In its notice of intervention filed in the lawsuit this week, the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice stated that the United States has a right to intervene in any lawsuit in which the constitutionality of federal laws is questioned."

DOJ_NMG_0107184

ANTITRUST:

Hedge Funds Bet On Airline Mergers. The Chicago Tribune (12/17, Johnsson, Oneal, 617K) reported, "Hedge funds are investing heavily in United Airlines and other old-line carriers, drawn by the prospect of wide-scale mergers and better times ahead for U.S. carriers. After a spending spree this year, hedge funds control nearly 50 percent of the shares outstanding at US Airways Group, about 30 percent at both United and American Airlines and 16 percent at Continental Airlines, Securities and Exchange Commission filings show. … Given their clout and focus on generating quick returns, the hedge funds are emerging as a force that could push the industry into wide-scale consolidation, analysts say."

Airlines Must Surmount Obstacles Before Merging. The Houston Chronicle (12/17, Hensel, Hem, 530K) reports, "Since preliminary merger talks between Continental and United airlines became public last week, the talk of industry consolidation has grown louder and the market value of both airlines has increased. No matter the buzz, there are obstacles, though surmountable, to such a deal getting struck, and pitfalls to it ultimately succeeding."

Lawmakers Prepared To Hold Hearings On Possible Airline Mergers. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/17, Geewax, 379K) reports, "Even though the new Congress won't convene until January, key lawmakers already are preparing for hearings to examine the economic impact of possible airline mergers. Many members of Congress are condemning the potential deals, while few, if any, support the idea of industry consolidation. Congress has no direct role in approving mergers, but it could help sway public perceptions and increase political pressure on the Justice Department to reject the airline transactions on antitrust grounds." The Journal-Constitution adds, "Perhaps the most controversial of the potential acquisitions involves US Airways Group Inc.'s unsolicited $8.7 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. The two carriers have routes that overlap significantly along the East Coast, as well as hubs relatively near each other in the West."

"Business Traveler" Columnist Sees More Expenses For Consumers. In his "Business Traveler" column in the Web site of USA Today (12/17, 2.27M), David Grossman writes, "A number of airline chief executives have been predicting, warning, and perhaps secretly wishing for a round of consolidation. Those who foster the idea of remaking the big six into the big three see a world of decreased competition, fewer flights, and decreased seating capacity. This would help the surviving three airlines better cut costs and boost revenues … at the expense of business and leisure travelers alike."

Credit Reports To Have Higher Fees. Credit Reports The Los Angeles Times (12/17, Harney, 850K) reports, "Home buyers and refinancers face higher fees for credit reports beginning Jan. 1 — a price boost that has mortgage, credit-industry and consumer groups fuming. Some believe that the higher fees will have an inordinately heavy effect on moderate-income and minority first-time mortgage applicants who have nontraditional credit patterns, marginal credit scores or 'thin' credit files. … At the core of the controversy is a policy change by national credit bureaus Equifax and Experian that neither company announced publicly: Beginning next month, they expect to be paid every time a lender or a mortgage investor obtains an applicant's credit file as part of the funding process."

IMMIGRATION:

Recent Immigration Raids Worry Many Companies. The Los Angeles Times (12/17, Riccardi, Gaouette, 850K) reports that "the raid of six Swift & Co. meat packing plants last week spotlighted the fine line employers face because of increased government scrutiny: Make sure your employees are in the U.S. legally, but don't push too hard to find out. This time, federal inspectors detained 1,300 Swift workers suspected of providing stolen Social Security numbers to the company" while "four years ago, the company's requirement that Latino job applicants provide proof of their legal status led to a $200,000 fine for discrimination." The Times adds that at a news conference last week, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "emphasized the importance of focusing on workplaces. 'We all know the primary economic engine that draws in illegal migration is work,' Chertoff said a day after the Swift raids. 'And when businesses are built upon systemic violations of the law … that is a problem we have to attack.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Wants To Join With Democrats On Cutting Spending, Earmarks. The Washington Times (12/17, Dinan, 88K) reports on its front page that President Bush "challenged Democrats to live up to their pledge to cut pork-barrel spending, using his weekly radio address to suggest they join forces to crack down on earmarks in spending bills. Mr. Bush called it a 'top priority' for Congress when lawmakers return next year." The Times says the White House "has been trying to find an issue where it has common ground with Democrats, and spending is an obvious area, particularly given Democrats' campaign and post-campaign pledges to cut waste." Bush's "own party was unable to rein in earmarks during its time in control of Congress, and many Republican leaders in Congress staunchly defend the current system."

Panetta Urges Bush, Congressional Democrats To Work Together. The Houston Chronicle (12/17, Kilday, 530K) writes that Clinton White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta "said President Bush and the newly elected Democratic Congress must work together to confront the nation's problems." Panetta said, "There's a fundamental decision that both the president and the Democratic Congress have to make. And that is whether they are going to work together to govern the country, or whether they are going to be in confrontation or gridlock for the next two years."

Failure Of Congress To Pass Spending Bills Imperils Programs. The Washington Post (12/17, Weisman, Montgomery, 690K) reports on its front page that the "Republican-controlled Congress's decision to adjourn a week ago before completing many of the spending bills that finance the federal government will reverberate in ways large and small, such as understaffed U.S. attorney's offices, delayed renovations at the University of Bridgeport in Connecticut and a scuttled global nuclear energy exchange." The GOP "left behind just enough spending authority to keep the government operating through mid-February, less than halfway through the 2007 fiscal year that began Oct. 1. Democrats have signaled that when they take control of Congress in January they will extend that funding authority for the remainder of the year based largely on the previous year's spending levels, which will result in many cuts in programs."

Broder Says Pelosi Will Change House Management Style. In his Washington Post (12/17, B7, 690K) column, David Broder writes that incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is signaling "that the management of the House of Representatives is going to change substantively -- and not just symbolically -- when Pelosi is sworn in on Jan. 4 as the first woman to hold the third-highest office in the land. No one -- including Pelosi herself -- can tell you all the ways the House will change. When I interviewed her last week, it became apparent that she was just getting into the details of her new position. That may seem odd, but I find it believable that during her campaigning and fundraising these past two years, her focus was not on becoming speaker but, as she said, on 'getting the Democrats back in the majority' after 12 years out of power. … The small gestures she has made to the Republicans suggest a willingness to accommodate, rather than a vindictive reaction to the Democratic victory. That bodes well for the future."

WPost Praises Pelosi Intelligence Proposal, But Not Reyes Pick. The Washington Post (12/17, B6, 690K) editorializes, "House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi…has come up with a deft solution to a problem identified by the Sept. 11 commission: the disjointed and inadequate congressional oversight of intelligence." Pelosi wants to "create an intelligence oversight panel within the appropriations committee, responsible for reviewing spending and recommending spending levels. In a key departure, this committee would include not only appropriators but members of the intelligence committee. This is a clever approach that merits serious consideration" by incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid. The Post goes on to say, "We wish we could be as enthusiastic about Ms. Pelosi's choice to head the intelligence committee," Rep. Silvestre Reyes, who in a recent CQ.com interview "exhibited a troubling lack of familiarity with basic knowledge that ought to be expected of someone in that important position." Reyes "has a steep learning curve ahead."

Obama Says He Regrets "Boneheaded" Real Estate Deal. The Washington Post (12/17, A6, Slevin, 690K) reports Sen. Barack Obama says he "erred by creating the appearance" that Chicago "dealmaker and campaign fundraiser" Tony Rezko had done Obama a favor by selling Obama a portion of a lot Rezko owned. Rezko is "often in the headlines for being on the wrong side of good government. Indicted in October on influence-peddling charges, he also has a habit of befriending prospective political stars." Obama said in a Friday interview, "There's no doubt that this was a mistake on my part. 'Boneheaded' would be accurate. There's no doubt I should have seen some red flags in terms of me purchasing a piece of property from him." The Post says that "for the first time since he entered the national spotlight, the 45-year-old freshman senator found himself on the defensive, discussing a personal decision he had come to regret."

Time Names "You" Person Of The Year. The Washington Post/AP (12/17, A17) reports Time magazine named "each and every one of us" its Person of the Year, citing "the shift from institutions to individuals -- citizens of the new digital democracy, as the magazine put it. The winners this year were anyone using or creating content online." Time.com (12/17), previewing the December 25 issue cover story, says that while "there are individuals we could blame for the many painful and disturbing things that happened in 2006," a look at the year "through a different lens" shows "another story, one that isn't about conflict or great men. It's a story about community and collaboration on a scale never seen before." Bloomberg (12/17, Hart, Dentch) and BBC.com (12/17) also report on the choice.

NYTimes Slams "Bogus Prep Schools" For Athletes. The New York Times (12/17, WK11, 1.16M) editorializes that many "bogus 'prep schools'" exist for "barely literate high school athletes" to "launder their transcripts by taking pablum courses and sometimes by taking no courses at all. The athletes then go on to big-time sports universities, where they fail or exhaust their playing years before landing back on the streets without job prospects or college degrees" in a "prep school scheme was meant to circumvent academic qualification rules…by the National Collegiate Athletic Association," which "was slow to recognize the seriousness of the problem, has finally adopted policies to root it out."

Brooks Says Newspaper Headlines Reveal Our Age Of Anxiety. In an op-ed in the New York Times (12/17, WK12, 1.16M) David Brooks writes that "if you spend a few weeks poring over the highlights from a year's worth of magazines, you also get a window on the spirit of the times. And 2006, let it be said, felt to many like the year of losing ground." Many headlines points to the view that the West is losing ground politically, socially and economically causing anxiety in many. Yet Brooks asserts that "most of this broader existential gloom about America is absurd. The U.S. is in extraordinarily strong shape economically and socially. And whatever their short-term strengths, the Sadrs of the world simply do not have a social model that large numbers of people will want to live under."

Conservative Schism Could Produce Election Win For Iranian Moderates. The New York Times (12/17, Fathi, 1.16M) reports, "Early electoral returns on Saturday suggested that a moderate former president, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, had a strong a lead over a conservative opponent in at least one of the elections held Friday." Iranian media reported that "most candidates" on Rafsanjani's slate "were headed for a victory in the elections for the 86-member Assembly of Experts. Muhammad Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi, the hard-line cleric, had also received enough votes to get elected." Turnout appears to have been about 60 percent, and that "carries political significance" because the "results could suggest whether [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad still enjoys strong popularity or people were casting their votes to protest his policies"

However, an AP (12/17, Dareini) report says preliminary results "showed [Ahmadinejad's] conservative opponents leading in elections for local councils and a powerful clerical body, widely considered a test of popular approval for the hardline leader." His "anti-Israel rhetoric and staunch stand on Iran's nuclear program are believed to have divided the conservatives who voted him into power." Iranian media "reported unofficial results Saturday showing that no single party would be able to claim outright victory in Friday's elections, partly because of divisions within the conservative faction."

TERRORISM NEWS:

British Pilots Oppose Armed Air Marshals. The Washington Times (12/17, Hudson, 88K) reports that British pilots "oppose a proposed change in the United States' visa-waiver program that would require participating countries to provide armed security on U.S.-bound foreign airlines or allow U.S. air marshals to protect such flights. 'Any need to carry weapons on aircraft should be recognized as a failure of the airport security systems,' the British Air Line Pilots Association (BALPA) said. British pilots favor 'proper passenger profiling' through a 'database of potential terrorists, their known aliases and all their known associates as well as known disruptive passengers,' the association said in a statement."

NYTimes Sees "Unfinished Business" In Bush's War On Terror. In a lengthy editorial entitled "Unfinished Business," the New York Times (12/17, WK11, 1.16M) criticizes "the legacy of a Republican Congress that enabled the President's imperial visions of his authority. It leaves the new Democratic majority with much urgent, unfinished business to restore due process, civil liberties and the balance of powers." The Times discusses how military tribunals used a "broad definition of 'illegal enemy combatant,' which could subject legal United States residents to summary imprisonment; its repudiation of the Geneva Conventions to allow the president to decide what prisoner abuse he will permit; its denial of the basic right of appeal to any noncitizen designated as an 'illegal enemy combatant'; and its stripping of the powers of federal courts. The law is also far too lax on the use of coerced evidence and secret evidence." The Times condemns CIA secret prisons "which house foreign citizens who are often abducted off the streets of their hometowns and brutalized," and also outlines the presidential and congressional initiatives that "authorized the National Security Agency to ignore federal law and eavesdrop on telephone calls and e-mail between the United States and other countries without a warrant" while "Republican lawmakers have introduced bills that would legalize the program after the fact." The Times ends its list with a discussion of American "spy agencies' prewar failure to figure out that there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, and promised to deliver a report on whether Mr. Bush and his team pressured the agencies to cherry-pick or hype evidence — or lied outright to Americans." The Times concludes that "the midterm elections prove that…the American public has not been blinded or deafened to what this country stands for and the need for truth."

Columnist Examines Jurisprudence In Hamdan Case. In her Washington Post (12/17, B2, 690K) column, Emily Bazelon writes that "on Wednesday, a federal judge dismissed the habeas corpus petition of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a detainee at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba." Bazelon asserts that Hamdan's petition "was dismissed because of the Military Commissions Act, which Congress passed last fall to take away the habeas rights of Guantanamo Bay detainees. The MCA is a classic example of 'jurisdiction stripping.'" Bazelon argues that the judiciary branch is weakened when Congress is able to "take cases away from judges." Bazelon asserts that "the MCA is such a law" that can strip "the right to habeas corpus granted by federal statute." Bazelon asserts that Congress should not be able to "strip the courts of the authority to hear certain claims or cases" and that "these days it's more often judges whom we can count on, if we can count on anyone, to stand up for the procedural rights of murder defendants and Guantanamo Bay detainees."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Democrats Will Push To Limit Domestic Spying Program. The AP (12/16, Kravets) reported that while federal agents "continue to eavesdrop on Americans' electronic communications without warrants a year after President Bush confirmed the practice, and experts say a new Congress' efforts to limit the program could trigger a constitutional showdown. High-ranking Democrats set to take control of both chambers are mulling ways to curb the program Bush secretly authorized a month after the Sept. 11 attacks. The White House argues the Constitution gives the president wartime powers to eavesdrop that he wouldn't have during times of peace." The AP added that the President, "however, can veto legislation, including a law demanding the National Security Agency obtain warrants before monitoring communications. Such a veto would force Congress to muster a two-thirds vote to override;" which remains probable since Bush "said he had no intention of halting what he called a "vital tool" in the war on terror."

Federal Court Takes Closer Look At Padilla Case. The Los Angeles Times (12/17, Serrano, 850K) reports that a federal judge in Miami "will soon make one of the most important rulings in the Bush administration's war on terrorism and decide whether to publicly explore evidence that an accused terrorist was brutally mistreated for years inside a one-man isolation cell," Jose Padilla. Padilla's lawyers "have asked U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke to set him free because of the abuse they say he suffered. Though federal judges rarely dismiss criminal charges before trial, the allegations are so extreme that they may prompt Cooke to hold a pretrial hearing in what would be the first public court examination into how detainees were handled after the Sept. 11 attacks." The Times points out that Padilla has asserted that he has been tortured in many ways during his federal detainment and much of this case "is weighing on the judge" who "began her career as a Legal Aid attorney and public defender in Michigan" and who has ruled "in August that there were overlapping charges" and "she dismissed the most serious conspiracy charge, which could have brought a life sentence, and left intact two counts that could get Padilla 20 years for providing material support to terrorists."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Takes "Most Dramatic" Options For Iraq Off Table. Coverage of President Bush's deliberations on Iraq saw a troop increase as likely while simultaneously questioning the depth of his commitment to rethinking his strategy.

The AP (12/16) reports President Bush "has taken the most dramatic options off the table as he tries to change direction in Iraq, leaving him with a list of modest military and diplomatic moves to announce in the new year." He is seen as likely to "reject the Iraq Study Group's recommendation to pull back most combat forces by early 2008," as well as the idea of "a firm exit timetable." On the other hand, "he is likely to endorse the basic idea recommended by the commission and others to condition at least some U.S. military and economic engagement to the performance of Iraq's government." A diplomatic option that Bush is "almost certain to reject: stop trying to recruit greater Sunni participation in a unified government and cast U.S. fortunes with the Shiite and Kurdish majority." Other diplomatic options include wooing "the Sunni elite by guaranteeing them a share of oil revenue and reversing the previous policy of 'de-Baathification'" and building "a more structured network of Arab nations with a goal of clamping down on the violence in Iraq." He "also is likely to endorse a renewed effort to resolve other Middle East conflicts as a means to an end in Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/17, A1, Baker, 690K) reports that Bush faces a "difficult" question: "At what point does determination to a cause become self-defeating folly? ... The notion of bending to critics or even popular will cuts against his grain. Yet it is also true that at key moments in his career, Bush has been willing to abandon his position and shift gears dramatically," such as when he embraced creating DHS "as if it were his own" idea. The Post continues, "Still, history shows that Bush does not change easily or quickly. For years, he ignored calls to fire" Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "even when the idea was endorsed by his own top aides. He waited to oust Rumsfeld until the day after midterm elections handed Congress to Democrats." Reagan-era DOD Assistant Secretary Lawrence Korb said Bush "has basically confused stubbornness with steadfastness."

Bush Ponders Sending More Troops To Iraq. All three networks reported on the possibility of more troops being sent to Iraq. ABC World News (12/16, lead story, 2:05, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "We begin with the war in Iraq and the very real possibility that many more American forces will soon be headed there. In the wake of the scathing report from the Iraq Study Group, President Bush promised to come up with a new plan." ABC (Morrell) added, "Officials close to the process tell ABC News Mr. Bush will likely call for a major surge of US troops in Iraq. That surge could include more than 30,000 additional troops, bringing the total to 164,000, the highest level yet. Most would go to Baghdad, more than doubling the number there. The rest would head to al-Anbar Province, a last-ditch attempt to stabilize the heart of Iraq." Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker,: "As it currently stands, the army is incapable of generating and sustaining the required forces to wage the global war on terror." Morrell: "Still, President Bush has asked his military planners to figure out how to get the extra forces he wants. Among the ideas being considered, extending tours of duty from 12 to 15 months for soldiers, from seven to nine months for Marines."

The CBS Evening News (12/16, story 4, 2:15, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "In the battle for Iraq, the surge in US troops…could be launched within days after Christmas. Here's the plan: boost the current 134,000 troops by another 15,000 to 20,000." CBS (Pinkston) added, "In an unusually quiet day for Baghdad, car bombs and kidnappings gave way to a new effort to negotiate a way out of a nightmare of violence. At an Iraqi reconciliation conference, embattled Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki issued a surprising invitation. Asking former members of Saddam's army to come back to fight insurgents. But there's a growing feeling in Washington that the key to ending the violence is not the Iraqi but US troops. President Bush seems prepared to send more troops."

NBC Nightly News (12/16, story 3, 1:40, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "We turn now to the war in Iraq and the options facing President Bush. While the White House says tonight that all options are still on the table, the President is considering one plan to increase the number of US troops in Iraq." NBC (Corke) added, "For some time here in Washington, there has been talk of increasing US force levels in Iraq, but there appears to be a sharpening of that debate here as the White House is to be strongly considering an increase of 20,000 troop or more to that region. That number could actually grow to more than 30,000, we're also told and that's significant because when you think about it, there are only about 17,000 or so troops in and around Baghdad. ... Most of the additional forces there would be there to train the Iraqis, not simply to increase the number of boots on the ground patrolling the streets of Baghdad."

Ex-DOD Secretary Perry Warns Of Iraq "Quagmire." The Washington Post/AP (12/17) reports that former Defense Secretary William Perry "said Saturday that Iraq could turn into a 'quagmire' if the Bush administration fails to change strategy." Perry delivered the "Democratic Party's weekly radio address," in which he "reiterated the recommendations of last week's report from the Iraq Study Group" and said, "I believe that [quagmire] is likely to happen if we 'stay the course' in Iraq."

Composition Of Bush's Advisers Shifts. ABC World News (12/16, story 2, 2:15, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "John Hendren takes a look at who will have the President's ear." ABC (Hendren) added, "President Bush's listening tour already marks a dramatic change from the small group of advisers he called on in the lead-up to the war in Iraq. Paul Wolfowitz, then the deputy Defense Secretary, first proposed invading Iraq in an emergency cabinet meeting at Camp David less than a week after the 9/11 attacks." Observer "fear while he may be hearing many options in the end he may end up only listening to the same key advisers whose counsel he's followed all along. ... While Donald Rumsfeld is already out as Defense Secretary, some are suggesting the top generals in this war, Peter Pace and John Abizaid, should also go."

Maliki Considers Including Nonviolent Baathists In Iraqi Government. ABC World News (12/16, story 3, 0:35, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "Iraq's deep political and ethnic divisions are very much in evidence this weekend. A national reconciliation conference opened in Baghdad with plenty of buildup from the Iraqi government and the White House. While Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki is, again, urging former members of Saddam Hussein's forces to join the new Iraqi Army, key Sunni and Shiite leaders are boycotting the meeting, dimming hopes the talks will accomplish much of anything."

NBC Nightly News (12/16, story 4, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Baghdad, an attempt today by an Iraqi government to bring together Sunnis and Shiites." NBC (Arraf) added, "It was one of the defining US acts in Iraq. ... Many believe it helped launch the insurgency. ... This conference is billed as the best, maybe last hope for bringing together political leaders who can help stop the fighting. Former [CPA head] Paul Bremer declared Saddam's Baath Party illegal in 2003. Tens of thousands of ordinary Iraqis were left without work in a policy called debaathification. This politician says they now have a new word less offensive to many Iraqis: De-Saddamfication, excluding only those most loyal to Saddam but not all Baath Party members."

CNN (12/16, Whitfield) reported, "The latest bid to end Iraq's religious and political turmoil: a national reconciliation conference. Iraq's Shiite prime minister offered a gesture to Sunnis at the two-day conference. He proposed constitutional amnesty for members of the Sunni-dominated Ba'ath Party who have committed no serious crimes."

Roadside Bombs Killing US Troops At Record Rate. The Boston Globe (12/17, Bender, 413K) reports in a highly critical article, "US troops in Iraq are dying in roadside bombings at a higher rate than any period since the war began ... but commanders still have no effective means to monitor the deadliest routes for patrols, according to Pentagon officials and documents. ... In October, 53 US troops died from improvised explosive devices, while in November, 49 troop deaths were blamed on so-called IEDs -- the second and third highest monthly tolls of the war." The Globe continues, "Officials at the Joint IED Defeat Organization admit that most of the billions of dollars they get each year goes to developing high-tech gear to detect or disarm bombs rather than addressing the root of the problem: finding out where the bombs come from and who is planting them. ... That has spurred outrage among military officers, Pentagon contractors, and members of Congress. They charge that, after spending billions of taxpayer dollars to address the problem there is still virtually no solid intelligence on how the bombers operate." In addition, blame goes to "commanders in the field, who some specialists say aren't forthcoming about the extent of the problem. A previously unpublicized assessment generated by the Republican staff of the House Armed Services Committee and obtained by the Globe effectively accused the generals of hedging the truth when Congress asks what they need to protect the troops."

US Trainers Fault Iraqi Forces' Quality. The Los Angeles Times (12/17, Perry, 850K) reports pessimistically, "As U.S. forces train Iraqis to take more responsibility in fighting insurgents in Al Anbar province, they say that leadership in the Iraqis' enlisted ranks remains in short supply." Trainers fault the Iraqis for lack of independence and untrustworthiness. Maj. Sean Riordan said, "They are particularly dependent on strong, forceful leaders, and when they lose one, they have trouble continuing." The Times continues, "At this station, Marines and Iraqi soldiers went on joint missions but details often had to be withheld from the Iraqis for fear they would inform the insurgents." The Marines try to work closely with the Iraqi army but "appear more distant from the Iraqi police. While the army is mostly composed of Shiites, the police, recruited locally, are nearly all Sunni Arabs. ... one former police officer from Karmah was shot and killed by a Marine while planting a roadside bomb in nearby Saqlawiya."

Iraqi Legal System Crushed By Weight Of War. The New York Times (12/17, A1, Moss, 1.16M) reports in a pessimistic article exceeding 5,000 words, "The United States established the Central Criminal Court of Iraq three years ago, envisioning it as a pillar of a new democracy. But like the faltering effort to create effective Iraqi security forces, the system for detaining, charging and trying suspects has instead become another weak link in the rule of law in Iraq, according to an examination of the justice system by The New York Times. ... Almost every aspect of the judicial system is lacking, poorly serving not just detainees but also Iraqi citizens and troops trying to maintain order. Soldiers who have little if any training in gathering evidence or sorting the guilty from the innocent are left to decide whom to detain.

... Tens of thousands of detainees have been released by the Americans, often under political pressure from the Iraqis, but American soldiers complain they are apprehending many dangerous insurgents again and again. At the same time, detainees are held for long periods by the Americans without being charged, in some instances for as long as two years."

Gunmen Stage Mass Baghdad Kidnapping. The AP (12/17) reports, "Gunmen in Iraqi army uniforms staged a mass kidnapping on Sunday at the office of the Iraqi Red Crescent in downtown Baghdad, police said. An [anonymous] official of the Iraqi aid group said the assailants abducted 20 to 30 employees and visitors, but left women behind. ... Several mass kidnappings have been carried out in the Iraqi capital in recent months, possibly by armed groups on either side of the sectarian conflict between Sunnis and Shiites."

Reserves, National Guard Strained By War. McClatchy (12/17, Montgomery) reports, "The nation's National Guard and Reserve forces are displaying signs of strain after five years of deployments in what has become the biggest active-duty mobilization since the Korean War. ... many Guard units are struggling with chronic equipment shortages and funding problems that threaten their ability to respond to disasters and other emergencies in their home states. Thousands of reservists are serving in patchwork units cobbled together in piecemeal fashion from other units, often with little or no sense of cohesion."

LATimes Contributors Debate Value Of Talks With Iran, Syria. Two Los Angeles Times op-eds discuss negotiations with Iran and Syria. In the Los Angeles Times (12/17, 850K), researcher Joseph McMillan writes that US negotiators with the two countries should remember, "Fighting and talking are two sides of the same coin," "keep expectations realistic," "understand the role of passion," and "patience, patience." McMillan emphasizes, "If our adversaries perceive that the primary aim of U.S. policy is the fastest possible extrication of U.S. troops from Iraq, then, just as happened in Vietnam, it will become impossible for American diplomats to achieve anything more than that."

Also in the Los Angeles Times (12/17, 850K), Republican attorneys David Rivkin and Lee Casey argue against any negotiations with the two countries, saying, "Other than an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, it is difficult to conceive a course of action more perilous to our interests in the Middle East than seeking the Baker-style assistance of Iran and Syria. ... What does not make sense is to open a dialogue with two of Washington's bitterest enemies without a clear notion of whether their help in Iraq would be worth the price in the long run."

Military Rehearsing For Detainee Hearings. The AP (12/17, Melia) reports the US military "is rehearsing for hearings on whether 14 top terror suspects can be held indefinitely without charge as enemy combatants, but defense lawyers say the outcome is preordained." Khalid Sheikh Mohammed "and the 13 others will be the highest-profile detainees to undergo the so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, and the first to do so in two years."

DOJ:

Gonzales Urges Employees To Report Child Pornography On Workplace Computers. In a letter to the editor in the New York Times Magazine (12/17) Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzale responds to advice dispensed by the magazine's ethicist. Gonzales writes, "When a technician discovered child pornography on the company president's computer, the Ethicist advised 'silence' (Dec. 3). This advice was reckless and naïve. Each image of child pornography is a crime scene, and its possession is a felony in 42 states and under federal law. Furthermore, reproducing such images again victimizes the innocent child. The Ethicist flippantly advises silence because speaking up would be 'too ineffectual in protecting children.' But real children have been rescued by the discovery of images. Without the images, we cannot find and rescue victims or punish the predators. … I urge all Americans to reject this poor advice."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Pendulum May Be "Swinging Back," Away From Federal Oversight. The New York Times (12/17, Labaton, 1.16M) reported, "Is the pendulum swinging back, to less federal oversight and more self regulation? The question arises because prosecutors and regulators in Washington took steps last week — almost exactly five years after Enron filed for bankruptcy — to roll back some of the tough new measures adopted in that first blush of scandal. … The timing was somewhat jarring. Fannie Mae, the nation's largest mortgage finance company, was suing its auditors last week for claiming they were negligent in helping to prepare financial statements that led to a $6.3 billion restatement of earnings, and The Wall Street Journal was uncovering a new scandal involving the improper back-dating of executive stock options." The Times added, "The Sarbanes-Oxley law was approved in 2002 as lawmakers grew concerned that they might be swept out of office by millions of middle- and lower-income investors who owned their share of the marketplace through mutual funds, I.R.A.'s, 401 (k)'s, and 529 college-savings programs. Since then, as the scandals and trials have receded to the back pages, investors have poured even more money into the markets and a new and deregulatory-minded mood has taken hold in Washington. … Some business groups, as well as the treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson, have raised concerns that more companies are listing their stock overseas because of the regulatory climate in the United States." The AP (12/17, Gordon) refers to the new rules as "two early Christmas gifts for corporate America -- with potentially far-reaching effects for investors and the financial landscape."

New Rules Offer Require More Information On Executives' Pay. The AP (12/16, Gordon) reports, "Investors are getting access to clearer and more detailed information from public companies on their top executives' pay packages and perks under federal rules that took effect on Friday. Companies' 2006 annual reports issued early next year will reflect the changes, which were ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission in July in a major overhaul of disclosure rules for executive compensation. The new requirements include disclosure of the dating of stock option grants to executives. Companies must provide detailed information on how they determine when executives receive option grants and, if they do so, how and why they backdate options."

Federal Investigators Subpoena Information From Georgia City's Finance Office. The Macon Telegraph (12/17, Fain, 59K) reports, "Federal investigators served the city of Macon's finance office with two subpoenas in the past three months, seeking massive amounts of information in an ongoing Justice Department inquiry into the city's use of federal grants. The subpoenas, released to The Telegraph under the Georgia Open Records Act, commanded the city to turn over financial data as part of a Justice Department investigation into 'allegations of misconduct. … Federal investigators, by law, cannot comment on an ongoing investigation or even confirm its existence, U.S. Attorney Max Wood said. But several city sources, including Macon Finance Director Adah Roberts and Mayor Jack Ellis, said the subpoenas appear to target the city's so-called faith-based program."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Boston Street Violence Draws Gonzales' Attention. The Boston Herald (12/16, Johnson, 184K) reports, "The blood spilled on Boston's streets this year drew the attention of the nation's top prosecutor yesterday as he attended a conference on gang violence at a time when the city hopes a fractured gang truce can stop a street war from erupting." Attorney General Roberto Gonzales: "I am concerned that, despite the diligence of the men and women in this room, preliminary crime reports in Boston for the first six months of this year show an increase in violent crime." The Herald adds, "Gonzales, who was in town to speak at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood Conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center, said the feds have put street violence under a microscope, not just in Boston, but across the country."

Rape Down, But Victims' Advocates Say Rape Remains Underreported. The Stamford Advocate (12/17, Lee, 24K) reports, "Rape has dipped more than 85 percent since the 1970s, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. Last year, the number of rapes decreased by nearly 2 percent nationwide, even as other violent crimes increased, the FBI reported. Law enforcement officials say the trend could be the result of an increased jail population, and that rapists, who often commit other crimes such as burglary and robberies, are behind bars. Although the national statistics might be applauded, some experts and advocates aren't clapping just yet. Victim advocates and experts say the numbers are unreliable, and that despite greater awareness and outreach with crisis centers, support groups and hot lines, rape remains an underreported crime."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Racial Disparity Leads San Francisco Police To Probe For Possible Discrimination. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/17, Sward, 384K) reports, "San Francisco police arrest African Americans for serious crime at a much higher rate than officers in California's other biggest cities. The disparity between San Francisco's black felony arrest rates and the seven other largest cities' -- measured by the number of African Americans arrested per 1,000 black residents -- is so large that many experts and civic leaders who reviewed the numbers said they are "disturbing" and require an investigation. The numbers prompt several questions, all of which basically boil down to this: Is the high arrest rate of African Americans because of the way the San Francisco Police Department does its policing, or because of criminal activity within the community?" Merrick Bobb, "nationally recognized expert in police practices:" "The strongly disparate impact of San Francisco policing on African Americans begs for a convincing set of reasons based solidly on empirical fact."

Port Chester's Residents Have "Wide Range" Of Reactions To Discrimination Suit. The Lower

Hudson Journal News (12/17, Hughes) reports that Port Chester "residents had a wide range of reactions yesterday to the news that federal officials have filed a lawsuit aimed at forcing an election district system that would increase the likelihood a Hispanic candidate could win a seat on the Board of Trustees. Out of dozens of residents interviewed yesterday, only a handful were aware that the U.S. Department of Justice has been pressuring the village to address concerns that a municipality where more than 46 percent of the population self-identified as Hispanic in the last census does not have a single Hispanic elected official on its six-member Board of Trustees. … Among those who knew about the situation, there was wide disagreement about whether there even is a problem and what, if anything, should be done by the federal government."

DOJ Intervenes In Indians' Challenge To Elections. The AP (12/17) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice is intervening in a federal lawsuit in which five American Indians are challenging Fremont County's system of holding at-large elections. The department filed notice Thursday that it is intervening in the case for the limited purpose of defending the constitutionality of the federal Voting Rights Act. … In its notice of intervention filed in the lawsuit this week, the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice stated that the United States has a right to intervene in any lawsuit in which the constitutionality of federal laws is questioned."

ANTITRUST:

Hedge Funds Bet On Airline Mergers. The Chicago Tribune (12/17, Johnsson, Oneal, 617K) reported, "Hedge funds are investing heavily in United Airlines and other old-line carriers, drawn by the prospect of wide-scale mergers and better times ahead for U.S. carriers. After a spending spree this year, hedge funds control nearly 50 percent of the shares outstanding at US Airways Group, about 30 percent at both United and American Airlines and 16 percent at Continental Airlines, Securities and Exchange Commission filings show. … Given their clout and focus on generating quick returns, the hedge funds are emerging as a force that could push the industry into wide-scale consolidation, analysts say."

Airlines Must Surmount Obstacles Before Merging. The Houston Chronicle (12/17, Hensel, Hem, 530K) reports, "Since preliminary merger talks between Continental and United airlines became public last week, the talk of industry consolidation has grown louder and the market value of both airlines has increased. No matter the buzz, there are obstacles, though surmountable, to such a deal getting struck, and pitfalls to it ultimately succeeding."

Lawmakers Prepared To Hold Hearings On Possible Airline Mergers. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/17, Geewax, 379K) reports, "Even though the new Congress won't convene until January, key lawmakers already are preparing for hearings to examine the economic impact of possible airline mergers. Many members of Congress are condemning the potential deals, while few, if any, support the idea of industry consolidation. Congress has no direct role in approving mergers, but it could help sway public perceptions and increase political pressure on the Justice Department to reject the airline transactions on antitrust grounds." The Journal-Constitution adds, "Perhaps the most controversial of the potential acquisitions involves US Airways Group Inc.'s unsolicited $8.7 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. The two carriers have routes that overlap significantly along the East Coast, as well as hubs relatively near each other in the West."

"Business Traveler" Columnist Sees More Expenses For Consumers. In his "Business Traveler" column in the Web site of USA Today (12/17, 2.27M), David Grossman writes, "A number of airline chief executives have been predicting, warning, and perhaps secretly wishing for a round of consolidation. Those who foster the idea of remaking the big six into the big three see a world of decreased competition, fewer flights, and decreased seating capacity. This would help the surviving three airlines better cut costs and boost revenues … at the expense of business and leisure travelers alike."

Credit Reports To Have Higher Fees. Credit Reports The Los Angeles Times (12/17, Harney, 850K) reports, "Home buyers and refinancers face higher fees for credit reports beginning Jan. 1 — a price boost that has mortgage, credit-industry and consumer groups fuming. Some believe that the higher fees will have an inordinately heavy effect on moderate-income and minority first-time mortgage applicants who have nontraditional credit patterns, marginal credit scores or 'thin' credit files. … At the core of the controversy is a policy change by national credit bureaus Equifax and Experian that neither company announced publicly: Beginning next month, they expect to be paid every time a lender or a mortgage investor obtains an applicant's credit file as part of the funding process."

IMMIGRATION:

Recent Immigration Raids Worry Many Companies. The Los Angeles Times (12/17, Riccardi, Gaouette, 850K) reports that "the raid of six Swift & Co. meat packing plants last week spotlighted the fine line employers face because of increased government scrutiny: Make sure your employees are in the U.S. legally, but don't push too hard to find out. This time, federal inspectors detained 1,300 Swift workers suspected of providing stolen Social Security numbers to the company" while "four years ago, the company's requirement that Latino job applicants provide proof of their legal status led to a $200,000 fine for discrimination." The Times adds that at a news conference last week, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "emphasized the importance of focusing on workplaces. 'We all know the primary economic engine that draws in illegal migration is work,' Chertoff said a day after the Swift raids. 'And when businesses are built upon systemic violations of the law … that is a problem we have to attack.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Wants To Join With Democrats On Cutting Spending, Earmarks. The Washington Times (12/17, Dinan, 88K) reports on its front page that President Bush "challenged Democrats to live up to their pledge to cut pork-barrel spending, using his weekly radio address to suggest they join forces to crack down on earmarks in spending bills. Mr. Bush called it a 'top priority' for Congress when lawmakers return next year." The Times says the White House "has been trying to find an issue where it has common ground with Democrats, and spending is an obvious area, particularly given Democrats' campaign and post-campaign pledges to cut waste." Bush's "own party was unable to rein in earmarks during its time in control of Congress, and many Republican leaders in Congress staunchly defend the current system."

Panetta Urges Bush, Congressional Democrats To Work Together. The Houston Chronicle (12/17, Kilday, 530K) writes that Clinton White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta "said President Bush and the newly elected Democratic Congress must work together to confront the nation's problems." Panetta said, "There's a fundamental decision that both the president and the Democratic Congress have to make. And that is whether they are going to work together to govern the country, or whether they are going to be in confrontation or gridlock for the next two years."

Failure Of Congress To Pass Spending Bills Imperils Programs. The Washington Post (12/17, Weisman, Montgomery, 690K) reports on its front page that the "Republican-controlled Congress's decision to adjourn a week ago before completing many of the spending bills that finance the federal government will reverberate in ways large and small, such as understaffed U.S. attorney's offices, delayed renovations at the University of Bridgeport in Connecticut and a scuttled global nuclear energy exchange." The GOP "left behind just enough spending authority to keep the government operating through mid-February, less than halfway through the 2007 fiscal year that began Oct. 1. Democrats have signaled that when they take control of Congress in January they will extend that funding authority for the remainder of the year based largely on the previous year's spending levels, which will result in many cuts in programs."

Broder Says Pelosi Will Change House Management Style. In his Washington Post (12/17, B7, 690K) column, David Broder writes that incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is signaling "that the management of the House of Representatives is going to change substantively -- and not just symbolically -- when Pelosi is sworn in on Jan. 4 as the first woman to hold the third-highest office in the land. No one -- including Pelosi herself -- can tell you all the ways the House will change. When I interviewed her last week, it became apparent that she was just getting into the details of her new position. That may seem odd, but I find it believable that during her campaigning and fundraising these past two years, her focus was not on becoming speaker but, as she said, on 'getting the Democrats back in the majority' after 12 years out of power. … The small gestures she has made to the Republicans suggest a willingness to accommodate, rather than a vindictive reaction to the Democratic victory. That bodes well for the future."

WPost Praises Pelosi Intelligence Proposal, But Not Reyes Pick. The Washington Post (12/17, B6, 690K) editorializes, "House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi…has come up with a deft solution to a problem identified by the Sept. 11 commission: the disjointed and inadequate congressional oversight of intelligence." Pelosi wants to "create an intelligence oversight panel within the appropriations committee, responsible for reviewing spending and recommending spending levels. In a key departure, this committee would include not only appropriators but members of the intelligence committee. This is a clever approach that merits serious consideration" by incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid. The Post goes on to say, "We wish we could be as enthusiastic about Ms. Pelosi's choice to head the intelligence committee," Rep. Silvestre Reyes, who in a recent CQ.com interview "exhibited a troubling lack of familiarity with basic knowledge that ought to be expected of someone in that important position." Reyes "has a steep learning curve ahead."

OTHER NEWS:

Obama Says He Regrets "Boneheaded" Real Estate Deal. The Washington Post (12/17, A6, Slevin, 690K) reports Sen. Barack Obama says he "erred by creating the appearance" that Chicago "dealmaker and campaign fundraiser" Tony Rezko had done Obama a favor by selling

Obama a portion of a lot Rezko owned. Rezko is "often in the headlines for being on the wrong side of good government. Indicted in October on influence-peddling charges, he also has a habit of befriending prospective political stars." Obama said in a Friday interview, "There's no doubt that this was a mistake on my part. 'Boneheaded' would be accurate. There's no doubt I should have seen some red flags in terms of me purchasing a piece of property from him." The Post says that "for the first time since he entered the national spotlight, the 45-year-old freshman senator found himself on the defensive, discussing a personal decision he had come to regret."

Time Names "You" Person Of The Year. The Washington Post/AP (12/17, A17) reports Time magazine named "each and every one of us" its Person of the Year, citing "the shift from institutions to individuals -- citizens of the new digital democracy, as the magazine put it. The winners this year were anyone using or creating content online." Time.com (12/17), previewing the December 25 issue cover story, says that while "there are individuals we could blame for the many painful and disturbing things that happened in 2006," a look at the year "through a different lens" shows "another story, one that isn't about conflict or great men. It's a story about community and collaboration on a scale never seen before." Bloomberg (12/17, Hart, Dentch) and BBC.com (12/17) also report on the choice.

NYTimes Slams "Bogus Prep Schools" For Athletes. The New York Times (12/17, WK11, 1.16M) editorializes that many "bogus 'prep schools'" exist for "barely literate high school athletes" to "launder their transcripts by taking pablum courses and sometimes by taking no courses at all. The athletes then go on to big-time sports universities, where they fail or exhaust their playing years before landing back on the streets without job prospects or college degrees" in a "prep school scheme was meant to circumvent academic qualification rules…by the National Collegiate Athletic Association," which "was slow to recognize the seriousness of the problem, has finally adopted policies to root it out."

Brooks Says Newspaper Headlines Reveal Our Age Of Anxiety. In an op-ed in the New York Times (12/17, WK12, 1.16M) David Brooks writes that "if you spend a few weeks poring over the highlights from a year's worth of magazines, you also get a window on the spirit of the times. And 2006, let it be said, felt to many like the year of losing ground." Many headlines points to the view that the West is losing ground politically, socially and economically causing anxiety in many. Yet Brooks asserts that "most of this broader existential gloom about America is absurd. The U.S. is in extraordinarily strong shape economically and socially. And whatever their short-term strengths, the Sadrs of the world simply do not have a social model that large numbers of people will want to live under."

Conservative Schism Could Produce Election Win For Iranian Moderates. The New York Times (12/17, Fathi, 1.16M) reports, "Early electoral returns on Saturday suggested that a moderate former president, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, had a strong a lead over a conservative opponent in at least one of the elections held Friday." Iranian media reported that "most candidates" on Rafsanjani's slate "were headed for a victory in the elections for the 86-member Assembly of Experts. Muhammad Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi, the hard-line cleric, had also received enough votes to get elected." Turnout appears to have been about 60 percent, and that "carries political significance" because the "results could suggest whether [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad still enjoys strong popularity or people were casting their votes to protest his policies"

However, an AP (12/17, Dareini) report says preliminary results "showed [Ahmadinejad's] conservative opponents leading in elections for local councils and a powerful clerical body, widely considered a test of popular approval for the hardline leader." His "anti-Israel rhetoric and staunch stand on Iran's nuclear program are believed to have divided the conservatives who voted him into power." Iranian media "reported unofficial results Saturday showing that no single party would be able to claim outright victory in Friday's elections, partly because of divisions within the conservative faction."

TERRORISM NEWS:

British Pilots Say No To Armed Marshals (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, December 17, 2006

British pilots oppose a proposed change in the United States' visa-waiver program that would require participating countries to provide armed security on U.S.-bound foreign airlines or allow U.S. air marshals to protect such flights.

"Any need to carry weapons on aircraft should be recognized as a failure of the airport security systems," the British Air Line Pilots Association (BALPA) said.

British pilots favor "proper passenger profiling" through a "database of potential terrorists, their known aliases and all their known associates as well as known disruptive passengers," the association said in a statement provided to The Washington Times.

Jarrod Agen, spokesman for the Homeland Security Department, said the program is in the early stages of being revamped to strengthen security, and changes still need to be discussed with foreign governments and approved by Congress.

"This is part of the issue, to have the ability to have federal air marshals on these international flights as part of the visa-waiver program," Mr. Agen said.

The proposal says the United States will ask the 27 countries that participate in the visa-waiver program to cooperate with the air marshal program.

"The United States benefits from the enhanced security of allowing U.S. federal air marshals to operate aboard international flights to and from the United States," it states.

The air marshal program requires personnel be sharpshooters who are able to requalify at a shooting range several times a year and carry Sig Sauer 9mm pistols.

Armed U.S. marshals already are permitted to fly on U.S.-owned airlines overseas. If air marshals in other countries do not meet U.S. standards, one option is to provide U.S. marshals for foreign airlines, Mr. Agen said.

The air marshal initiative is one of several reform measures the Homeland Security Department is pushing for the participating countries, including electronic travel authorizations, a passenger information exchange and stronger airport security standards.

"The United States will equally accept the burden of new security measures and will not require citizens of visa-waiver countries to adopt measures that we are unwilling to undertake ourselves," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said.

The visa-waiver program allows travelers from participating countries to enter the United States without a visa if they have an e-passport with biometrics data, or a machine-readable passport issued before Oct. 26.

"Long-distance flights are in jeopardy" if not protected by armed marshals, former air marshal Robert MacLean said.

"The key to the [Federal Air Marshal Service] being successful is to have [marshals] on as many different flights that can be covered," said Spencer Pickard, an air marshal in Las Vegas.

David Mackett, a commercial airline pilot and president of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance, said there is no alternative to defending aircraft with armed weapons, but that protection by marshals is too costly.

"With 30,000 flights a day, using air marshals, it would cost $14 billion per year and take a force the size of the U.S. Coast Guard -- it simply can't be done," Mr. Mackett said.

Instead, he said Congress should revamp the Federal Flight Deck Officer program to encourage more pilots to seek weapons training.

"Using armed pilots, we could protect every flight in the sky for about $30 million a year because the pilots ask no compensation," Mr. Mackett said.

The BALPA threatened to strike when Congress voted to allow American pilots to carry weapons when flying overseas, and the measure was withdrawn.

"BALPA is indeed still opposed to armed air marshals," spokesman Keith Bill said last week.

Unfinished Business (NYT)

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

Some recent images from George W. Bush's war on terror:

-- Jose Padilla, the supposed dirty bomber, submitting while guards blindfolded him and covered his ears for a walk from his cell to a dentist's chair.

DOJ_NMG_0107201

-- Government lawyers arguing that a prisoner could not testify that he was tortured by American agents, because their brutality was a secret.

-- A judge dismissing another prisoner's challenge to his detention, after a new law stripped basic rights from those Mr. Bush has designated "illegal enemy combatants."

-- The White House scorning lawmakers' attempts to rein in Mr. Bush's illegal domestic spying.

This is the legacy of a Republican Congress that enabled the president's imperial visions of his authority. It leaves the new Democratic majority with much urgent, unfinished business to restore due process, civil liberties and the balance of powers.

Military Tribunals

In the heat of the midterm campaign, Congress was stampeded into establishing military courts for suspected terrorists. The measure improved on Mr. Bush's own kangaroo courts, which were struck down by the Supreme Court. But the bill over all was a national disgrace.

Among the many things that Congress needs to fix are the bill's broad definition of "illegal enemy combatant," which could subject legal United States residents to summary imprisonment; its repudiation of the Geneva Conventions to allow the president to decide what prisoner abuse he will permit; its denial of the basic right of appeal to any noncitizen designated as an "illegal enemy combatant"; and its stripping of the powers of federal courts. The law is also far too lax on the use of coerced evidence and secret evidence. The definition of torture should be changed to reflect civilized norms.

We were greatly encouraged last week when Senator Patrick Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will head the Judiciary Committee, said fixing this bill would be a priority for his panel.

The C.I.A. Prisons

At the insistence of Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, the Military Commissions Act gave legal cover to the Central Intelligence Agency's secret illegal prisons, which house foreign citizens who are often abducted off the streets of their hometowns and brutalized. Congress should at minimum bring these prisons under the rule of law, and make sure that C.I.A. interrogators are given clear instructions comporting with American values. Ideally, Congress would investigate and decide whether this operation has any national security value, and if it doesn't, immediately close the prisons down.

Domestic Spying

Mr. Bush personally authorized the National Security Agency to ignore federal law and eavesdrop on telephone calls and e-mail between the United States and other countries without a warrant. Republican lawmakers have introduced bills that would legalize the program after the fact. The only remotely sensible measure is from Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who has proposed forcing the eavesdropping back under the 1978 surveillance law and giving the administration a bit more flexibility to do electronic surveillance.

But we agree with Senator John Rockefeller IV, the incoming chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, who says more needs to be known about the program before enacting new laws. The administration has stymied Congressional efforts to look into the spying operation, refusing even to turn over the presidential order creating it.

The Intelligence on Iraq

Nearly two and a half years ago, the Senate Intelligence Committee reported on the nation's spy agencies' prewar failure to figure out that there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, and promised to deliver a report on whether Mr. Bush and his team pressured the agencies to cherry-pick or hype evidence — or lied outright to Americans.

Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican head of the intelligence panel, dragged out the second phase of the report, with the aim of killing it. We hope Mr. Rockefeller finishes the job.

That will require heavy lifting on the most important section, comparing the statements of administration officials to what they knew about the intelligence. Mr. Roberts insisted that it cover every public statement by any administration official or member of Congress dating back to 1991. What President Bill Clinton or Senator Hillary Clinton said about Iraq is irrelevant. What matters is what was said by Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney — who ordered the invasion of Iraq — and by their aides. We hope Mr. Rockefeller's committee will sift through the hundreds of statements collected so far and focus on the ones that matter.

Unhappily, this is not an exhaustive list and there will be big fights over many of these issues. But it is not too late to take action. The midterm elections prove that despite all the posturing and fearmongering, the American public has not been blinded or deafened to what this country stands for and the need for truth.

Blocking Justice (WP)

By Emily Bazelon

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107202

On Wednesday, a federal judge dismissed the habeas corpus petition of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a detainee at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Latin for "you have the body," habeas corpus allows detainees to ask a court to order their warden to explain the basis for their detention. Hamdan's petition was dismissed because of the Military Commissions Act, which Congress passed last fall to take away the habeas rights of Guantanamo Bay detainees. The MCA is a classic example of "jurisdiction stripping." When the courts hand down rulings that Congress doesn't like, lawmakers sometimes retaliate by trying to take away their power to hear certain kinds of cases, or by strictly limiting what they can do.

That is also the story behind another case this week, in which the Supreme Court reversed a lower court's decision to grant a new trial in a murder case. At the original trial, the victim's family members wore large buttons with his picture on them, which the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ruling violated the rights of the defendant, Mathew Musladin. Musladin brought a habeas corpus petition arguing that the buttons could have prejudiced the jury. Most of the Supreme Court justices agreed that seeing the victim's picture every day didn't exactly dispose the jury to be more fair. But the federal courts could not intervene, they ruled unanimously, because of a 1996 statute that allows them to give habeas relief only when the state courts have gotten the law utterly wrong.

Why does Congress get to take cases away from judges? In his book "America's Constitution," Yale law professor Akhil Reed Amar points out that judges weren't the heroes of the revolution. They were appointed by the British crown. The Constitution's drafters gave Congress weapons to use against the courts without giving judges much to defend themselves with. The president can draw his veto pen if Congress goes after him. The Supreme Court has to find a straight-faced way to declare a law unconstitutional when it weakens the judiciary's powers, Amar writes.

The MCA is such a law. It also may be unconstitutional in some cases. But Hamdan's case isn't one of them, according to last week's ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson. Hamdan's problem is that he's a non-citizen whose contact with the United States has been "involuntary." The MCA stripped Hamdan of the right to habeas corpus granted by federal statute. There are also constitutional rights to habeas. But non-citizens don't have the sort of "substantial connection with our country" that justifies invoking the constitutional right to habeas corpus, the Supreme Court ruled in 1990 in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez.

If Robertson is right that this ruling applies to Hamdan -- a question the Supreme Court will eventually settle -- hundreds of Guantanamo Bay detainees won't get federal habeas review either.

The limitations of habeas review, in the wake of Congress's tinkering, are on display in cases such as Musladin's. The legislation that Congress passed in 1996 says that the federal courts can't grant a habeas petition that state courts have turned down unless the state court decision "was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court." That is a high bar. The ruling in Musladin's case underscores how high: The 9th Circuit was wrong to spend its time determining whether it was fair for the victim's family to wear the photo buttons in front of the jury. Instead, the federal courts can only look to see whether the Supreme Court has already said it's not fair.

There are reasons for federal judges to defer to state judges -- among them the principle of comity, according to which different branches of government show respect for one another, and the principle of finality, which in this context basically means that you get your habeas crack in the state courts, and that's enough. But habeas review has historically given defendants a chance to air their appeals outside the state system, with its giant caseloads and sometimes rushed rulings. Congress's 1996 habeas law has largely choked off this avenue. Consider Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's concurrence in Musladin's appeal. "Buttons proclaiming a message relevant to the case ought to be prohibited as a matter of course," he wrote, and called for a new rule to make it so -- in a future case. In other words, too late for Mathew Musladin.

If Musladin's predicament doesn't move you, consider that of Paul Gregory House. Twenty years ago, a Tennessee jury convicted him of a woman's murder after FBI testing appeared to show his semen on her clothing and her blood on his jeans. He was sentenced to death.

Then DNA testing showed that the semen on the victim's clothes came from her husband, and that the blood on House's jeans came from autopsy samples that spilled in the crime lab. Whoops. But House still had a big problem: His claims of innocence were barred by state procedural rules. Would the federal courts pry open the doors?

It was hardly a slam-dunk. Last June, in a dissent by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., four justices said that the courts need not reconsider House's appeal, because he had not proved his innocence. But five justices said that House should get his second day in court because he had shown that it was likely that no reasonable juror would find him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

Even so, House doesn't get out of prison, nor is he spared the death penalty. He doesn't automatically get a new trial. Because of the 1996 habeas law, he has to plunge back into the procedural thicket.

DOJ_NMG_0107203

Letting Congress strip the courts of the authority to hear certain claims or cases means giving more power to the people, who can elect their lawmakers but not their federal judges. From a pre-revolutionary vantage point, that made sense. But these days it's more often judges whom we can count on, if we can count on anyone, to stand up for the procedural rights of murder defendants and Guantanamo Bay detainees. Should Congress be able to block them?

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Showdown Looms Over Domestic Spying (AP)

By David Kravets

AP, December 16, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO --Federal agents continue to eavesdrop on Americans' electronic communications without warrants a year after President Bush confirmed the practice, and experts say a new Congress' efforts to limit the program could trigger a constitutional showdown.

High-ranking Democrats set to take control of both chambers are mulling ways to curb the program Bush secretly authorized a month after the Sept. 11 attacks. The White House argues the Constitution gives the president wartime powers to eavesdrop that he wouldn't have during times of peace.

"As a practical matter, the president can do whatever he wants as long as he has the capacity and executive branch officials to do it," said Carl Tobias, a legal scholar at the University of Richmond in Virginia.

Lawmakers could impeach or withhold funding, or quash judicial nominations, among other measures.

The president, however, can veto legislation, including a law demanding the National Security Agency obtain warrants before monitoring communications. Such a veto would force Congress to muster a two-thirds vote to override.

"He could take the position he doesn't have to comply with whatever a new Congress says," said Vikram Amar, a law professor at the University of California, Hastings, and a former Supreme Court clerk.

Douglas Kmiec, a former Justice Department official under former presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush, speculated the younger Bush would assert executive authority to continue eavesdropping in the face of new legislation -- perhaps leaving the Supreme Court as the final arbiter.

"He has as much a constitutional obligation to assert himself, just as much as Congress does," Kmiec said. "We do need an arbitrator, an interpreter. That's what the courts, the third branch of government, was intended to be."

On Dec. 17, 2005, Bush publicly acknowledged for the first time he had authorized the NSA to monitor, without approval from a judge, phone calls and e-mails that come into or originate in the U.S. and involve people the government suspects of having terrorist links.

Bush said he had no intention of halting what he called a "vital tool" in the war on terror.

When the Republican-controlled Congress adjourned last week, it left the spying program unchecked.

The next move falls to the Democrats who take control in January and are considering a proposal to demands Bush get warrants and others lengthening the time between surveillance and when a warrant must be obtained.

A spokesman for Sen. Harry Reid, the incoming Senate majority leader from Nevada, said the eavesdropping issue "is something he expects to tackle early next year."

"He doesn't believe in giving the president a blank check to listen to the phone conversations of millions of Americans," spokesman Jim Manley said.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Nancy Pelosi, the San Francisco Democrat who will become House speaker, said eavesdropping legislation was under consideration and hearings on the topic were likely early next year.

Decisions are pending in dozens of lawsuits challenging the program.

The Cincinnati-based 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, the highest court squarely confronted with the issue so far, is to hear the American Civil Liberties Union's challenge Jan. 31. One stop short of the Supreme Court, the appeals court will review a Detroit judge's ruling that the program was unconstitutional.

The case is American Civil Liberties Union v. National Security Agency, 06-2095.

Padilla Terror Case Gets Closer Look (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107204

WASHINGTON — A federal judge in Miami will soon make one of the most important rulings in the Bush administration's war on terrorism and decide whether to publicly explore evidence that an accused terrorist was brutally mistreated for years inside a one-man isolation cell.

The allegations involve Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen once portrayed as one of the most dangerous Al Qaeda operatives ever arrested. Padilla's lawyers have asked U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke to set him free because of the abuse they say he suffered.

Though federal judges rarely dismiss criminal charges before trial, the allegations are so extreme that they may prompt Cooke to hold a pretrial hearing in what would be the first public court examination into how detainees were handled after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Padilla's lawyers also hope to shut down his case by proving that his incarceration as an "enemy combatant" at a Navy brig for more than three years without charges had left him incompetent to stand trial.

Any hearing before the trial, scheduled for next month, could prove explosive, as defense lawyers are leaning toward putting Padilla on the witness stand. That too would be a first — a Sept. 11-era detainee testifying about his treatment.

He has told his lawyers and mental-health experts that he was held without sunlight, adequate food or a clock, and was injected with truth-serum drugs to coerce him to talk. At times, he said, his wrists and torso were chained to the cell floor.

Further heightening the drama is a defense request to question military officials about conditions at the brig. Some officials have expressed concerns in written reports that Padilla and two other enemy combatants held in the brig outside Charleston, S.C., were abused.

'No merit whatsoever'

Federal prosecutors repeatedly have denied that Padilla was mistreated. "Mr. Padilla's allegations of torture have no merit whatsoever," prosecutors said in court filings.

Padilla was arrested in 2002 on suspicion of trying to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the U.S. The Department of Justice, led by then-Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft, castigated Padilla as a major terrorist menace but eventually scaled back its assessment and filed lesser charges of conspiracy.

Prosecutors say they can prove he was part of a "North American terror support cell" that sent money and supplies to terrorists in Bosnia and Chechnya. The government is urging the judge to deny Padilla's dismissal request — without airing the claims in a court hearing.

The judge, a former federal prosecutor and a defense lawyer appointed to the bench by President Bush, has scheduled a meeting Monday with both sides, and could rule then on the torture and competency questions.

Should she grant a hearing into the allegations, that would mark a major victory for criminal defense lawyers and human rights activists who have said the administration routinely violated the constitutional rights of detainees arrested after the 2001 terrorist attacks on New York and the Pentagon.

"This is a very fair judge," said Neal Sonnett, a Miami attorney who chaired an American Bar Assn. task force on enemy combatants. "She's very bright. She knows the law very well. And I think this is the kind of case in which the court understands that the world is watching."

Chances of dismissal

Sonnett and other legal experts noted that dismissal motions seldom are granted because they deny prosecutors the chance to put on their case.

"A lot of bad things were probably done to Mr. Padilla," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia who has monitored many of the terrorism cases. "But that doesn't mean you automatically get a dismissal."

Padilla, 36, was born in Brooklyn, raised in Chicago and, after embracing Islam in South Florida, moved to Egypt where he allegedly became involved with terrorist groups.

He was taken into custody in May 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport after stepping off a plane from Zurich. Law enforcement officials said his arrest broke up a plot in which Padilla was sent back to attack targets in the U.S.

In June 2002, Bush designated him an "enemy combatant," and the military put him in the Navy brig. In November 2005, he was charged with aiding terrorists abroad. Last January, he was moved to a federal jail in Miami to await trial. He was moved into the federal system before the Supreme Court could rule on whether a U.S. citizen could be indefinitely detained as an enemy combatant.

Andrew Patel of New York, one of the defense lawyers, said the defense was not allowed into the brig until March 2004, only to discover that Padilla was alone in a two-tiered wing of 10 cells.

"Mr. Padilla was the only person housed in that unit," Patel said. "He had no contact with other human beings."

DOJ_NMG_0107205

Patel said the cell windows were blocked; no natural light entered the 9-by-7 space. There was no mirror, no clock, no calendar: just a slot in the door for food and a steel platform for a bed.

Sometimes Padilla suffered deep chest pains and feared a heart attack. "He could neither breathe nor move," Patel said.

Another time, Patel said, Padilla smelled a "terrible odor" and believed that guards had pumped a noxious gas into the cell.

He was often kept awake by loud noises or low temperatures, Patel said. Other times, he says, he was given a truth serum that lawyers said they believed was some form of LSD or PCP.

He coughed up blood, Patel said. He repeatedly scratched the back of his hand. He rapidly blinked his eyes. Goose bumps dotted his arms and neck.

Sometimes he sat bolt upright in his chair, as "if he had been stuck by a cattle prod." He showed little emotion about his trial, Patel said, seeming more like "a piece of furniture."

When Patel tried to discuss the case, he said, Padilla would beg off. "Please, please, please," he would say, fearful that if he helped his lawyers, he would be returned to the brig and solitary confinement.

Observations from experts

Dr. Angela Hegarty, a New York psychiatrist who examined Padilla for the defense over five days in June and September, told the judge the prisoner often "begged his guards not to put him in the cage."

She said Padilla could not understand that his trial was drawing near. "He has large memory gaps related to his detention, and he is unable to place events in chronological order," she said.

She concluded that Padilla, whom she said believed he was going to die during his detention, is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. "Mr. Padilla," she said, "periodically concludes that no matter what, win or lose, he will be going back to the brig, where he will die."

The defense team filed a new report Wednesday from Patricia Zapf, a clinical psychologist in New York, who examined Padilla twice in October. She concluded he suffered from depression and paranoia, and had "difficulty with memory, attention and concentration."

She said he told her that he did not want to testify — that he feared it would be too much like what he underwent during interrogations. Padilla "appears to be in a fragile psychological state," Zapf concluded.

Though it is not clear whether the government has had its own experts examine Padilla to counter what the defense has learned, prosecutors have insisted Padilla was never harmed.

"The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture — allegations made without support and without citing a shred" of evidence in court, they told the judge in court filings. They declined to discuss the case outside of the courtroom.

Government lawyers also told the judge that she should rule on Padilla's competency before deciding whether to hold a hearing into the torture allegations — pretrial skirmishing that could delay the long-awaited trial.

Indeed, much is weighing on the judge. Cooke, 52, began her career as a Legal Aid attorney and public defender in Michigan and worked through most of the 1990s in the U.S. attorney's office in Miami. Bush appointed her to the federal bench in November 2003; she was confirmed the following May.

She has proved decisive in the Padilla matter already, ruling in August that there were overlapping charges filed against him. She dismissed the most serious conspiracy charge, which could have brought a life sentence, and left intact two counts that could get Padilla 20 years for providing material support to terrorists.

Twenty years is far less than what the government wants; they have appealed her decision.

WAR NEWS:

Go Big, Go Long, Go Wide: Bush's No-exit Options For Iraq (AP)

AP, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON- President Bush has taken the most dramatic options off the table as he tries to change direction in Iraq, leaving him with a list of modest military and diplomatic moves to announce in the new year.

Bush probably will ignore the boldest suggestions from a bipartisan commission that studied U.S. options in Iraq, adopting some of the group's lesser prescriptions alongside those drafted by his civilian and military advisers.

The White House National Security Council has compiled recommendations from several agencies as the administration's internal reassessment of Iraq policy nears an end. Bush plans to address the nation in early January, two months after heavy Republican losses in congressional elections.

A look at some of the president's options:

On the military front, there are various ways to "go big," by adding 10,000 to 20,000 troops to the approximately 135,000 U.S. forces in Iraq. Bush has gotten competing advice about how many troops to add, whether to define their mission as temporary or long term and whether to add troops at all.

Some military officers doubt that the results from any increase would be worth the damage to the Army's readiness. Others advocate adding forces and launching an offensive against Shiite militia leader Muqtada al-Sadr while increasing industrial and economic aid to civilians.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., has said the U.S. should send five to 10 more brigades of combat soldiers, translating to 15,000 to 30,000 additional troops. The current U.S. force includes about 15 combat brigades made up of 50,000 to 60,000 soldiers. Bush has been told that adding up to 20,000 troops would be fairly easy to arrange and a short-term surge of up to 50,000 could be done with difficulty.

The additional troops would be assigned primarily in Baghdad, where sectarian killing has surged out of control in the past 10 months. Some could go to Anbar province, where U.S. forces have been unable to dislodge the Sunni-led anti-government insurgency.

Another element of the "go big" idea is increasing the total size of the military. The chiefs of the Army and Marine Corps want to expand the size of their services, although departing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld opposed it. He cited an estimated cost of $1.2 billion a year for each 10,000 extra troops. The Army also wants the ability to mobilize Guard and Reserve troops more frequently than is now allowed; some in Congress are likely to resist such a change.

Bush probably will reject the Iraq Study Group's recommendation to pull back most combat forces by early 2008. Proposals before him include integrating or embedding more U.S. advisers in Iraqi Army units to provide guidance on tactics and leadership. The long-term goal would be a shift away from a primarily combat role, which some advisers say consigns U.S. forces to a defensive posture as they await the next attack by insurgents.

No matter how it is calibrated, this "go long" shift would reinforce the administration's recognition that U.S. troops will be in Iraq for years to come. Bush has rejected any suggestion for a quick withdrawal of U.S. forces, as some lawmakers recommend, and probably will not set a firm exit timetable. He is likely to endorse the basic idea recommended by the commission and others to condition at least some U.S. military and economic engagement to the performance of Iraq's government. Economic steps could include a significant jobs program. Unemployment in Iraq is estimated at between 20 percent and 60 percent.

Diplomatic options include expanding the U.S. outreach to various centers of power in Iraq and engaging Iraq's neighbors to help in a more vigorous and formal way - the "go wide" strategy. Bush probably will endorse elements of this approach while ruling out a new overture to U.S. adversaries Iran and Syria.

The State Department has recommended the U.S. keep supporting the shaky government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki but "diversify our portfolio," as one official put it. Seeking common ground with leaders in and out of government would help protect U.S. interests if, for example, al-Maliki were to lose power.

The starkest choice for diplomacy is one Bush is almost certain to reject: stop trying to recruit greater Sunni participation in a unified government and cast U.S. fortunes with the Shiite and Kurdish majority. Sunnis make up about 20 percent of the population but are blamed for fanning insurgent violence that accounts for most U.S. casualties.

A competing plan would woo the Sunni elite by guaranteeing them a share of oil revenue and reversing the previous policy of "de-Baathification," which purged ex-members of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led Baathist rule from the top layers of government institutions.

Bush is weighing plans for a more structured network of Arab nations with a goal of clamping down on the violence in Iraq. This regional forum could become an expanded version of an existing State Department-backed initiative, offering a framework for countries to discuss Iraq and meet with Iraqi leaders.

Such a partnership presumably would have to include Iran and Syria. Those countries, which share borders with Iraq, hold great influence inside Iraq. U.S. diplomats would participate alongside Iranian and Syrian representatives but Bush probably will not endorse direct negotiations with them, as the Iraq Study Group recommended.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said both nations would probably use direct talks to seek unacceptable "compensation" from the United States. If Iran and Syria see it as in their interest to help Iraq they will do so on their own, she suggested to reporters last week.

Bush also is likely to endorse a renewed effort to resolve other Middle East conflicts as a means to an end in Iraq.

Stubborn Or Stalwart, Bush Is Loath To Budge (WP)

By Peter Baker

DOJ_NMG_0107207

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

In the late 19th century, the queen of England sent the president of the United States a desk made from the timbers of a decommissioned ship, the HMS Resolute. Almost every occupant of the White House since then has made the Resolute his desk. Perhaps more than most, President Bush has taken its name to heart.

But now, as Bush rethinks his strategy in Iraq and approaches one of the most fateful moments of his presidency, he confronts difficult questions: At what point does determination to a cause become self-defeating folly? Can he change direction in a meaningful way without sacrificing principle?

For Bush, this is a tension that goes to the heart of his political identity and governing style. He captured and retained the presidency in part by portraying two successive Democratic opponents as finger-in-the-wind politicians without a core set of beliefs. The notion of bending to critics or even popular will cuts against his grain. Yet it is also true that at key moments in his career, Bush has been willing to abandon his position and shift gears dramatically.

No position has been more central to Bush's leadership than his decision to invade Iraq in 2003 and his unyielding defense of his conduct of the war ever since. But he went out of his way last week to give the appearance of a man genuinely seeking new ideas as he shuffled between the White House, the State Department and the Pentagon's ultra-secure "tank," and then delayed making a decision while he and his team debated the options.

"I think George W. Bush is a totally pragmatic politician," said former senator Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.), a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recommended a new course. "He's going to do outreach. . . . He is a total realist. He knows that the solid, march-in-step Republicans, at least in the House, are gone. . . . Now his legacy depends on the national interest, not partisanship."

Others don't buy it. On its Web site last week, the Democratic National Committee said Bush could be "the most stubborn man on Earth" for not immediately embracing the study group's plan. Critics predicted that any new strategy he announces after the holidays will be little more than a dressed-up version of "stay the course." And a recent Washington Post-ABC News poll found that 66 percent of Americans do not think Bush is willing to change his policies in Iraq.

"I just don't believe that this president, with this vice president whispering in his ear every moment, is oriented to change," said retired Col. Larry Wilkerson, who was chief of staff to Secretary of State Colin L. Powell in Bush's first term. "And even if he were, I don't believe his administration is capable of implementing change."

Lawrence J. Korb, a former Pentagon official under President Ronald Reagan, agreed. "When it comes to Iraq, he has basically confused stubbornness with steadfastness," said Korb, who is now at the liberal Center for American Progress. "I think he believes that regardless of what other people say, if he simply stays the course, he'll be eventually proved right. But what he fails to see is the current course isn't working and he has options."

The perception of Bush as unusually stubborn has defined his tenure to some extent, much to the consternation of adversaries and sometimes even allies. But Bush was deeply influenced by the fate of his father, whose decision to break his no-new-taxes pledge as president helped doom his reelection. The lesson: Stick to decisions regardless of shifts in political winds.

The seemingly unshakeable confidence in the rightness of his positions has helped the current president weather political storms that might overwhelm others. For a man who presides over an unpopular war, just lost Congress and faces a final two years with constrained options, Bush gives little sign of self-pity. At holiday parties for friends and family in recent days, he has found himself bucking up others depressed by the turn in his political fortunes. "Don't worry, it's not as bad as it looks," he told one friend visiting the White House. "There's a lot we can get done."

The friend, who shared the private moments on the condition of anonymity, was struck by how upbeat Bush seemed. "But he's not a fool," the friend added. "He knows how bad all this is, trust me. There is some resignation that this is where he finds himself. I know he's got a lot of second thoughts about how he got there. Anybody would."

Bush decided a long time ago that expressing second thoughts publicly would be seen as a sign of weakness, according to some close to him. "I'm oftentimes asked about, 'Well, you're stubborn,' and all this," Bush told a group of conservative journalists in September. "If you believe in a strategy, in Washington, D.C., you've got to stick to that strategy, see? People want you to change. It's tactics that shift, but the strategic vision has not, and will not, shift."

Despite Bush's reputation as unbending, he has reversed himself before in the interest of expediency. During battles over education legislation or funds for religious charities, he changed key positions. Perhaps the most notable example was the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, which he strongly resisted until embracing the idea as if it were his own.

"He always starts out by stressing his maximum position and then doesn't budge until he absolutely has to," said Bruce Buchanan, a professor at the University of Texas at Austin who has watched Bush's career for years. "He could conceivably be doing that right now."

DOJ_NMG_0107208

Advisers reject the idea that Bush never changes. " 'Stubborn' is just a convenient characterization that's not really accurate," said Mark McKinnon, his political strategist. McKinnon recalled how Bush pivoted after losing the New Hampshire primary in 2000. "That was a serious blow, and we had to really redirect the campaign strategically. He recognized that we had to amend our strategy, and we did."

John Bridgeland, Bush's former domestic policy adviser, said the president is more interested in other points of view than people think he is. He drills aides with questions that challenge even his own beliefs. "He's like a boxer, and he'll hit you right between the eyes with a really tough question," Bridgeland said. "And if you don't have a really good answer, he'll tell you you're losing altitude."

Still, history shows that Bush does not change easily or quickly. For years, he ignored calls to fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, even when the idea was endorsed by his own top aides. He waited to oust Rumsfeld until the day after midterm elections handed Congress to Democrats -- too little, too late, in the minds of Republicans who grumbled that he cost them their majorities. Robert M. Gates will take over the Pentagon tomorrow with different views about how to proceed. The question is whether Bush will heed him.

"He changes his mind all the time, as any thinking human being would," said David Frum, a former Bush speechwriter and sometime critic. "He probably changes his mind somewhat less than other politicians do, but he's not set in concrete." Having said that, Frum said Iraq is too critical to waver on. "A lot of people want him to change his mind on the central decision of his presidency. And on that, he hasn't, he shouldn't, and he won't."

Ex-Defense Chief Warns On Iraq Direction (WP/AP)

The Washington Post/AP, December 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former Defense Secretary William Perry, a member of the Iraq Study Group, said Saturday that Iraq could turn into a "quagmire" if the Bush administration fails to change strategy.

Perry, who led the Pentagon under President Clinton, delivered the Democratic Party's weekly radio address.

Referring to the Vietnam War, Perry said: "The term 'quagmire' recalls one of the saddest periods in American history, which we do not want to relive. But I believe that is likely to happen if we 'stay the course' in Iraq."

Perry reiterated the recommendations of last week's report from the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton.

"We need to accelerate the training of Iraqi army and police forces," Perry said. "We need to begin to pull out U.S. combat brigades, with the goal of having all except rapid-reaction forces out by first quarter of 2008. ... We need to push friendly regional powers to assist. We need to put pressure on unfriendly regional powers to stop arming militias and fomenting violence. And finally, we need to invigorate the Israeli-Palestinian peace process."

President Bush has been meeting over the last week with current and former military leaders _ as well as advisers from other parts of the government _ to assess possible new strategies for the Iraq war. But he has made it clear he will not map out a new war strategy until his new defense secretary, Robert Gates, has taken over and offered his counsel.

The Iraq Study Group report was critical of just about every aspect of the administration's war policies. Bush welcomed some of its recommendations but dismissed others, particularly the call for withdrawing a substantial number of U.S. troops over the next year.

Perry said he believed the report "will frame the debate in our country this coming year. And it will demonstrate that it is possible, even in the poisonous political climate that now exists, to address important national problems in a truly bipartisan manner."

Roadside Bombs Kill Troops At Highest Rate Of Iraq War (BOS)

By Bryan Bender

The Boston Globe, December 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- US troops in Iraq are dying in roadside bombings at a higher rate than any period since the war began -- some in follow-up attacks in the same locations -- but commanders still have no effective means to monitor the deadliest routes for patrols, according to Pentagon officials and documents.

Military deaths from roadside bombs have hit an all-time high in recent months: In October, 53 US troops died from improvised explosive devices, while in November, 49 troop deaths were blamed on so-called IEDs -- the second and third highest monthly tolls of the war, official statistics and casualty reports show.

DOJ_NMG_0107209

That is far higher than the overall monthly average of 28 IED-related deaths since July 2003, when the data were first compiled. And in the three previous months, between 22 and 29 soldiers and Marines died from roadside bombs.

But the Pentagon office charged with solving the problem is still a step behind the bombers.

Officials at the Joint IED Defeat Organization admit that most of the billions of dollars they get each year goes to developing high-tech gear to detect or disarm bombs rather than addressing the root of the problem: finding out where the bombs come from and who is planting them.

"The enemy has the ability to freely fabricate IED and car bombs, plant and set ambushes, rocket, mortar and IED attacks, and have the recruits and resources crossing borders to reinforce and resupply the insurgent forces undetected," according to a recent briefing prepared for top Pentagon officials responsible for counter-insurgency strategy.

December is on track to become the deadliest month of all. According to news reports, 53 soldiers died as of Dec. 16; Pentagon data indicates that roughly 60 percent of all casualties this month came from roadside bombings. Throughout much of the war, IEDs have caused about half of all US combat deaths in Iraq, according to a September study by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service. .

That has spurred outrage among military officers, Pentagon contractors, and members of Congress. They charge that, after spending billions of taxpayer dollars to address the problem there is still virtually no solid intelligence on how the bombers operate.

Senator Gordon Smith , a Republican from Oregon who had been a longtime supporter of the Iraq war, put it bluntly in his critique of the Iraq war on the Senate floor last week:

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day. That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore."

The Joint IED Defeat Organization, which had been hailed as the "Manhattan Project" of the roadside bomb problem, "has been a disaster," said Ed O'Connell , a counter-insurgency specialist at the government-funded Rand Corporation in Santa Monica, Calif. , who has advised US commanders in Iraq.

For its part, the organization claims some progress. They say that the percentage of bombs that are disarmed or detonated before they can kill or maim has remained "stable and consistent" over the past 18 months, and they say there are now fewer casualties per IED attack.

The "vast majority" of IEDs are disarmed or otherwise rendered harmless, the office said in a statement.

But officials acknowledged that the number of roadside bombings has "risen dramatically over the last two years," though they would not provide statistics.

That increase has confounded the military and raised questions about whether gathering intelligence on the bombers should be the office's top priority. The Pentagon briefing paper, provided by a defense contractor to the Globe, concluded that there is "an urgent need" in both Iraq and Afghanistan for "persistent surveillance" to track the bombers and neutralize the IEDs.

Congress this fall set aside $100 million to acquire new aircraft for what the military calls "wide field of view" surveillance: watching particularly active areas and intercepting the bombers. The goal would be to make it "a suicide mission" for insurgents to plant a bomb, according to a report attached to the 2007 Defense Authorization Bill.

Cheap and lethal, roadside bombs are the tactic of choice for both Sunni and Shia Muslim insurgent groups opposed to the US military presence. Authorities believe some insurgents are getting supplies and training from Iran and the Lebanese militant group Hezbollah.

Most of the explosives, US officials say, are assembled with munitions left over from Saddam Hussein's arsenal, while others are built from explosives smuggled across Iraq's porous borders. They are triggered by a variety of inexpensive means, including trip wires, cellphones, and household timers, and the insurgents have created increasingly sophisticated bombs to stay a step ahead of US countermeasures.

But in its detailed assessment of the Iraq war, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group concluded that, nearly four years into the war, US forces know little about insurgent operations.

And, after spending almost $2 billion this year on IED countermeasures, according to the study group, the White House "has not put forward a request to invest comparable resources in trying to understand the people who fabricate, plant and explode those devices."

For its part, the IED office told the Globe that it spends 63 percent of its budget on ways to "defeat the device," while only 30 percent goes to attacking "the network" that creates and plants the bombs. The rest of its budget is spent on new training methods for US troops operating in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But military specialists say that the Pentagon needs to pay more attention to dissecting the "kill chain" -- the source of the bomb components, who made the bomb, and who planted it.

"We can't even detect their explosives," said Loren Thompson , a military specialist at the Lexington Institution, an Arlington, Va., think tank that supports strong military preparedness. "We don't have the resources to police or survey every road. The IED problem is a case study of how military transformation has failed.

"It sounds like a threat where good intelligence and good surveillance would make a big difference," she said. "But we don't seem to be able to develop those things."

That lack of intelligence, however, is not only blamed on the IED office but also on commanders in the field, who some specialists say aren't forthcoming about the extent of the problem.

A previously unpublicized assessment generated by the Republican staff of the House Armed Services Committee and obtained by the Globe effectively accused the generals of hedging the truth when Congress asks what they need to protect the troops.

The 2005 congressional report said that on numerous occasions, generals assured lawmakers that they have "complete [intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance] coverage over the respective theater battlespace; and in effect, 'they get everything.' " That has repeatedly been proven wrong, it said.

"The assumption then has always been that the troops also 'get everything' in the way of warning and intelligence, but this has not been the case," the report said. "The fact that the enemy still has the ability to go out at night and set dozens of IEDs, mine and cut pipelines, and have hundreds of new recruits coming in to join and reinforce the insurgent forces undetected gives testament to the fact that something is gravely wrong."

Ties That Bind Iraqi Forces Break Easily (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

KARMAH, IRAQ — As U.S. forces train Iraqis to take more responsibility in fighting insurgents in Al Anbar province, they say that leadership in the Iraqis' enlisted ranks remains in short supply.

An Iraqi army unit here sagged after the death of one of its soldiers, whom Marines nicknamed Sgt. Barnes after a hard-nosed character in the movie "Platoon." And Marines say the unit's combat effectiveness fell apart after a sergeant they respected was killed by a roadside bomb.

"As long as they have one or two guys who know what they're doing, the rest follow them," said Marine Lance Cpl. Andrew Gendron, 20.

Maj. Sean Riordan, the executive officer of the Marines' 2nd Battalion, 8th Regiment, speaks Arabic and has worked with the armies of Kuwait, Oman, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates. The problem facing the Iraqis is common to many armies in the Arab world, he said.

"They do not have a very broad-based approach to decision-making," Riordan said. "They are particularly dependent on strong, forceful leaders, and when they lose one, they have trouble continuing."

Master Sgt. Daniel Masters, 44, a 21-year Marine veteran, said armies of the former Soviet bloc faced similar problems because of centralized decision-making. Many of the officers in former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's army were trained by the Soviets.

Masters is in charge of the Marine contingent at a tiny, ramshackle compound for Iraqi police and soldiers and Marines in this farming community outside Fallouja. The police fled recently after threats from insurgents, and the soldiers were transferred elsewhere. Masters hopes they will return.

A year ago the Marine Corps changed its priorities to emphasize the training of Iraqi security forces. At this station, Marines and Iraqi soldiers went on joint missions but details often had to be withheld from the Iraqis for fear they would inform the insurgents.

"You want to trust them, but you really can't," said Lance Cpl. Robert Warren, 20.

First Lt. Scott Burlison, 38, said he had seen signs that Iraqi troops were improving, but that the soldiers needed better equipment and logistical support from the central government in Baghdad.

The effort to work with Iraqi forces also has helped improve relations with the local population, he said.

"They're not so much negative around here as neutral to us, which is better than negative," he said. "Nobody expects them to be our best friends."

First Sgt. Paul Archie, 37, said the hardscrabble upbringing of many of the Iraqi soldiers has served them well, but that they need better leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0107211

"They've grown up fighting. For them it's nothing new to see an AK-47," he said. "They're not cowards."

One soldier who had earned the Marines' trust was named Saddam Hussein. He was an Iraqi special forces sergeant who fought against the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, and later cooperated with the Americans. He was killed by a roadside bomb.

The Marines appear more distant from the Iraqi police. While the army is mostly composed of Shiites, the police, recruited locally, are nearly all Sunni Arabs.

Police suspected of ties to the Sunni-led insurgency were recently purged by the government. A few days later one former police officer from Karmah was shot and killed by a Marine while planting a roadside bomb in nearby Saqlawiya.

The police stationed here fled after a campaign of intimidation by insurgents. Several had been killed. Insurgents warned the local gas station not to sell them gas for their vehicles.

"Twenty of them just turned in their badges and walked away — left their weapons and walked," said Cpl. Evan Wicha, 23. In other areas, there have been clashes between police and Iraqi soldiers.

In Karmah and elsewhere, Marines are incredulous at the idea of being able to simply quit and go home. In an informal discussion, someone joked that such a military unit was ideal.

"Not if they're your allies," another responded.

Legal System In Iraq Staggers Beneath The Weight Of War (NYT)

By Michael Moss

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

BAGHDAD — In a cavernous room that once displayed gifts given to Saddam Hussein, eight men in yellow prison garb sat on the floor facing the wall, guarded by two American soldiers.

Among them was Abdulla Sultan Khalaf, a Ministry of Industry employee seized by American troops who said they found 10 blasting caps and 100 sticks of TNT. When his name was called, he stood, walked into a cagelike defendant's box and peered over the wooden slats at a panel of three Iraqi judges of the central court.

The judges reviewed evidence prepared by an American military lawyer — testimony from two soldiers, photographs and a sketch of the scene.

The evidence went largely unchallenged, because Mr. Khalaf had no lawyer. The judges appointed one, but Mr. Khalaf had no chance to speak with him. Mr. Khalaf told the judges that the soldiers were probably chasing a rogue nephew and denied that the explosives were his or ever in his house. "Let me examine the pictures," he insisted. The judges ignored him. His lawyer said nothing, beyond declaring Mr. Khalaf's innocence. The trial lasted 15 minutes.

The judges conducted six trials of similar length and depth before lunch, then deliberated for four minutes. Five defendants were found guilty; one was acquitted. "The evidence is enough," Judge Saeb Khorsheed Ahmed said in convicting Mr. Khalaf. "Thirty years."

The United States established the Central Criminal Court of Iraq three years ago, envisioning it as a pillar of a new democracy. But like the faltering effort to create effective Iraqi security forces, the system for detaining, charging and trying suspects has instead become another weak link in the rule of law in Iraq, according to an examination of the justice system by The New York Times.

The stakes are rising. The court has begun sentencing American-held detainees to death by hanging, 14 this year.

Almost every aspect of the judicial system is lacking, poorly serving not just detainees but also Iraqi citizens and troops trying to maintain order.

Soldiers who have little if any training in gathering evidence or sorting the guilty from the innocent are left to decide whom to detain. The military conducts reviews to decide whom to release, yet neither Iraqi detainees nor defense lawyers are allowed to attend, according to military documents and interviews.

Tens of thousands of detainees have been released by the Americans, often under political pressure from the Iraqis, but American soldiers complain they are apprehending many dangerous insurgents again and again. At the same time, detainees are held for long periods by the Americans without being charged, in some instances for as long as two years.

Even detainees who are formally charged and brought to the Iraqi court have little ability to develop a defense against evidence collected by American lawyers and soldiers. Most defense lawyers are appointed by the court and paid $15 per case. Even if they are so inclined, they are largely unable to gather evidence because of the threat of violence. One American lawyer said that in 100 cases he handled, not one defense lawyer had introduced evidence or witnesses.

The central court resembles the narrow end of a funnel crowded with suspects captured by American and Iraqi forces. No figures are available on prisoners held by Iraqis, but the Americans have held about 61,500 over the past three years and are now holding 14,000, military officials say. Roughly 3,000 have been charged and tried in the Iraqi court.

The court acquits nearly half of the defendants, but both Americans and Iraqis involved in the process say that political interference, threats from militants and the judges' fear for their lives weigh heavily in many verdicts. The military has found housing in the protected Green Zone for only 12 of the 30 judges on the criminal court. The others commute to work.

"The most fundamental thing that we need to do in Iraq is establish the rule of law," said Mark Waller, an Air Force Reserve major and deputy district attorney in Colorado, who spent four months this year in Baghdad helping to prosecute detainees. "It's the cornerstone of a civilization. Without it you have anarchy. And we are falling short."

Beyond the scandal at Abu Ghraib and the trial of Mr. Hussein, the system of holding and prosecuting detainees in Iraq has largely escaped public scrutiny. The day-to-day details of these government operations emerged from interviews with American and Iraqi officials, former detainees, a review of military records and a visit to proceedings in the Iraqi court normally closed to the public.

A classified Pentagon assessment completed in June of the American effort to strengthen Iraqi justice found one sign of progress: the prosecution of former senior government officials. Everything else, from training judges to building court capacity to minimizing civil rights abuses by Iraqi security forces, had fallen behind, according to the assessment by the National Security Council.

"Iraq's judiciary is technically independent but unable and unwilling to assert itself or provide a balance to Iraq's powerful political parties," it said. "The criminal justice system is overloaded and lacks the capacity to consistently process those arrested and/or detained."

Even though the American military helps to prosecute cases in the court, it does not always release detainees whose cases are dismissed, officials acknowledged in interviews. Maj. Gen. John D. Gardner, the commander of American detainee operations, orders those defendants held if the military believes they remain a threat. According to military officials, this has happened approximately 60 times, or in about 4 percent of the dismissed cases.

American officials said that within the confines of the nascent Iraqi justice system they were striving to protect American troops, while promoting due process. "Our goal is to balance detaining the people who are the real threats, and releasing those who are not, and that's a fine line," General Gardner said.

The justice system is most troubling for people like Intisar Jaafar. Her 29-year-old son, Laith al-Ani, was taken from his home in Baghdad by American troops in October 2004 in a search for weapons his mother said they never found. The military said he was a "security detainee" but would not elaborate.

Mr. Ani, a women's clothing merchant, is being held at Camp Bucca in the desert of southern Iraq, his relatives said. They have made the daylong trip to visit him, but it brought them no more information about when he might be charged, released or brought to court.

In a recent letter he drew a caged heart reaching out to his wife and two children, and wrote, "I hope I can be dust in the storms of Bucca so that I can reach you."

A Grand Vision

At 9 a.m. on a recent Monday, two United States Army trucks guarded by seven Humvees pulled to a halt in central Baghdad, just outside the protected Green Zone.

The soldiers fanned out with their rifles ready as a man in a black hood and yellow prison garb emerged, followed by more than 30 others, their hands and feet shackled.

The men shuffled down two flights of stairs into the Central Criminal Court.

The courthouse did not exist before the war, with most criminal cases left to provincial judges. In 2003, the Bush administration decided Iraq also needed a central court — like the American federal judiciary — for major national crimes like significant corruption or violence.

The vision was grand.

"Evil doers will face justice in honest and fair Iraqi courts," L. Paul Bremer III, the administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority, said in an address to the Iraqi people in November 2003.

Zuhair Maliky, an Iraqi lawyer tapped by the Americans as a chief judge, said: "It was to be a model for all of the courts around the country, where students would come to read the records and learn how courts work. There was to be a library, a conference room where judges would give lectures, and computers where court records would be kept."

But that vision has run into the realities of Iraq — the insurgency, a lack of resources and politics.

Security concerns have effectively closed proceedings to the public. Court records are not kept on computers, but mostly in paper files held together by yarn. And the daily proceedings, observed by a reporter, are hardly a model of deliberative justice.

That day's defendants came from two American detention camps and from sundry Iraqi jails.

DOJ_NMG_0107213

Shortly past 10 a.m., two American soldiers escorted Hussan Lotfi Abdulla upstairs to a judge's office for a preliminary hearing. Mr. Abdulla, who had been in detention for nearly two years, sat next to his court-appointed Iraqi lawyer, whom he had never met.

Facing them in front of the judge's desk was Capt. Lisa Gorog, a military lawyer who had come to Baghdad to help the military unit that runs the American detention operations in Iraq.

The unit is doubling its legal staff to more than 100 lawyers and aides, drawn largely from the military and prosecutor's offices throughout the United States.

Even for experienced prosecutors, identifying strong cases among the mass of detainees is difficult given the quality of the evidence. Capt. Matt McCall, who focuses on men like Mr. Abdulla who have been detained in the volatile Anbar Province in western Iraq, said he had to sift through the files of 50 detainees to find 2 that he thought could be convicted. The rest were left in detention either because the soldiers who captured them were not readily available as witnesses or because the evidence was too weak, he said.

The case against Mr. Abdulla presented its own challenges. The one-page case summary prepared by Captain Gorog for the judge said Mr. Abdulla was detained on Jan. 27, 2005, when American soldiers grew suspicious of the taxi in which he was riding. When they forced it to stop, a man got out and tossed a grenade, which did not explode. They killed the man, and searched the taxi where they said they found rocket-propelled grenades, launchers and armor-piercing ammunition.

But Mr. Abdulla had another problem. He is Syrian but had no passport when he was detained. He faced at least 15 years in prison if Captain Gorog could show he had come to Iraq illegally to fight.

After the judge asked some perfunctory questions, Captain Gorog jumped in.

"Why did you come to Iraq?" she asked through an interpreter.

"For work and study," he replied.

"Why did you come to Ramadi?"

"To visit a friend."

"Didn't you know the man throwing the grenade?"

"No. I heard the explosions, but I was lying on the ground."

"How did you know it was a grenade?"

"The investigator told me."

"He was right there! Didn't you see the incident?"

"I was handcuffed on the ground. I didn't see it."

Mr. Abdulla's lawyer remained silent. The judge, who reserved judgment on whether Mr. Abdulla would be tried, asked the clerk to write a one-page summary of the hearing, which the lawyer signed without reading.

In the hall later, Mr. Abdulla's lawyer, who asked not to be identified for fear he would be killed, said he had been given the case just moments before the hearing and would have liked to have met with Mr. Abdulla, "to know how to defend him." But he said lawyers had stopped asking to meet with American detainees because judges had denied their requests.

"They said it's the Americans who don't allow this," the lawyer said. "It's in order that we don't dictate what they say."

American detention officials denied that was their policy but said it was difficult to arrange for defense lawyers to meet defendants either at detention camps or at the courthouse before the proceedings.

Although Iraq has an inquisitorial system in which judges are empowered to investigate, question witnesses and elicit evidence, defendants have a constitutional right to a lawyer. "We can't imagine a fair judiciary system without a defense lawyer where he can practice his duty," said Diya al-Saadie, who until this month ran the Iraqi Bar Association.

Karen Hanrahan, an international law expert who was the State Department's rule-of-law coordinator in Iraq until recently, devised a plan to create a public defender system to train and pay defense lawyers. She said it was never financed in part because judicial planning was dominated by American prosecutors who took a dim view of defense lawyers.

American lawyers have been brought in to help prosecute cases. Iraqi judges have been flown to Prague and The Hague for workshops. But, Ms. Hanrahan said, "there was no effort to train and work with lawyers."

Charles W. Larson Sr., the United States attorney for the Northern District of Iowa and an adviser in Iraq in 2004 and 2005, said his team was mindful of defense lawyers but chose to focus on helping judges because "it is a judicially driven system."

Rapid-Fire Proceedings

By late morning, the courthouse halls bustled with court personnel, private security guards, Iraqi police, American soldiers and their detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0107214

At 11:30 a.m., Judge Saeb Ahmed, the chief judge, entered a large courtroom and took the middle of three seats at the dais. Behind him, the scales of justice had been painted on the wall. Black Hawk helicopters passed outside the windows. Explosions could be heard in the distance.

Judge Ahmed and his colleagues had a full docket, but they worked quickly.

The first two men to stand trial were detained by Iraqi security forces on Jan. 3, 2005, in connection with several Baghdad attacks, one on a hospital. Their families had hired a lawyer, Abdul Ami Ali, for $2,500, and with a flourish he told the judges that he had learned that one of the alleged attacks never occurred. He produced a letter from the hospital administrator to prove it. Judge Ahmed added the letter to the defendants' file, ended the trial and called the next case.

Sad Mahmud Saleh, a 24-year-old truck driver, was accused by American soldiers of having contraband weapons, including a hand grenade, in his house. His trial consisted largely of Judge Ahmed asking questions. At one point the judge stood and raised his voice.

"Are you a terrorist?" he asked.

"No," Mr. Saleh replied, standing in the tall wooden defendant's box.

"Are you involved in any organization?"

"No."

"Why did they bring you here?"

Mr. Saleh's lawyer, appointed to represent him just as the trial began, simply asked for mercy.

After four more trials, each lasting about 15 minutes, the judges adjourned and cleared the courtroom. It was 1:05 p.m.

At 1:09, they reopened the doors and announced their verdicts and the sentences.

The American military lawyers had mixed results.

Saif Raad Mohammed, who was detained in January 2005 when soldiers said they found a machine gun with a silencer in his home, was sentenced to six years in prison.

The judges issued a string of long sentences, including 30 years for Mr. Saleh in the hand grenade case, and 30 years for the hospital attackers.

The defendants' lawyer was devastated, saying he figured that the hospital administrator's letter would have at least prompted the judges to investigate. Judge Ahmed declined to discuss any of that day's trials or make available any court records. But The Times obtained the judges' one-page written decision in the hospital attack case. It made no mention of the administrator's letter.

The judges dismissed the case against a man accused of joining an armed group after the Iraqi prosecutor told them there was not sufficient evidence.

He smiled as his verdict was read, but he did not leave the courthouse a free man. All the American-held detainees were taken back to the detention center. Those found guilty would be sent to Iraqi prisons. The man whose case was dismissed would be reviewed again by American military officials, who would determine whether to release him.

Overcrowded Stockades

The population of American-held detainees now crowding the central court and the prison camps grew quickly and unexpectedly. Shortly after Mr. Hussein was toppled, American soldiers began pulling looters and other troublemakers off the street.

Judge Gilbert S. Merritt, a federal judge from Nashville, Tenn., who was in Baghdad to help rebuild the justice system, said he asked American officials, "What are you going to do with these people now that you've picked them up?"

"They were holding them, here and there in stockades, and most were taken to Abu Ghraib, the only facility that the Americans knew about," Judge Merritt said.

When the insurgency took hold, the trickle of petty thieves turned into a torrent of people suspected of being terrorists and captured fighters. By the time the Abu Ghraib abuse scandal was disclosed in the spring of 2004, the Americans were holding about 7,500 people.

Largely unnoticed, the flood of detainees has only increased since then. But neither the Americans troops, who were fighting an insurgency for which they were not prepared, nor the newly reconstituted Iraqi police, had a comprehensive plan for handling them.

Untold numbers of detainees have also been captured and questioned by American soldiers, then turned over to Iraqi security forces who often hold prisoners in miserable conditions.

Early last year, a United States Army unit in Baquba found 450 people, including a few women and children, living in hot, fetid cells built for 150. The Iraqis seemed to have little idea where the detainees had come from and had no means to adjudicate their cases. Lt. Col. Robert Risberg, an officer in the unit, said they discovered that roughly a third of the prisoners had originally been captured by the Americans.

"A majority were people lost in this bureaucratic mess, and it took a while to straighten it out," he said.

The development of the American detainee operation in Iraq runs contrary to the Pentagon's practice of avoiding the role of jailer in a foreign country and instead, working to speedily transfer prisoners of war to allies. Maj. James F. Gebhardt, a retired Army historian, said this doctrine stemmed from the Korean War when murderous gangs and infiltrators ravaged the American detention camps.

But in Iraq, where detainees were seen as potential sources of intelligence on the insurgency, the military built its own detention facilities and then put a team in charge that had little experience handling long-term detainees. After the Abu Ghraib scandal in 2004, a new detention unit — Task Force 134 — was formed, but it started with a staff of just five to manage facilities holding 5,000 detainees. By the following summer the number had doubled to 10,000.

With the closing of Abu Ghraib in August, the Americans are holding its detainees mainly in two prisons that at times have been filled beyond capacity: Camp Bucca, a sprawling complex in southern Iraqi, and Camp Cropper near the Baghdad airport.

Military commanders have come under political as well as legal pressure to keep detainees moving through the system. Iraqi officials have persuaded the Americans to release detainees, saying the long detentions are contributing to unrest and violence.

The military conducts reviews in the camps to screen detainees for release. Many have been swept up at the scene of bombings or other violence, and the detention camp boards have recommended releasing as many as 60 percent of the detainees whose cases they reviewed.

Officials have sought to tighten the evidentiary standards used in deciding whether to detain suspects. Last year, for example, Maj. Gen. William H. Brandenburg, then the task force commander, became concerned about a swipe test that soldiers used on suspects to detect gunpowder. The test was so unreliable that cigarette lighter residue and even a common hand lotion would register as gunpowder.

Military officials have another reason to thin their camps. The longer people remain in detention, the more likely they are to be hardened by the experience, officials say.

"We know that inside the compounds, individuals are trying to recruit and promote a fundamentalist network, and we are trying to mitigate that by fighting a small counterinsurgency," General Gardner said. In an effort to thwart recruitment, detainees are grouped by level of ideology and are given moderate Arab newspapers.

But releasing detainees carries its own risk. Officials estimate that 6 percent of released detainees, or about 2,800, have been recaptured, some in battles with American troops. Soldiers in Mosul were outraged last year to discover that their commander, Lt. Col. Erik Kurilla, had been shot by a man who was set free by the Iraqi court two weeks earlier.

In September, soldiers captured a man suspected of fighting with Al Qaeda in a raid in western Iraq only to find that he was first caught in September 2005 and released in June in the Iraqi government's unity and reconciliation program, according to military records and interviews.

The release of detainees is such a concern for Americans that the military has put the onus on soldiers to act like police officers and collect evidence. An instructional guide warns that without "sufficient evidence for prosecution, the detainee will be released" and "may attempt to attack soldiers again."

The guide instructs soldiers to take witness statements, document tests for explosives and record serial numbers of contraband weapons. It also tells soldiers how to use photographic evidence to its best effect.

When suspects are caught away from or fleeing a crime scene, like a bomb or a weapons cache, the guide tells soldiers to take pictures of the suspects at the scene. For example, the guide lays out this chain of events: "Your squad conducts a raid on a house, in the house you find 2 adult males. 50 meters from the house you find a large weapons cache buried 2 feet underground."

Among the instructions: "Take pictures of the individuals with the cache."

A Case Falls Apart

On May 12, 2005, a car bomb exploded near a market in southern Baghdad, killing at least 17 people, and the Wolf Brigade flexed its might.

The brigade, an Iraqi commando unit, stormed a neighborhood in eastern Baghdad and arrested four men. By the next day, Iraqis could see results for themselves.

The four men appeared on "Terrorism in the Grip of Justice," a prime-time television show broadcast by Iraqiya, which featured commando interrogations. They confessed on the air.

DOJ_NMG_0107216

But one year later, the four men, who were held in Iraqi detention and faced death by hanging, walked out of the central court, with all charges dismissed.

Their story, pieced together through interviews and court records, is one of a narrow escape from Iraq's fractured system of justice. It is also the story of an unlikely civil rights lawyer who beat the system for the four men and a handful of others.

Faraj Mahmoud, 42, a grocer, was not totally shocked when he and his two brothers were arrested that night, with a friend.

Their families had emigrated from Palestine after the 1948 war, and like other Sunni refugees had been favored by Mr. Hussein over Iraq's own Shiite peoples.

The Wolf Brigade, an Interior Ministry unit made up mostly of poor, young Shiites from Sadr City, had developed a reputation for singling out Palestinians and using torture to extract confessions. The unit's commander, Abu Walid, who questioned the men on the show, has denied the charges.

In recent interviews, the four men, who have fled Iraq, said they had been tortured in a variety of ways. " 'We will beat you until your meat is cooked,' " one of the men, Amer Mahmoud, 27, an auto mechanic, said an interrogator had told him.

Faraj Mahmoud, who had married six days before he was captured, said he was stripped and hanged from the ceiling. An electric prod applied to his genitals made his body bounce off the walls, he said. Hania Mufti, a Human Rights Watch official with extensive knowledge of Iraq's jails, said other prisoners had described similar abuses.

The men said their captors also threatened to fetch their families, and they saw naked women and girls being walked through the jail. That is when they all signed confessions.

Among those watching the television show the night the men confessed was Abdul Razzaq, a 31-year-old Iraqi lawyer, and he agreed to take the case without a fee.

Mr. Razzaq handled mostly divorces before the war. After the invasion he began representing mostly criminal defendants. It took him two and a half months to find the four men in the Iraqi detention system. A jailer demanded $50 to lead him to their cell, he said. It smelled so bad that the jailer wore a mask. "All four of us started to cry," Amer Mahmoud said. "The lawyer started to cry. We didn't want to let him go."

Mr. Razzaq picked apart the case. For starters, one of the Mahmoud brothers had confessed to hiding 600 pounds of TNT beneath the backseat of a car, an Opel, that has no space for such a load.

The lawyer found 14 witnesses who he said could provide alibis for the men. He got statements from the police saying that a string of other attacks to which the men confessed had never taken place.

He also went after the man who had directed the Wolf Brigade to his clients. The court eventually agreed that the man, who had confessed as well, was mentally incompetent.

Along the way, Mr. Razzaq said, the Central Criminal Court was typically frustrating. Clerks asked for money to hasten the preparation of judicial orders, a practice that other lawyers have also alleged. The judge who held the preliminary hearing grew impatient, ordering the four men returned to jail for more questioning, he said.

The trial was still months away when Mr. Razzaq received a note, signed by the families of victims of the car bombing: "This is the last notification to you, for you will be a victim and a cheap sacrifice goat for terrorists. Do not defend those atheistic Palestinian criminals and their followers (the worshipers of the atheist, Saddam), or else your destiny shall be death for sure."

On May 21, 2006, a three-judge panel ordered the release of all four men and their accuser. Citing their confessions at the hands of the Wolf Brigade, the judges wrote, "If it is assumed that the initial confession was correct, it was not supported by any convincing evidence."

Faraj Mahmoud said: "We couldn't believe our feet were touching the ground. It seemed like there were a thousand people at home, singing. No one expected us to get released."

Two days later, the men and their families fled Iraq. Mr. Razzaq then won an acquittal for a Syrian truck driver detained for not having a passport. But the man was kidnapped as he emerged from the prison with three other freed prisoners and was never seen again, Mr. Razzaq said.

He blames himself. "If I had not gotten him out of prison, he would still be there, alive," he said. Discouraged about practicing law in Iraq, Mr. Razzaq fled the country in October.

The Military Under Pressure

Many of the cases the American military has brought to the Iraqi central court involve multiple defendants. And the evidence connecting them to a specific attack or other crime often varies widely. As a result, despite many victories for the military in court, about half of the 3,000 American-held detainees who have gone to trial have walked free.

There is much finger-pointing about why prosecutions fail.

"We're in a wartime situation where judges unfortunately have to be concerned with their livelihood and their lives," said Judge John J. Carroll III, a federal judge from North Carolina, who was a military lawyer in Baghdad this year. "We've had cases where the detainees should have been convicted and weren't because of political pressure, from the government and even from terrorist groups, indirectly."

Qasim Hassan al-Aboudi, the manager of legal and media affairs for the Higher Judicial Council in Iraq, blames the Americans for bringing cases without the kind of evidence that Iraqi law requires.

"Your troops make many mistakes," he said. "Sometimes they destroy the weapons without documenting them, and they put detainees in for a long time so that other detainees can coach them on what to say in court. We can see that criminals get away, but it's not the judicial system's fault. It's the fault of the mistakes in gathering evidence. We have to respect the law."

The military is starting to bolster its cases with forensic evidence, including fingerprints and bullet-shard analysis, as well as a video conferencing system that allows soldiers who have returned to the United States to testify in the Iraqi court.

Officials overseeing detention operations said they recognized the importance of defense lawyers, and in an effort to help detainees with their cases they are creating legal assistance centers at detention camps.

The gravity of the cases is increasing as the central court imposes more death penalties. Ten of the 14 American-held detainees sentenced to hang have been convicted since September, and all 14 are awaiting transfer to Iraqi executioners pending an automatic review by Iraq's court of appeals. Mr. Hussein, who has been sentence to die, was convicted in a special tribunal.

The military declined to identify the men facing death but said they included a man from Saudi Arabia who admitted traveling to Iraq to fight, a Tunisian who participated in dozens of attacks on American troops and three members of a kidnapping ring.

Also awaiting death is Mohammad Munaf, a 54-year-old man born in Iraq who became an American citizen in 2000. He was convicted on Oct. 12 of helping to arrange the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists, who were released unharmed.

Given the state of the justice system in Iraq, however, using the death penalty concerns even one of the American prosecutors who helped bring cases against detainees.

"There are a lot of bad guys out there trying to kill U.S. troops and I want nothing more than to stop those guys," said Mr. Waller, the Colorado deputy district attorney and Air Force Reserve major. But he said the Iraqi court system needed safeguards to prevent innocent defendants from being sent to the gallows.

"If I had the right guy and I had the right case I think I'd be O.K. with that," Mr. Waller said. But, today in Iraq, he said, "I don't think that situation would present itself."

Gunmen Stage Mass Kidnapping In Baghdad (AP)

AP, December 17, 2006

Gunmen in Iraqi army uniforms staged a mass kidnapping on Sunday at the office of the Iraqi Red Crescent in downtown Baghdad, police said.

An official of the Iraqi aid group said the assailants abducted 20 to 30 employees and visitors, but left women behind. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of security concerns.

Police, however, said they did not know how many people were kidnapped at the office in Andalus square. They said the gunmen arrived at the office in five pickup trucks.

The Red Crescent, which is part of the international Red Cross movement, has about 1,000 staff and some 200,000 volunteers in Iraq. It works closely with the International Committee of the Red Cross, which visits detainees and tries to provide food, water and medicine to Iraqis.

Several mass kidnappings have been carried out in the Iraqi capital in recent months, possibly by armed groups on either side of the sectarian conflict between Sunnis and Shiites.

On Thursday, gunmen in military uniforms kidnapped people from a commercial area in central Baghdad, police said. The attackers drove up in about 10 sport utility vehicles and began rounding up shop owners and bystanders. Police said 50 to 70 people were abducted, but at least two dozen were later released.

Last month, gunmen in Interior Ministry commando uniforms abducted scores of men from a Higher Education Ministry office building. The Education Ministry is predominantly Sunni Arab. About half of the victims were released.

Reserves, National Guard Feel The Strain (BOS/MCT)

By Dave Montgomery, Mcclatchy Newspapers

The Boston Globe/McClatchy, December 17, 2006

A half-million called up since the 9/11 attacks

DOJ_NMG_0107218

WASHINGTON -- The nation's National Guard and Reserve forces are displaying signs of strain after five years of deployments in what has become the biggest active-duty mobilization since the Korean War.

More than 500,000 Guard and Reserve troops have served in active duty since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and they've made up nearly half of the force fighting against terrorists and in combat missions in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Military leaders, pointing to an upswing in recruiting and retention, describe the nation's reserve force as the most professional and combat-seasoned in history, bonded by a keen sense of patriotism.

But at the same time, many Guard units are struggling with chronic equipment shortages and funding problems that threaten their ability to respond to disasters and other emergencies in their home states. Thousands of reservists are serving in patchwork units cobbled together in piecemeal fashion from other units, often with little or no sense of cohesion.

"I think you're seeing the leading-edge indicators of strain and fraying the edges," said Arnold L. Punaro, a retired Marine Corps general who chairs a commission looking into a possible overhaul of the Guard and Reserve. "And, yes, they are doing a good job of recruiting and retention, but at what cost and how long can they sustain it?"

The widening concerns over the reserve component come at a time when US military leaders are pressing for even more reinforcements from the Guard and Reserves to help ease the pressure on active-duty forces.

General Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's top general, warned Punaro's commission on Thursday that the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq "will break" the active-duty force unless the Pentagon changes its mobilization policy to allow more involuntary call-ups from the Guard and Reserve. Schoomaker also wants to add thousands of active-duty forces.

Lieutenant General David Poythress, the state adjutant general for the Georgia National Guard, said he agreed with Schoomaker that there need to be changes in the Army's structure, since it's configured to fight high-intensity, short-duration wars, not the grinding guerrilla conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. But he expressed concern that the National Guard may be carrying too much of the load.

"You need readily available manpower on both the active and the reserve side," Poythress said. "There is a danger of breaking the Army, but there is an equivalent danger of breaking the Guard. Guardsmen don't sign up to be full-time soldiers. If that's what they wanted, they'd join the active Army."

Reserve advocates are noticing indications that some 30-something junior officers and noncommissioned officers are thinking about pulling the plug on their reserve status to keep from falling behind on the civilian career ladder.

"They're at a point in their civilian career where they're making their mark," said Lieutenant General Charles G. Rodriguez of Austin, adjutant general for the Texas National Guard. "Now is the time for them to punch their tickets and do all the hard things in their civilian jobs. If they're not there, they can't punch those tickets."

Of the 88,500 currently mobilized, California has the largest contingent (4,559), followed by Texas (3,935), Pennsylvania (3,578), and Minnesota (3,079).

The Army National Guard and Army Reserve represent the biggest share of deployments, but all of the other services also have sent thousands of their reservists into active-duty service. More than 4,000 personnel have been deployed from Naval Air Station Fort Worth, the nation's largest joint reserve base, which serves as home to some 20 major units attached to the Air Force, Army, Marines, and Texas Air National Guard.

Lieutenant General Jack C. Stultz, commander of the Army Reserve who's also a 25-year employee of Procter and Gamble in Orlando, Fla., said the men and women in today's Reserve and Guard are vastly different from the Reserve unit he joined in 1979. Back then, he said, the unit commander opened the annual two-week active tour by asking who'd buy the beer for the end-of-tour party.

"These kids are the next Greatest Generation," Stultz said, referring to a name commonly given to America's World War II generation. "We've got a different caliber of soldier than we did in 1979."

Thousands joined up in the patriotic surge after the terrorist attacks. Members of the Guard have been deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan and also have served in antiterrorism missions in Africa and peacekeeping forces in Bosnia and Kosovo.

How To Talk To Enemies (LAT)

By Joseph McMillan

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

CAN WE negotiate productively with our enemies in the midst of a war? It's not something most Americans find appealing, scarred as we are by the memory of protracted and ultimately unsatisfactory peace talks during the Korean and Vietnam wars.

But it's what the Iraq Study Group, chaired by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, says we need to do to extract ourselves from the mess in Iraq.

Not only do they want us to launch a "new diplomatic offensive" that would include Iran and Syria — two countries with which our relations have long verged on active hostility — they are calling for us "to engage all parties in Iraq," even militia chiefs like Muqtada Sadr and leading figures in the Sunni insurgency.

To some degree, American skepticism about talking to the enemy is justified. Under the best of circumstances, it is a risky business, as 2,500 years or more of diplomatic history bear out. The wartime diplomacy that Baker and Hamilton call for promises to be especially tricky, given the number of parties involved and the nature of their involvement in the conflict. Nevertheless, history demonstrates that talking while fighting, when conducted by statesmen who understand the distinction between wartime and peacetime diplomacy, can make a big difference in the outcome of a war. As we move forward, however, it is important to remember a few things:

• Fighting and talking are two sides of the same coin. Wartime diplomacy is most effective when actions on the battlefield are directed toward shaping the adversary's willingness to come to terms. Ideally, the enemy must believe that any delay on his part in reaching an agreement will lead to a worse outcome.

One reason the Korean armistice negotiations dragged on in the early 1950s was that the American negotiators representing the United Nations Command agreed at the outset of the talks that the final cease-fire line would follow the existing line of contact between the forces. North Korea was told, in effect, that there would be no real price for its refusal to come to terms.

As we enter the complicated array of negotiations with Iraq's neighbors and warring factions, we must find a way to convince each of our adversaries that the price of recalcitrance will be a certain and painful loss — not a military loss but a serious political loss — for itself or its proxies.

Unfortunately, the Iraq Study Group report fails to offer any ideas for using our considerable military presence in Iraq to achieve such leverage. On the contrary, the recommendation to set in motion the inexorable withdrawal of U.S. combat forces yields a situation in which military pressure is relinquished with respect to our adversaries and exercised only against our ally, the government of Iraq!

• Keep expectations realistic. The diplomat cannot expect to gain at the conference table what his armed forces cannot plausibly gain in the field. Moreover, he must understand that although he has no control over them, military operations will inevitably affect the course of his negotiations.

In August 1814, when American and British diplomats convened in Ghent, Belgium, to negotiate an end to the War of 1812, the British side opened the talks by laying out a series of extravagant demands. One would have required the United States to give up most of what we know as the Midwest to create an independent state under Indian tribal sovereignty as a buffer between the U.S. and British-held Canada. Another called for the U.S. to cede a slice of northern Maine to provide a more direct transit corridor between Quebec and Halifax.

The British maintained these positions even after a series of U.S. victories in mid-September made it clear that they had no decisive military advantage to leverage. It took a frank assessment from the Duke of Wellington — "I confess that I think you have no right, from the state of the war, to demand any concession of territory from America" — to induce the British diplomats to lower their sights. Like Wellington, Baker and Hamilton make a compelling case for lowering our sights. What they don't provide is a military strategy that would preclude having to lower them even further in the future.

• Understand the role of passion. In his 1716 essay, "On the Manner of Negotiating with Princes," the French diplomat Francois de Callieres identified a "phlegmatic temper" as one of a diplomat's most desirable personal attributes. But in wartime, the parties that are engaged in combat are unlikely to bargain coolly and rationally, no matter the negotiator's personality. They will inevitably be affected by the sentiment, memorably expressed by Abraham Lincoln in 1863, that "these dead shall not have died in vain."

Even worse, the diplomat may find his own words or his armed forces' actions unexpectedly stiffening rather than weakening the adversary's resolve. Just as the London Blitz of 1940-41 made the British less, rather than more, likely to accept a negotiated peace with Adolf Hitler, the burning of Washington in August 1814 reinforced American resolve not to accept a humiliating peace with Britain.

In the case of Iraq, some of the parties we have to deal with — particularly the external ones — are not yet as inflamed by passion as the Sunni and Shiite populations within Iraq. But we have learned to our detriment how easily public anger can be roused to fever pitch in the Middle East. Part of the close interagency coordination called for in the Baker-Hamilton study must be aimed at keeping passions from becoming even more heated than they already are.

• Patience, patience. Above all, Callieres told his masters, the successful diplomat requires "a patience which no trial can break down." In a wartime situation, however, it is not the patience of the negotiator himself that is the key, but that of his government and people. Obviously the side that is more eager for peace is at a distinct disadvantage in the bargaining process, as the British government — under pressure from merchants weary of shipping losses and landowners weary of wartime property taxes — found in 1814.

As those in the region evaluate American opinion polls, election results and the Baker-Hamilton report, they are likely to conclude that we, like the British in 1814, are tired of a war in which military victory seems unattainable and in which any possible political benefits may not be worth the cost.

If our adversaries perceive that the primary aim of U.S. policy is the fastest possible extrication of U.S. troops from Iraq, then, just as happened in Vietnam, it will become impossible for American diplomats to achieve anything more than that.

The Baker-Hamilton study rightly points out that "time is running out" to fix Washington's strategy toward Iraq, and it offers a useful if incomplete manual for carrying out the necessary repairs. If we are not willing to give a new strategy time to work, however, it won't matter how well it is designed.

No Talks With Iran And Syria (LAT)

By David B. Rivkin Jr., Lee A. Casey

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

SHOULD THE United States negotiate directly with Syria and Iran over the future of Iraq? These countries are sworn enemies of the U.S., governed by relentlessly repressive governments.

Yet the Iraq Study Group argued that the U.S. has often negotiated with unsavory regimes, including the Soviet government during the Cold War, and that skillful American diplomacy can steer discussions away from matters on which the U.S. absolutely will not compromise — such as Iran's nuclear weapons program — and toward Iraq, where we might be able to work together. According to this argument, even if negotiations with Damascus and Tehran fail, there is nothing to be lost by talking.

Unfortunately, this argument is fallacious. In fact, there is a great deal to lose.

Winston Churchill's aphorism that "to jaw-jaw is always better than to war-war" has been cited often, but it was not representative of his policy while in office. In fact, despite pressure from his Cabinet, Churchill refused in 1940 to negotiate with Italy's Benito Mussolini, fearing Britain's will to prosecute a tough war against Germany would be undermined by hopes of a separate peace with one of Adolf Hitler's allies.

Indeed, history is replete with examples of well-intentioned negotiations gone wrong — ill-judged at the outset or so badly managed in practice that they inflamed rather than calmed tensions. The most famous is the tragic spectacle of British and French appeasement of Hitler during the 1930s, but U.S. Cold War diplomacy is also rich with instances of talks that backfired.

During the September 1959 U.S.-Soviet summit, for example, President Eisenhower fed Nikita Khrushchev's vanity, calling him a great leader and hosting the Soviet delegation at Camp David. Eisenhower also agreed to hold another summit in 1960 to be largely devoted to Germany, which was a major Cold War flashpoint and a key Soviet diplomatic priority.

From this, Moscow concluded that Washington was overawed by the growing Soviet military power and that it could be persuaded to abandon Berlin. To encourage this, Khrushchev intensified his efforts, through the use of boastful rhetoric and doctored intelligence, to deceive the U.S. into believing that Soviet nuclear forces were much larger than American forces — the famous "missile bluff." Eisenhower's diplomacy raised hopes to unrealistic levels, tensions actually increased and NATO's cohesion was weakened.

The June 1961 Kennedy-Khrushchev summit in Vienna was equally unhelpful, convincing the Soviet leader that the young new president was weak. As a result, Moscow increased pressure on Berlin and, in 1962, took an enormous strategic gamble by surreptitiously installing missiles in Cuba. Khrushchev's miscalculation, rooted in his misreading of American diplomacy, brought the world closer to nuclear war than it has been before or since.

Of course, there are times when talking to an enemy makes good sense. When he was secretary of State, Iraq Study Group Co-Chairman James A. Baker III himself ably conducted a successful dialogue with Mikhail Gorbachev as the Soviet Union dissolved in the early 1990s.

But negotiations are unpredictable, and timing is all-important; they should never be commenced without realistic, identifiable goals and a clear idea of what compromises are acceptable. Any notion that the U.S. could open talks with Syria or Iran without being prepared to give something (in return for something) is wrongheaded and dishonest. The very act of negotiating (at least of negotiating in good faith) implies a willingness to strike a deal, to accept a quid pro quo.

DOJ_NMG_0107221

The questions, therefore, for Baker and others who support immediate, unconditional, direct talks with Syrian President Bashar Assad and the Iranian mullahs are what exactly does the U.S. hope to gain from their assistance in Iraq, and what would it be prepared to give in return? Those questions have not been answered, and it is unlikely that they will be anytime soon.

At the same time, the costs of talking to Damascus and Tehran are clear. For example, the U.S. and France have diligently worked to isolate Syria, primarily because of its suspected involvement in the assassination of senior Lebanese officials. Engaging Damascus diplomatically would instantly relegitimize the Assad regime.

Similarly, the U.S. has spent years building a coalition within the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran over its nuclear weapons program, insisting that Iran must suspend uranium enrichment activities as a precondition for any serious diplomatic dialogue. Abandoning this posture precipitously, and opening an unconditional dialogue, would be humiliating and would irrevocably undermine all of this diplomatic spade work.

Ironically, the Iraq Study Group, for all of its emphasis on diplomacy, vastly underestimates the forces that diplomatic discourse can unleash. Diplomacy is a serious exercise, capable of producing either good or bad consequences.

Jaw-jaw matters a great deal, especially when conducted by a great power like the U.S. This explains why most rogue regimes are eager to dance a diplomatic minuet with the U.S., whether they acknowledge it or not. They grasp that once the U.S. begins to talk to them, it implicitly legitimizes at least some of their positions and impedes the building of regional and global coalitions against them.

Other than an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, it is difficult to conceive a course of action more perilous to our interests in the Middle East than seeking the Baker-style assistance of Iran and Syria.

This does not mean that the United States should not talk to reprehensible regimes, or to its enemies, when such talks are in the national interest — as they sometimes are. Although the Bush administration has often declared that, as a matter of principle, it would eschew negotiations with the world's rogues and despots, its bark has been far worse than its bite. Indeed, its attempts to use multilateral diplomacy to persuade Iran and North Korea to curb their nuclear ambitions reflect traditional realpolitik considerations. This approach has merit because its multilateral framework limits the ability of Iran and North Korea to split the U.S. from the rest of the world, and because concrete concessions are being sought upfront from both of these countries.

What does not make sense is to open a dialogue with two of Washington's bitterest enemies without a clear notion of whether their help in Iraq would be worth the price in the long run.

U.S. Military Rehearses Terror Hearings (AP)

By Michael Melia, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 17, 2006

The U.S. military is rehearsing for hearings on whether 14 top terror suspects can be held indefinitely without charge as enemy combatants, but defense lawyers say the outcome is preordained.

Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and the 13 others will be the highest-profile detainees to undergo the so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, and the first to do so in two years. The proceedings, expected early next year, are open to the media.

At the hearings, a military panel will evaluate whether the men should be classified as "enemy combatants," a designation which allows them to be held indefinitely and prevents them from challenging their detention in the U.S. court system.

"The biggest thing we're doing is opening up the books, reviewing procedures and conducting rehearsals so that we do it correctly," Navy Capt. Philip Waddingham told reporters who recently visited Guantanamo. He is the lead officer at Guantanamo for the Pentagon-based office in charge of determining detainees' status.

It is unclear whether Mohammed and the others — who until recently were being held in secret CIA prisons — will agree to attend the hearings. If they do, the military says they will remain shackled and would be forbidden to talk to reporters.

The rehearsals are being conducted inside the same space reserved for the hearings — a small room inside a trailer equipped with a few leather chairs, one plastic seat for the detainee, and little else.

Combatant Status Review Tribunals were held for 558 detainees between July 2004 and January 2005. All but 38 were deemed enemy combatants.

Defense attorneys have condemned the hearings as shams because classified evidence is withheld from the detainees and they are not afforded defense lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0107222

"There is no question that these 14 have no chance," said Brent Mickum, an attorney who represents two Britons at Guantanamo. "The decision has (already) been made that they are enemy combatants."

At the hearings, a panel of three officers will evaluate whether detainees merit the designation. A military "personal representative" will help prisoners prepare for the proceedings.

Bush announced on Sept. 6 that the 14 detainees had been transferred to Guantanamo.

Mohammed, who was believed to be the No. 3 al-Qaida leader, has not been seen in public since he was captured in Pakistan in 2003. The others include the alleged architects of the USS Cole bombing in Yemen in 2000 and the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The 14 are in a maximum-security section of the prison, which sprawls over a cactus-studded patch of arid ground overlooking the Caribbean. Officials say they are treated like other detainees, and can receive reading materials and have access to mail censored by the military.

Waddingham said in September that he expected the hearings for the 14 new detainees to be held within three months. That timeframe has been pushed back to early 2007 as top officials at the Pentagon, the Justice Department and the military Joint Task Force in charge of the prison camps coordinate the proceedings, he said.

About 380 men have been transferred from Guantanamo to other countries since the detention center opened in January 2002. About 395 detainees remain, most of them held for nearly five years without charge on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

U.S. authorities repatriated a 28-year-old Bangladeshi man on Sunday after years of imprisonment in Guantanamo, a police official at the airport in Bangladesh's capital Dhaka said. The official, Tahera Banu, said the man was being interrogated.

Open-Source Spying

The allure of a "spy system . . . that can quickly assemble disparate pieces that are already lying around" is so very American and so very wrong (Clive Thompson, Dec. 3). America has always been conflicted over the role of classic espionage. Thus, the idea of discerning high-value intelligence from behind a desk in Washington (by harvesting open sources of information and sharing this data via wiki or blog technology) has real appeal. In fact, it is no substitute for human and technical penetrations of our enemies. Sept. 11 was not simply the result of a failure to share intelligence or employ the latest data-analysis tool. It was the result of not having sufficient intelligence penetrations of Al Qaeda. A well-placed source is more efficient, more reliable and more useful than a million disparate pieces of information.

When a technician discovered child pornography on the company president's computer, the Ethicist advised "silence" (Dec. 3). This advice was reckless and naïve.

Each image of child pornography is a crime scene, and its possession is a felony in 42 states and under federal law. Furthermore, reproducing such images again victimizes the innocent child. The Ethicist flippantly advises silence because speaking up would be "too ineffectual in protecting children." But real children have been rescued by the discovery of images. Without the images, we cannot find and rescue victims or punish the predators. The Ethicist demonstrates a disappointing lack of understanding of how law enforcement works.

This is unacceptable, and I urge all Americans to reject this poor advice. A child's life could hang in the balance all because a self-described "ethicist" muses over vague excuses rather than advising immediate action.

I disagree with the Ethicist's conclusion that the employee's "best recourse" is silence. Without revealing particulars, he might first check with corporate counsel, risk management or human resources about the company's policy on company-owned computers. Many companies have a policy that clearly states that all material, including e-mail, generated or stored on a company-owned computer, is company property, and that employees have no right or expectation of privacy with respect to such materials. Further, the company may have expectations that its Internet technicians report known or suspected illegal use of its equipment.

If his company has such a policy, he might then advise corporate counsel that he saw what looked like illegal materials on an (unnamed) person's computer and ask what he should do. If counsel chooses to investigate, it should do so within the context of the company's policies. Even if no action or investigation is taken once the party is known (e.g., the president is the owner of the company), it is counsel's responsibility to advise the president to clear out the material and cease any further activity at the risk of imperiling his company. Federal authorities can and do investigate people who visit or download materials from such Web sites.

An internal investigation does not necessarily mean that his job, reputation or company is imperiled, though certainly at most companies any person other than the owner would have his job at risk for misuse of company property.

While I don't disagree with the Ethicist's opinion on the technician's personal moral obligations, my personal values would make it impossible for me to stomach working for this president, and I would probably report him.

Eyal Press's essay (Dec. 3) on the lower crime rates in immigrant communities was thought-provoking. As to why immigrants commit less violent crime, common sense suggests they came here, whether legally or illegally, to work, and they're too busy doing that — and are too well rewarded by economic opportunities they find here that don't exist in their former countries. Illegal immigrants may be deterred from criminality by the relatively high penalty of deportation for even minor crimes, even when they're innocent of any crime beyond entering the country. The data for minor crimes may be biased by underreporting of victimization suffered by illegal immigrants who, with good cause, fear deportation.

What It Takes To Make a Student

Paul Tough's article (Nov. 26) on closing the race and class gaps in school performance usefully looked beyond what schools do to what parents do and to the enormous gaps in parent-child communication among middle-class and poorer families, in vocabulary, in the ratio of encouragement to discouragement and in promoting questioning and critical discussion, rather than simple obedience to orders.

But what lies behind this "parenting gap"? Might the poor and less-skilled working-class parents be replicating with their children what they experience on the job — limited opportunities to develop a wide range of skills, demands for simple obedience rather than discussion of what to do next, an authoritarian environment of bosses and managers full of "negative communications" and the frustrations of low pay, low recognition for their work and pervasive powerlessness?

Longer school hours, intensive tutoring and more quality pre-schooling may reduce the school-performance gap between the economic classes, but they cannot eliminate it. Schools are asked to overcome the effects of a system of stratification in which some people do the thinking and give the orders while other people are expected to simply obey orders and perform repetitive tasks out of fear of losing their jobs, while raising families on very low incomes. Schooling by itself cannot destratify a class society; class structure keeps reproducing itself. It needs to be attacked head on.

My thanks to Paul Tough for a thorough analysis of No Child Left Behind as it applies to minority students. He did not mention, however, one of the most pernicious aspects of the legislation as it affects most of our classrooms: it treats all schools as if they were the same.

This failure to distinguish among different schools with their very different student populations and, therefore, different needs, makes solving the problems of low-performing schools impossible and, as I have been experiencing for the past five years, injects unnecessary and often counterproductive requirements into schools that had been performing well. As a result, our worst schools only seem better and our best schools are in danger of slipping into mediocrity (simpler textbooks that all students can read; simpler classes that all students can pass).

The statistics cited at the beginning of Tough's article indicate that we are reducing the performance gap as much by causing high-performing schools to do worse as by helping low-performing schools to do better.

Your article omits mention of an enormous factor in children's lives today: the influence of a frenetic, often-violent and fiercely anti-intellectual popular culture.

While it is true that middle-class children may wallow in this morass of video games and rap videos as well, less-privileged youngsters do not have the advantage of parents who can offer an alternative behavioral universe. This was a very encouraging article about people actually doing something to address a longstanding national problem. Instead of profiting from sales of polemical books and television appearances, organizations like Kipp are on the ground making a real difference. I am concerned, however, about Kipp's desire not to attract too many well-prepared students. It is these very students that have the most to lose if they remain in inadequate public schools. Surrounded by peers that often view high academic achievement as "acting white," they risk succumbing to the prevailing low standards.

Paul Tough accurately points out that a child's family life is the dominant factor in determining success at school. I've taught for 15 years in a public high school. The first week of every school year, I ask each class for a show of hands to the question "How many of you ate dinner with your family (TV turned off) at least three of the last seven nights?" Overwhelmingly, the lifted hands belong to students who will maintain a high class average, will do well on standardized tests, will speak and write with an advanced vocabulary and will not be a discipline problem.

Drawing parallels between America as Vietnam's "leading trading partner" today and Iraq 30 years from now is wishful thinking (David Rieff, Nov. 26). Iraq is more likely to look to China for trade and business. Just as China is Vietnam's historic rival, America's imperial misadventure in Iraq has made it Iraq's. Harriet Brown's article on anorexia (Nov. 26). From the other side of the planet (far northern Australia), our family has a story achingly similar to Harriet's. We watched in stunned horror as anorexia transformed our bright, beautiful, happy 14-year-old daughter into a starving, terrified, angry and withdrawn child. Like Harriet, we treated our daughter using the Maudsley approach, taking full control of her diet until she was capable of doing it again herself. Despite anorexia's fierce resistance, a regime of good food and healthy weight gain lifted our daughter from the black pit of anorexia, and she has now resumed her normal, happy life.

Having worked with therapists and other health-care professionals to help my elder daughter through her eating disorder, we have returned to them for their advice, care and expertise as our younger daughter battles her own demons in her eating disorder. No parent should try to treat this illness alone. Brown's story does not stress enough the need to involve professionals with expertise in treating teens with eating disorders as essential partners with parents. It's a bewildering and exhausting journey, even with the best of professional care.

• As a psychologist who encounters young girls and women with eating disorders, and their families, on a daily basis, I was troubled by the reference to a "parentectomy" as a descriptor of the more "conventional" approach to the treatment of anorexia.

While not a proponent of Maudsley, I, too, see the family as "the best chance a child has for recovery." However, as acknowledged in many other areas of parenting (and relationships in general), those closest to a person or most invested are often not best able to objectively address that person's problems. It is for precisely this reason that surgeons do not operate on their own children.

Instead, we see food and eating as metaphors for deeper emotional issues, and accordingly, we ask parents to join their adolescent's treatment by committing to parenting and family therapy. In so doing, parents convey an openness to the notion that the marital and larger family dynamics also "weigh in" on the issues with which their children grapple.

Of course, anorexia is a life-threatening disorder, and a child must reach a standard of medical and nutritional stability before she can effectively participate in, and benefit from, psychological treatment.

As a social worker who has worked in the field of treating eating disorders since 1989, I was overwhelmed by the parents' love for their daughter and the lengths they took in order to get her on the road to recovery. This approach of refeeding is a wonderful way to make her feel safe by showing that she is loved and cared for. Too often anorexia is thought of as an illness that stems from issues of control. Children who develop eating disorders do so, in part, because they are feeling unsafe and unable to express feelings of sadness, anger, embarrassment or depression. For many who are unable to articulate or define their feelings, it is easier to say, "I feel fat." And often we see families getting into power struggles around food and weight, rather than helping these children express their feelings.

Part of society's misunderstanding of the illness is the belief that once treatment is given, the demons that Brown described go away. Families are better off knowing that the demons will always be there. Recovery is when the demons no longer control the behavior.

The photographs by Joel-Peter Witkin are described as "an artful homage to this season's all-important accessory: the hat" (Style, Nov. 26). And yet, many of these photos display naked women. Removing women's clothes doesn't draw attention to their hats. Instead, the reader's eye goes to the breasts.

I cried with relief to read that

Harriet Brown's anorexic daughter, Kitty, had eaten some cake on her own. I also appreciated the juxtaposition of Brown's article with Joel-Peter Witkin's wonderful photos of models wearing hats. Some were thin, some were buxom, some were neither, yet all were beautiful and sexy. Let's hope that magazine readers become more accustomed to seeing that attractive women need not conform to one body type.

Kudos to Daphne Merkin for her intelligent essay on

Tom Stoppard (Nov. 26). Her task, made more difficult by an elusive Stoppard, was enriched by her self-reflection and her remarkable insight into Stoppard's endeavors to keep a veil between himself and the probing of an inquisitive public. Her portrait gave us a true picture of this brilliant, very private man.

A well-recognized trait of women is a need to know as much as possible about a man with whom they have a relationship; Merkin's article demonstrates the pique when the male resists. Her article was subverted by recurrent unflattering references to Stoppard's attitudes and various preferences. Furthermore, although she acknowledges that he has been labeled "conservative," she failed to detail not only why but also how his positions have, at times, made him a pariah among the left in London; witness the hue and cry when he made remarks considered inimical to some modern artists and their works several years ago. She might have fixed on one of the major themes of "The Coast of Utopia," which suggests that the concept of collectivism that mesmerized the intellectual European community during the 19th century probably led to a number of the horrors of the 20th century.

I have been searching for a good reason to dislike the Internet, and

Rob Walker's Nov. 26 Consumed column fits the bill. I don't know why I am so shocked by this phenomenon of a group rallying in cyberspace to proclaim contempt for someone or something. Hey, it's a free market of ideas out there. The Internet isn't exactly a crowded theater, and no one is exactly yelling, <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="211057">"Fire!"</object.title>

Except: I recall my colleague, Rabbi A. A Web-smart bar mitzvah kid didn't like her, and he created an "I Hate Rabbi A." Web site. The site was adolescent and mean-spirited. She prevailed on the teenager (and his parents) to remove the site. They refused.

Soon afterward, Rabbi A. applied for another position, and when the search committee Googled her, they found the hateful Web site. It was sufficient to end her candidacy.

The Internet is an unregulated and chaotic jungle that combines usefulness, nonsense, wisdom and sheer bombast. And, sadly, there is nothing that its victims can do about it.

Atlanta Gay Donor or Gay Dead?

John Bowe's article (Nov. 19) increases awareness about the reality of the diversity of family life in America. Ozzie and Harriet are, and always have been, a myth.

While Bowe explores the families of gay fathers and gay donors as somehow "redefining" family, the simple truth is that extended and complex family structures are the norm and are hardly unique to gay- and lesbian-headed families.

As lesbian mothers of twin 4-year-old boys, my partner and I raise our children with the help of a network of loving friends, neighbors, aunts, uncles, grandparents and other family members. We know firsthand how important all of these relationships are to the well-being of our sons. Gay fathers and gay donors could say the same thing about their families.

What I consider a significant cause of stress on lesbian and gay parents did not come up in your article. A high percentage of young gay parents may find themselves left to raise their children while alienated from their families and the communities in which they live. Rejected by their own families, they are often without the reassuring benefit of unconditional parental love, and the relief of practical support.

It amazed me that John Bowe managed to write an article about gay fathers and co-parenting that depicted such a skewed collection of seemingly self-indulgent gay men and controlling lesbians. Now maybe you can do an article on full-time gay fathers, those of us who stay up all night with a sick infant, soothe tears from a child's face, host a gaggle of toddlers at a birthday party and communicate openly with the people with whom they have chosen to parent. My husband and I, along with our co-parent and our 1-year-old daughter, have created a nurturing three-parent, two-household family. As she grows up, our daughter will know the love of a committed full-time father — she's got two of them!

Denver China's African Adventure

As

James Traub's article (Nov. 19) makes clear, the United States should be taking a close look at China's energetic campaign of engagement with Africa, both for what it tells us about Chinese intentions and what it means for our interests.

The visible signs of Chinese engagement in Africa — from new soccer stadiums to better roads — are clear to any traveler to the continent. Unfortunately, in places like Angola, Zimbabwe and Sudan, China has also shown a willingness to support authoritarian or corrupt governments and ignore human rights violations.

China's willingness to do business with some of Africa's most repressive regimes is not only bad for Africa — it is also self-defeating. Corrupt African regimes harbor terrorists, mismanage economies and often generate regional instability that isn't in any nation's interest. As we learned during the cold war, American strategic interests in Africa will be advanced by sticking to our principles and by supporting good governance, democratic institutions and human rights. We should treat China's growing engagement in Africa not as a threat but as a reminder of the strategic significance of a part of the world too often ignored. In the vast and diverse continent of Africa, critically important partners, markets, and leaders — as well as real security threats — are emerging. The United States should ensure that our efforts and investments pay off for the people of Africa and international security.

Gabe Hudson's Lives column (Nov. 19) brought back some mixed memories. In 1955, I completed a similar course at Camp Lejeune. After graduation, I was kept on for a year as a platoon sergeant. The essay's conclusion struck a responsive chord; the guy you hate the most could be the one who saves your life. In 1960, as an infantry platoon leader, I had a C.O. who fit that description. He had received the Navy Cross for heroism at the Chosin Reservoir and drove us relentlessly. Though we all hated him, we also respected him. If our company went to war, he was the guy we wanted to lead us. But I do take issue with another part of Hudson's conclusion. The guys he called Meat and Potatoes stole a rifle from one of their fellow marines, his most important possession. In my day, that kind of action would rank right up there with losing your weapon. They were lucky to only get their butts chewed. Had they been my troops, I would have recommended them for nonjudicial punishment.

If I were now in Iraq and had Meat and Potatoes as my fellow squad members, I would be concerned. What kind of stunt might they hatch to teach another marine a lesson and get somebody killed in the process? Could I depend on them in combat? I think not.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

A Push To Fix The Fix On Wall Street (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

AFTER Enron and then WorldCom foundered amid multibillion-dollar accounting scandals, exposing layers of corporate malfeasance that are still coming to light now, Washington moved belatedly but forcefully to stiffen regulations, toughen enforcement and improve corporate audits.

The goal was to shore up confidence in Wall Street, particularly among individual investors who had been pushed more than ever into the stock and bond markets by the decline of company pension and health-insurance plans, along with soaring college costs. Tales from thousands of investors who lost their life savings were a powerful indictment of lax government oversight.

Is the pendulum swinging back, to less federal oversight and more self regulation?

The question arises because prosecutors and regulators in Washington took steps last week — almost exactly five years after Enron filed for bankruptcy — to roll back some of the tough new measures adopted in that first blush of scandal.

The Justice Department started by saying it would restrict prosecutors in corporate corruption cases. The Securities and Exchange Commission followed a day later by proposing looser auditing standards for thousands of smaller public companies.

The timing was somewhat jarring. Fannie Mae, the nation's largest mortgage finance company, was suing its auditors last week for claiming they were negligent in helping to prepare financial statements that led to a $6.3 billion restatement of earnings, and The Wall Street Journal was uncovering a new scandal involving the improper back-dating of executive stock options.

Some investor groups and outside experts criticized the proposals, saying they open loopholes in the law that unscrupulous companies are likely to exploit, effectively defanging the post-Enron changes. But others said that the adjustments by the Justice Department and the commission did not represent a wholesale retreat.

Indeed, they suggested that the changes announced last week could actually benefit small investors by taking pressure off the new Congress to go much further in rolling back the post-Enron rules, as the United States Chamber of Commerce and other groups advocate. They are seeking to curtail shareholder lawsuits and cap the liability of accounting firms.

"We still are living under the shadow of Enron and WorldCom and that has tempered the business community's attempts at more precipitous action," said Joel Seligman, a securities law expert and authority on the history of the S.E.C. who is also the president of the University of Rochester.

Mr. Seligman and others also said that the commission's action on small companies, an interpretation of Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, was an appropriate trimming of a rule that was being applied to excess. That section requires public companies to assess their internal financial controls, a process that became a lightening rod for criticism because of its costs.

The Sarbanes-Oxley law was approved in 2002 as lawmakers grew concerned that they might be swept out of office by millions of middle- and lower-income investors who owned their share of the marketplace through mutual funds, I.R.A.'s, 401 (k)'s, and 529 college-savings programs.

Since then, as the scandals and trials have receded to the back pages, investors have poured even more money into the markets and a new and deregulatory-minded mood has taken hold in Washington. This Thursday, that movement will be on full display in a federal district court here, where a judge will consider a case that challenges the validity of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, a new agency created by the Sarbanes-Oxley law to oversee auditors.

Some business groups, as well as the treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson, have raised concerns that more companies are listing their stock overseas because of the regulatory climate in the United States.

Last month, a committee of academics and businessmen headed by R. Glenn Hubbard, the former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and now dean of the Columbia Business School, and John L. Thornton, a former president and co-chief operating officer of the Goldman Sachs Group and the current chairman of the Brookings Institution, proposed a series of measures they said would address this problem. The remedies include protecting corporations from criminal and civil cases, imposing new restrictions on shareholder lawsuits, and capping the liability of accounting firms.

AT the core of critics' arguments is the idea that American laws make foreign markets more attractive than domestic ones.

But some experts discount that link and point to other reasons why more companies are seeking out foreign markets. Listing and underwriting fees are significantly lower in many countries, and a number of companies that have recently listed in Europe and elsewhere overseas would never have met the disclosure or financial standards of American markets, even with the latest changes.

"You can reduce American regulations to zero and overseas markets would still be attractive to some companies," said Richard C. Breeden, a former chairman of the S.E.C. "The proportion of offerings in the United States is going down. But India is getting richer and China is getting richer, and these trends reflect that."

Wall Street firms like Goldman Sachs are also posting record earnings, Mr. Breeden added, a sign that American underwriters have not suffered.

Barbara Roper, director of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America, said it was also incorrect to blame shareholder lawsuits for the growing appeal of foreign markets, or to assert that such litigation has been unduly burdensome.

DOJ_NMG_0107229

The number of securities lawsuits has steadily and dramatically declined in recent years, Ms. Roper said, with a 45 percent drop in the first six months of this year. On an annualized basis, she added, the number of cases are at the lowest level in 10 years.

Ms. Roper attributed the trend to better corporate governance and the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. Moreover, only five shareholder lawsuits cited accounting firms in 2005; in the first half of this year, only one.

Other experts said that last week's actions could represent the high water mark for the retrenchment.

"Given the significant amount of change that took place, I'm not surprised that there is this counterrevolution," said Charles M. Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. "What is significant is that there is no attempt here to throw the piano out the window. What we are seeing instead is simply a movement of the furniture around the room. The changes being made are really at the margins and there remains a broad consensus that the bigger changes that were made were reasonable ones."

Justice, SEC Actions Backpedal A Bit On Post-scandal Rules (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, December 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- They were two early Christmas gifts for corporate America -- with potentially far-reaching effects for investors and the financial landscape.

At the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, separate actions last week both had the effect of easing landmark rules laid down in response to the 2002 crisis of corporate malfeasance.

Culminating an intense monthslong lobbying campaign by an array of companies, the five SEC commissioners voted at a public meeting Wednesday to propose a plan giving corporate managers more flexibility in assessing the strength of internal financial controls. It would especially benefit smaller companies.

The sweeping anti-fraud law known as Sarbanes-Oxley was enacted in 2002 amid the wave of scandals that engulfed Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and other big corporations.

The law contains a key section requiring public companies to assess the strength of their internal safeguards to ensure that their financial statements are accurate.

Companies have complained to the SEC that those rules are overly burdensome and costly, especially for smaller businesses.

The Justice Department, meanwhile, restricted its prosecutors' ability to crack down on companies that withhold confidential information during criminal fraud investigations, in new guidelines issued Tuesday that clipped back the aggressive legal tactics authorized after the scandals.

They bar the government from seeking harsher penalties for companies that won't cooperate with prosecutors -- either by denying the prosecutors corporate attorney-client communications or by helping their employees under investigation by covering their legal fees.

"The real issue is how do you get the balance right?" said Joel Seligman, the president of the University of Rochester and an expert on securities law.

The new policy might be closer to striking a balance between the need to prosecute corporate crime and the "unequivocal" right of defendants to litigate, he suggested.

The policy "is going to set the tone," Seligman said.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who wrote the new guidelines, said they won't hinder prosecutors from vigorously pursuing companies accused of fraud and other white-collar crimes.

But critics, including a group representing whistle-blowers, called the changes a setback for shareholders and employees who risk losing billions if scandal-tainted corporations aren't fully prosecuted.

They accused the Justice Department of caving in to pressure from business interests.

The actions by both the Justice Department, which carries out the Bush administration's policies, and the independent regulator SEC might eliminate the need for Congress to act in similar veins.

Some business-friendly Democrats who are assuming power positions in January have expressed support for Sarbanes-Oxley relief for companies -- and their preference for the SEC to wield its regulatory scalpel as opposed to Congress' heavier hand of legislation.

The SEC move was a "reasonable approach" in light of the disproportionate burden of the financial-control rules on small companies, said James Cox, a professor at Duke University who also is a securities-law specialist.

DOJ_NMG_0107230

Still, he said, with more leeway under the SEC plan -- allowing, for example, less stringent testing of internal controls for some companies, "Those (financial) numbers are going to be less trustworthy than they would be otherwise. ... Investor protection's going to suffer."

SEC officials insisted that would not happen. Agency Chairman Christopher Cox called the new plan "making Sarbanes-Oxley work for investors at the right price."

McNulty said the new prosecutorial policy should help companies curb fraud internally by encouraging open talk between corporate attorneys and their clients. "It, in no way, slows down the ability to prosecute these cases successfully," he said.

The actions of both agencies follow a report issued last month by an influential private-sector group, the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, that has been part of the business push for a softening of the laws and rules that flowed from the 2002 scandals. That campaign has gained traction with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson questioning recently whether regulations are hurting the competitiveness of U.S. financial markets by driving some companies away from them.

Among the committee's recommendations: easing of the financial-control rules under Sarbanes-Oxley and tightening the legal standard the government must meet to charge companies with crimes.

The group also urged reducing the liability of auditors in shareholder lawsuits over accounting fraud and a shift to a financial regulatory system based on principles rather than rules.

Closer Look At Corporate Pay (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Investors are getting access to clearer and more detailed information from public companies on their top executives' pay packages and perks under federal rules that took effect on Friday.

Companies' 2006 annual reports issued early next year will reflect the changes, which were ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission in July in a major overhaul of disclosure rules for executive compensation.

The new requirements include disclosure of the dating of stock option grants to executives. Companies must provide detailed information on how they determine when executives receive option grants and, if they do so, how and why they backdate options. Suspect timing of option grants has turned into corporate America's scandal of the year, with more than 100 companies under investigation by the SEC or the Justice Department, more than $5 billion in profit erased by restatements and 18 CEOs swept out of office.

An academic study completed this fall found that corporate executives gained an average of $600,000 a year each from backdating of stock options between 2000 and 2004. By contrast, shareholders were hurt by an average loss in market value of 8 percent, or $500 million, for each affected company from the negative publicity of being under government investigation, the researchers at the University of Michigan found.

When stock options are backdated, they are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price — fattening profit for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices.

Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can run afoul of federal accounting and tax laws.

For the first time, under the new disclosure rules, companies are required to furnish tables in annual filings showing the total yearly compensation for their chief executive officers, chief financial officers and the next three highest-paid executives. Most of the disclosures, in annual reports and other regulatory filings, must be written in plain English.

The rules were designed to enhance corporate accountability and address an issue that has angered company shareholders and the public: lavish compensation for executives, unrelated to their performance, even as companies stumble and lay off employees.

In the SEC's 72-year history, no other issue has stirred as much interest, with more than 20,000 letters filed during the public comment period that followed the proposal being floated last January, according to agency officials.

The SEC removed from its original proposal, though, a requirement for companies to disclose the pay details of as many as three non-executive employees whose individual compensation exceeds that of any of their top five executives.

Federal Finance Probe Still Lives (MACT)

By Travis Fain

The Macon Telegraph, December 17, 2006

Federal investigators served the city of Macon's finance office with two subpoenas in the past three months, seeking massive amounts of information in an ongoing Justice Department inquiry into the city's use of federal grants.

DOJ_NMG_0107231

The subpoenas, released to The Telegraph under the Georgia Open Records Act, commanded the city to turn over financial data as part of a Justice Department investigation into "allegations of misconduct."

The first subpoena, dated Sept. 29, demanded documentation for every purchase card transaction made by the Macon Police Department from June 2002 through July 2004. The other, dated Dec. 4, sought documentation for 63 separate journal entries in city financial records.

Federal investigators, by law, cannot comment on an ongoing investigation or even confirm its existence, U.S. Attorney Max Wood said. But several city sources, including Macon Finance Director Adah Roberts and Mayor Jack Ellis, said the subpoenas appear to target the city's so-called faith-based program.

That program, a federally funded initiative run by the Macon Police Department in 2002 and 2003, is officially called the Safe Schools Initiative. That program, which split a $1 million grant between the city and various church youth programs, was one of several city initiatives that a Bibb County grand jury investigation targeted before District Attorney Howard Simms handed the inquiry over to the U.S. Attorney's Office in July 2005.

The subpoenas show that inquiry continues, though few details have leaked out.

City Councilwoman Elaine Lucas said the public is ready for answers and an end to the investigation.

"I think anything that's at the federal level is serious," she said. "And I would hope that with this kind of in-depth investigation that we would finally know the truth ... good or bad."

Since the investigation was turned over to federal officials, several area preachers and former city employees told The Telegraph they have been contacted by an investigator asking questions about the Safe Schools Initiative.

Police Chief Mike Burns said the police department received its own subpoena from the Justice Department in August. That subpoena called for "documentation on all federal grants for the police department from fiscal years 2002 through 2004," Burns wrote in an e-mail to The Telegraph.

Ellis on Friday directed questions about the most recent subpoenas to former Police Chief Rodney Monroe, who headed the department during the Safe Schools Initiative. Monroe left in early 2005 to become chief of the Richmond, Va., police department. He has not returned phone calls seeking comment about the initiative in the past and did not respond to a phone message or an e-mail Friday.

Said Ellis: "I have all the faith and trust in Chief Monroe that this grant was executed in a proper manner. ... Whatever information (investigators) have asked for, as far as I know, has been provided."

The September subpoena took several weeks for the city to fill. In late October, numerous boxes of information were carried by firefighters from City Hall to the Bibb County District Attorney's Office, where assistant district attorney Sharrell Lewis works. Lewis has been assigned to the U.S. Attorney's Office to help with the case.

"It was 40-something (boxes) as I recall," Simms said. "It filled up half the hallway."

Simms said his office called the U.S. Attorney's Office and the boxes were picked up, but he's not sure where they were taken. The U.S. attorney has an office in Macon, but the subpoenas state that the documents were bound for the Office of the Inspector General in Arlington, Va. Letters accompanying both subpoenas are signed by the special agent in charge of the Department of Justice's Fraud Detection Office there.

The December subpoena has not yet been filled, and the deadline is Jan. 5.

The information will join an already huge cache of documents collected in the inquiry, which now spans more than two and a half years. That includes the local grand jury investigation and the current federal one. Simms has said his office compiled more than 500,000 documents into 50 three-ring binders during his involvement.

No one has been indicted as a result of the inquiry, and Ellis has repeatedly referred to the investigation as a politically motivated witch hunt. Though not indicted by the grand jury, former City Finance Director Kelly Clark was arrested on a conspiracy charge in 2005. But that charge was dismissed, which Ellis has pointed to as a vindication.

City Council President Anita Ponder said a federal inquiry is obviously a concern.

"Any time there's a federal subpoena for any reason," she said, "that's a red flag. ... The jury is still out in my mind as to the severity of it."

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Attorney General: Hub's Violent Crime Grave Concern (BOSH)

By O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, December 16, 2006

The blood spilled on Boston's streets this year drew the attention of the nation's top prosecutor yesterday as he attended a conference on gang violence at a time when the city hopes a fractured gang truce can stop a street war from erupting.

"I am concerned that, despite the diligence of the men and women in this room, preliminary crime reports in Boston for the first six months of this year show an increase in violent crime," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Nonfatal shootings are up 10 percent this year, while fatal shootings are up 13 percent. With 71 murders on the year, Boston is approaching last year's 10-year record homicide total of 75.

Gonzales, who was in town to speak at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood Conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center, said the feds have put street violence under a microscope, not just in Boston, but across the country.

"To help cities like Boston - and any city or state facing a violent crime challenge - Justice Department officals have been traveling the country, meeting with state and local law enforcement in areas that have violent crime increases and those that have experienced decreases so we can better understand why in each case," he said.

In Boston, a cease-fire between long-feuding gangbangers from H-Block and Heath Street was strained when H-Block peacemaker Jahmol Norfleet, 20, was murdered.

Sexual Assault Stats May Not Tell Whole Story (STAMADV)

By Natasha Lee

The Stamford Advocate, December 17, 2006

The afternoon rape of a woman inside a downtown hotel parking garage in October was one of 22 reported in Stamford this year and reflects a gradual increase in reported rapes over the last four years.

Such statistics and public attention on sexual predators, including "To Catch a Predator" on "Dateline NBC" and high-profile sex-assault cases, such as one involving Duke University lacrosse players, would suggest sexual violence is on a rapid rise. National statistics, however, indicate otherwise.

Rape has dipped more than 85 percent since the 1970s, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. Last year, the number of rapes decreased by nearly 2 percent nationwide, even as other violent crimes increased, the FBI reported.

Law enforcement officials say the trend could be the result of an increased jail population, and that rapists, who often commit other crimes such as burglary and robberies, are behind bars.

Although the national statistics might be applauded, some experts and advocates aren't clapping just yet.

Victim advocates and experts say the numbers are unreliable, and that despite greater awareness and outreach with crisis centers, support groups and hot lines, rape remains an underreported crime.

Some advocates and crisis centers are leery about accepting data that is not representative of the population they serve, said Susan Howley, director of public policy for the Washington D.C.-based National Center for Victims of Crime.

"Sexual assault advocates have reservations," she said. "Especially when sexual assault groups are not seeing the number of clients decline and still have more people coming through than they can serve."

Advocates say surveys, such as the National Crime Victimization Survey conducted by the Justice Department, exclude populations more vulnerable to rape and other sex crimes, including homeless victims, mentally ill and disabled victims, and immigrant victims. The survey said only 38 percent of rapes and sexual assaults were reported last year.

The annual survey, released last year, interviews about 134,000 people, 12 years and older, about crimes committed against them.

The statistics don't reveal much about the crime, said Dean Kilpatrick, director of the National Crime Victims Research & Treatment Center in Charleston, S.C. For instance, the survey does not indicate what types of rape, such as date rape or stranger rape, are increasing or decreasing - information that could help crisis centers and advocates target groups most likely affected, he said.

Also, the survey limits its definition of rape to sexual intercourse by penetration, which could lead to the exclusion of many cases, Kilpatrick said.

"It is so insensitive to picking up rape cases that it doesn't make a lot of sense to put great credence in terms of the data," he said.

In Stamford, reported rape cases peaked in 1998 and 1999, with 32 and 35 respectively, according to police. Those same years, the Justice Department reported 0.9 rapes for every 1,000 people. Stamford's population in the 2000 census was about 180,000.

Stamford police statistics show a sharp decline the following year, with nine reported rapes in 2000, but the numbers crept back up in subsequent years. Last year, 18 cases of rape were reported in Stamford, up from 12 in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0107233

Stamford police say the higher numbers don't necessarily mean an increase in assaults. The increase could suggest more victims are coming forward, said Stamford Officer Joanne Anzenberger, who helps train officers on how to handle victims of sexual assault.

Anzenberger credits improved police training and the department working with the Stamford-based Sexual Assault Crisis & Education Center for contributing to the increase.

"Better training . . . results in a professional approach that does not leave the victim feeling as though she is being assaulted a second time by uncaring police officers," she said.

Officers' approach to rape victims has also changed over the last 25 years, Anzenberger said.

"(Police) used to expect you to fight them (attackers) off. . . . If someone is holding a gun to you and demanding that you give them money, are you going to put up a fight? Why is this any different?" she said.

Still, the national decline remains a mystery.

Local advocates and law enforcement officials say those numbers warrant several explanations.

One might be that while there are fewer incidents of stranger rape, victims sexually assaulted by relatives or friends are remaining silent.

"The national statistic speaks to the myth of the guy jumping out of the bushes and sexually assaulting a woman," said Cathy Malloy, executive director of the crisis center in Stamford. The center serves lower Fairfield County, and has provided services to victims 21Ú2 years old to age 94.

Often, victims of acquaintance rape are reluctant to report the crime because they may not recognize the attack as a crime, feel shame or worry about being believed or blamed, advocates say.

Even with strong victims' rights laws and efforts by police and prosecutors to help ease the process of reporting a rape, people still don't like to talk about it.

"It's like AIDS, there's less of a stigma than there was, but there still is," said Kari Pesavento, the center's director of operations. "It's still the only crime that people are blamed for. If I get mugged, then the suspect is blamed. But in cases of rape, the victim is blamed for what happened to them."

For fiscal years 2004 to 2006, the center served 762 victims of sexual assault, and officials say the center has not seen a dramatic decline.

"We've been here for 30 years, and we're still struggling," said Malloy, whose husband is Stamford Mayor Dannel Malloy. "We wish we could be out of business, but we're busier than we've ever been and we're using every ounce we have to raise awareness."

High-profile rape cases, such as the cases of basketball star Kobe Bryant and William Kennedy Smith, may have an impact a victim's willingness to come forward out of fear of public criticism and exposure of their personal lives, said Dr. Kathleen Casey Jordan, a professor of justice and law administration at Western Connecticut State University in Danbury.

Still, there has been progress. Women are more careful about putting themselves at risk, Jordan said.

"Women are a lot more savvy about their behaviors. Women have reconciled that they have the right to walk alone, drink alone, flirt with men, but these behaviors are often stupid, and irresponsible, not illegal, but not wise," she said.

Sexual assault education is also increasing, not only in schools and on college campuses, but in church groups and other organizations, Pesavento said.

"I think the biggest message that anyone can send to a victim is that they're in control and that if they need help, there's places out there to help," she said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

HIGH BLACK ARREST RATE RAISES CALL FOR INQUIRY Range Of Explanations Offered By Experts, Officials For S.F.'s Disparity With Other Cities (SFC)

By Susan Sward

San Francisco Chronicle, December 17, 2006

San Francisco police arrest African Americans for serious crime at a much higher rate than officers in California's other biggest cities.

Black people in San Francisco are arrested for felonies at nearly twice the rate they are in Sacramento. They are arrested at twice the rate of black people in Fresno, three times the rate in San Jose, Los Angeles, Long Beach and San Diego, and four times the rate in Oakland.

DOJ_NMG_0107234

The disparity between San Francisco's black felony arrest rates and the seven other largest cities' -- measured by the number of African Americans arrested per 1,000 black residents -- is so large that many experts and civic leaders who reviewed the numbers said they are "disturbing" and require an investigation.

The numbers prompt several questions, all of which basically boil down to this: Is the high arrest rate of African Americans because of the way the San Francisco Police Department does its policing, or because of criminal activity within the community?

Mayor Gavin Newsom and Police Chief Heather Fong said they do not think the department is going after African Americans in an unfair manner. They also said they were consulting experts to try to learn why the arrest numbers look the way they do.

Newsom said he found the numbers "outrageous" but was not shocked by them because of the time he has spent attempting to tackle the root causes of poverty.

"There is no question in my mind that this deserves immediate attention and investigation, and I will be doing that," Newsom said. He said the investigation would be conducted by a University of South Florida criminologist, Lorie Fridell, who will "do aggressive data analysis" of the arrest numbers and report back to him and Fong in about two months.

While Fong said the arrest numbers merit review, she suggested that the disparity exists in part because the perception that sometimes San Francisco is "soft on crime" may draw criminals from out of the city who feel they can come here and "not be held accountable."

Fong's staff said they hand-counted arrests made by the Tenderloin Task Force last year and found that more than 60 percent of the African Americans arrested were listed on booking cards as "no local" -- a term often applied to transients -- or gave addresses outside San Francisco. The department does not have similar data for other districts besides the Tenderloin, which police looked at because they believe many nonresidents are involved in drug dealing and other crimes there.

San Francisco officers arrest criminal suspects as they find them, not based on the color of their skin, Fong said.

"I don't think just by looking at the numbers, you can prove or disprove that there is any targeting," she said, adding that factors such as repeat offenders and out-of-town criminals influence the numbers.

Others who reviewed the numbers for The Chronicle found them startling.

"What is significant about these numbers is that they beg serious attention," said San Francisco District Attorney Kamala Harris. "These numbers are clearly based on a legitimate collection of data and are not based on emotional cries."

Merrick Bobb, a nationally recognized expert in police practices, said the city must look harder to explain the numbers.

"The strongly disparate impact of San Francisco policing on African Americans begs for a convincing set of reasons based solidly on empirical fact," said Bobb, who heads a nonprofit organization in Los Angeles that advises departments nationwide.

"The SFPD, to date, has not persuasively explained what legitimate factors cause San Francisco to have felony arrest patterns so different" from the state's other biggest cities, Bobb said.

Sheriff Michael Hennessey, who runs the city's jails and has tracked their racial composition for years, said his lockup population reflects the black arrest rate. "The disparity is just incredibly dramatic," he said. "If you are an adult white male, your chances of being in my jail are 1 in 365, and if you are an adult black male, your chances are 1 in 23."

The Chronicle began examining the city's black felony arrest rate after its investigation of the department's use of force, published in February, found officers were arresting African Americans and reporting use of force on them at rates about five times greater than their presence in the city's population.

San Francisco police cited several factors they say contribute to African Americans accounting for about half of all felony arrests in the city, where they are less than 8 percent of the population. In 2005, 1 out of 3 arrests of black people involved narcotics.

Officers interviewed by The Chronicle said most of the dealers coming from out of town by BART or car to sell drugs -- primarily crack cocaine and sometimes methamphetamine -- are African Americans. Moreover, said Capt. Timothy Hettrich, head of the narcotics division, black drug dealers often sell out in the open on street corners, thus increasing their chances for arrest.

Fong also has said that some of the offenders are arrested time and again, thereby increasing the black arrest numbers.

Also, she said, the department has had to devote a lot of resources to combatting gangs of youths responsible for many of the city's black-on-black homicides. William Whitfield, an African American officer who has worked in the department for more than a decade, said factors such as out-of-town criminals do affect arrests.

"I've seen that with my own eyes -- I got a guy once with an automatic weapon around his neck on a shoestring coming off of BART," Whitfield said. "He had the weapon under his jacket, and I was buying dope undercover. I saw him walk up from BART, and when they moved in and arrested him and the crew he was working with, they found the weapon. He was an Oakland guy."

Whitfield said many black criminals today quickly resort to violence and this occurs at a younger and younger age. People are "selling dope in the Sunset, don't get me wrong, but they aren't shooting each other over it, and they are out in the Bayview and the Fillmore. It's not all about dope and gangs, either, because you've got that everywhere. Sometimes a shooting is a personal beef, sometimes it's jealousy, sometimes it's as simple as, 'You were looking at my girlfriend.' "

'Disturbing' numbers

Many experts acknowledge that the factors Fong and her officers cite may contribute to the city's black arrest rate. They also note that in cities throughout America, African Americans are arrested in numbers that exceed their presence in the population.

But they say the black arrest rate in San Francisco is so much higher than other California cities that the disparity cannot be explained completely by the factors cited by police.

"America's criminal justice system disproportionately affects African Americans, and San Francisco is no exception," said Bobb, the police practices expert. "What stands out in this city is the degree of disproportion, which is higher than what I've seen elsewhere on the West Coast."

Joseph Marshall, a member of the San Francisco Police Commission and co-founder of the Omega Boys Club who has worked with at-risk youth for decades, said he knows the Police Department has made a concerted effort to combat black gang violence "to reduce the homicides, and those numbers are down."

But he added: "These numbers on arrest rates are disturbing and scream for an explanation. Is there something going on within the SFPD that makes the numbers so different?"

James Bell, executive director of the San Francisco-based W. Haywood Burns Institute for Juvenile Justice Fairness and Equity, has been wrestling for years with Marshall's question. About 60 percent of juveniles detained in the city are black.

"If you are an intelligent, caring person in San Francisco, you should be disquieted that in a supposedly liberal city, black youths are so much in the overwhelming majority among the detainees," Bell said. "The numbers are just too disparate for anyone to credibly advance the 'you-do-the-crime, you-do-the-time' syndrome as an explanation. To believe these numbers, you'd have to believe that white kids in places like the Haight and the Sunset are basically doing no crime."

Hettrich, who heads the narcotics division, says numbers don't convey what police confront.

"The real story is we go after the drugs, and we go where we have had complaints," Hettrich said in a ride-along interview where he pointed out drug dealing hot spots around the city and the high numbers of African Americans and Latinos making sales. "Those arrest numbers may indicate we are doing a good job in areas where we have had complaints.

"Color means nothing to us," Hettrich said. "We are prejudiced against dealers."

David Dockery, an African American officer who walks a beat in the predominantly black Hunters Point housing projects, said most citizens "want more of us out there. If I could stand in front of their houses all day long, that's what they'd like."

Dockery and his African American partner, Officer Mike Robinson, said the department's crime chasing is "color blind." They also said what many officers believe -- that criminals are drawn to San Francisco because they feel that if caught, their punishment in the courts will be lighter than it would be in surrounding counties. "We know a guy with four cases pending," Robinson said. "Where does this stop?"

Answers, not speculation

San Francisco's high black arrest rate is not of recent origin: 20 years ago, San Francisco was making black felony arrests at a rate much higher than California's seven other largest cities, state Justice Department reports show. In 1986, for example, San Francisco's black felony arrest rate was almost 45 percent greater than Los Angeles' and almost 51 percent higher than Oakland's.

In the decades since then, San Francisco's black felony arrest rate has climbed by more than 35 percent while the other seven major California cities' rates have dropped -- often by a considerable amount. During those 20 years, Los Angeles' black felony arrest rate dropped by more than 36 percent and Oakland's declined by more than 52 percent.

When evaluating why San Francisco's black arrest numbers are so different from the other cities', Bobb said speculation is not productive.

"It is not helpful, in the absence of thorough research and hard evidence, for the SFPD merely to speculate as to possible reasons, just as it is unproductive for others to speculate that there must be police antipathy to African Americans," Bobb said.

A second review was conducted at The Chronicle's request by Samuel Walker, a criminal justice professor emeritus from the University of Nebraska, Omaha, who has consulted with the U.S. Justice Department on matters ranging from police use of force to questions of race-based civil rights violations by police agencies.

Walker concluded that San Francisco police are targeting black people in their law enforcement efforts. To him, the numbers indicate that "many law-abiding citizens" are confronted by officers "solely because of their skin color."

DOJ_NMG_0107236

"No other factor than race could possibly explain the San Francisco arrest data given the fact that they are so far out of line compared with other departments," Walker said.

Two figures in San Francisco's criminal justice system expressed similar conclusions.

Public Defender Jeff Adachi said that he does not believe the department has a go-after-black-suspects plan, but he added that by focusing on heavily black neighborhoods plagued by crime and violence, police inevitably drive black arrest numbers up and often use those high numbers as proof they are in the right spots to catch the criminals.

"I believe that the San Francisco Police Department has focused its efforts, in terms of 'crime crackdowns,' in those neighborhoods where there is a high concentration of blacks -- the Western Addition, Tenderloin, Visitacion Valley, Potrero Hill, Ingleside Terrace and Bayview-Hunters Point," he said. "This has long been the trend since the crack cocaine epidemic, when task forces were formed to focus buy-bust operations in those neighborhoods."

Sheriff Hennessey said the problem does not just lie with the police.

"I think this is a reflection of institutionalized racism: You are more likely to get arrested for the same act if you're black, you are more likely to be retained in jail for the same crime if you are black, and society is more likely to care less about your incarceration if you are black," Hennessey said.

Officers in the department said they go where the crime and violence is happening.

Mikail Ali and Toney Chaplin, African American inspectors in the gang task force, said police concentrate their efforts on areas where violence is occurring.

"African American youth are shooting each other at a rate far greater than other groups, so we try to get those kids on some charge if we can't get them on a homicide," Chaplin said. Ali added: "Social neglect by the community, government and business have caused environments populated predominantly by black people to be conducive to crime and violence, and law enforcement ends up having to deal with the bottom line -- young black kids killing one another at a disproportionate rate."

The community perception

Chief Fong says officers are taught to treat all citizens equally. Police Academy recruits are given 52 hours of training -- more than twice the state requirement -- on discrimination and cultural diversity as it relates to African Americans, and other races and segments of society, including gays and lesbians, seniors and the homeless.

But in San Francisco's black neighborhoods, many believe police give them special attention.

At the Ella Hill Hutch Community Center -- a hub of activity for African American youths living in the Western Addition -- Executive Director George Smith says he is blunt with young people about what he believes they face.

"I tell young kids that you shouldn't break the law because this is a system so poised to arrest young African American males," Smith said.

Guy Hudson, who works two jobs as a city athletics coach and as a security guard, knows many of the kids in black neighborhoods all over town, and he said that many black people believe they often can "talk things over" with police in San Francisco when that wouldn't work in Oakland, Santa Clara or Daly City.

Even so, Hudson says, it's a reality that police focus on black people in San Francisco. He recalls the time three officers stopped him in Hunters Point after he "drove down a hill a little fast" and they emerged from their car "pointing guns at my head."

Hudson, 42, said he asked them, "Out in the avenues, would you be jumping out of your car with an automatic machinegun?"

The police eventually let him go. Before they drove off, Hudson said, one of them told him that someone recently had fired shots at an officer on Harbor Road. Hudson said he responded: "That gives you the right to pull pistols on everyone in the community?"

Police Commissioner Marshall, who is African American, wrote a book, "Street Soldier," in which he described the deep-seated antipathy black people hold for police. "There's not a black person I know who doesn't see the police as an occupying force in the community. At the same time, though, I'm convinced that if black folks stopped blowing each other's brains out, they'd be in a much better position to deal with police issues."

However, there are African Americans who approve of the way officers conduct themselves in their neighborhoods.

Al Harris, who lives in the Ingleside and works as an organizer for the Safety Network group, which is funded by the Mayor's Office of Criminal Justice, says police often have to confront a "pretty rough world -- you go into neighborhoods and you're hated. In some neighborhoods, it's instilled from when kids are little that the police are the enemy."

"I think the police are doing a pretty good job," Harris added. "I know officers who do all kinds of good stuff for the kids, participating in community events, giving toys at Christmas, hundreds of turkeys at Thanksgiving."

Asked about whether it appears that police are targeting black people for arrest, Harris said: "Definitely not. There's no need to target the African American kids. They're the ones out on the streets selling the drugs."

Earlier study

The numbers revealing the high arrest rate of black people in the city are not the first statistical indication that African Americans get special police attention.

In 2002 the American Civil Liberties Union issued a report, "A Department in Denial: The San Francisco Police Department's Failure To Address Racial Profiling," which found black motorists were more than three times as likely to be searched as whites after a traffic stop.

That year San Francisco police arrested black people for felonies at the department's highest rate in the years reviewed by The Chronicle -- 171 for every 1,000 African Americans in the city's population.

The next year, the department adopted a new general order establishing its commitment to "unbiased policing" and stating officers "must be able to articulate specific facts and circumstances that support reasonable suspicion or probable cause" for detaining, stopping, arresting and searching citizens or seizing their property.

The black arrest rate began to drop. In 2003 it was 150 per 1,000, in 2004 it was 146, and in 2005 it was 145. Even in that last year, though, the rate was three times higher than Los Angeles, San Jose, Long Beach and San Diego and four times higher than Oakland.

Search for explanation

Looking at the 2000 U.S. census to try to find possible reasons for the arrest rate, The Chronicle found some similarities and some differences between San Francisco and the seven other cities.

Like black residents of those other cities, San Francisco African Americans' median household income lags considerably behind that of the city's total population, and their level of education is also typically years behind that of the total population.

Police Commissioner Marshall says answers that might seem at least part of the explanation -- such as poverty, lack of education and the flight of large numbers of middle-class black residents from the city in recent decades -- end up providing no real guidance, because those patterns are found in other cities where the arrest rates are far lower.

In two ways, though, San Francisco does stand out: During the 1990s, the city's African American population declined faster than in any other major U.S. city, dropping by 23 percent, according to 2000 census figures.

The black percentage of population also dropped in Oakland, San Jose, Los Angeles and San Diego. In Fresno, Long Beach and Sacramento, it rose somewhat. Today San Francisco, which is 7.8 percent African American, has the second smallest proportion of black people among the state's eight biggest cities. San Jose, with 3.5 percent, has the smallest, and Oakland, with almost 36 percent, has the largest.

A second difference involved unemployment numbers. While African Americans in all the cities had high unemployment numbers, only in San Francisco was their unemployment rate -- 6.2 percent -- more than double that of the rest of the population.

Need for investigation

Walker, the Nebraska criminal justice professor, said San Francisco's high black arrest rate should be investigated by the U.S. Justice Department and the state attorney general's office.

Fong said she did not feel the need for a state or U.S. Justice Department investigation of San Francisco's black felony arrest rate. Instead, she said she was consulting with outside experts and plans a review of department policies to see if changes are warranted.

She added that the department's efforts to analyze its arrest record are made difficult by the fact its record keeping system is being overhauled and she can't "go to a computer right now and pull up arrest data with all this information you have spoken about."

Newsom said while he is convinced there is no "significant racial profiling in our department," he cannot "in good conscience defend the disparity" between San Francisco and other cities' black arrest rates. Referring to the arrest numbers, he said, "On face value, they are outrageous."

The mayor added that as he has worked to push programs tackling concentrated poverty in the city, such as a tax credit for working families, he has concluded "the issues of crime for me are overwhelmingly correlated with issues of poverty."

Newsom added that Fridell, the University of South Florida associate professor of criminology selected by the city to review its arrest data, was picked in part because she has special expertise in the area of racial profiling.

One way or another, San Francisco has to discover why it is arresting black citizens at a higher rate than the other California cities, said Bobb, the Los Angeles police practices expert.

What is at stake is the concept of equal treatment under the law, he said.

"The Supreme Court has held that the Constitution prohibits selective enforcement of the law based on considerations such as race," Bobb said. "Courts across the country have ruled that using impermissible racial classifications in determining whom to stop, detain and search violates the equal protection clause."

DOJ_NMG_0107238

Walker, the law enforcement expert who has consulted for the Justice Department, says the San Francisco Police Department "should be looking at its own operation to see if there's anything it could be doing differently."

The equal protection under law guarantee of the 14th Amendment is "the bedrock of all civil rights laws in the United States and a fundamental principle upon which our country is based," he said.

Jack Jacqua, who founded the Omega Boys Club with Marshall, said the policing of black people in San Francisco is a problem for the city and its leaders.

While he acknowledged that police have "the most dangerous, difficult job in America," he said they "most times treat poor kids from the hood differently than they do more affluent kids."

Jacqua, who has devoted his life to working with at-risk youths, added that many black youths come from "a population where there is virtually no middle class because the middle class people can't afford to live here, and many of these youngsters end up in the criminal justice system."

It works this way, Jacqua said: If a kid shoplifts in the Sunset District, police are probably going to call Mom and Dad and have them take their child home. "But if you shoplift downtown and your address is in the Bayview, then they will take you to jail."

As for the black community, he said much of it "is a mess -- it's destroying itself. Not enough people are involved in standing up and challenging these youngsters to take responsibility for their lives. Where is the leadership?"

And what of the city's liberal political establishment that has reigned for many years?

"The bottom line," said Jacqua, "is that poor blacks are in the way of what this city wants to be, though the city won't admit it because 'we're liberal and believe in diversity.' But the city really doesn't want poor folks and especially poor black folks."

VOICES: From double standards to police strategy to social factors, there's no tidy explanation

Heather Fong, San Francisco police chief: "I support the crime-fighting efforts of the officers of this department, who day after day, under challenging and perilous circumstances, work tirelessly to protect the people of San Francisco, and do so in an impartial manner."

Victoria Gray, social worker for the nonprofit Family Service Agency: "If you are out here black, selling drugs and your pockets full of drugs and you get busted and holler 'Racism!' -- that's not racism. ... Of course there's racism. This is America. But everything isn't linked to racism. ... You have to understand all our men want is a piece of the American pie, the American dream. I don't blame them for wanting some of the pie, but I blame them for how they go about it."

Damone Hale, member of the San Francisco Juvenile Probation Commission and an attorney who has represented many young African Americans: "You see officers whose talk is rude and disrespectful, and time and again the only distinguishing factors we could find is that the defendant is African American. It's consistent and this treatment is permitted by our society."

Arlene Ackerman, former San Francisco school superintendent now teaching at Columbia University's Teachers College in New York City: "I believe that race in San Francisco is the elephant in the room and people refuse to talk about it and if you bring it up, then you are the racist. I felt more uncomfortable as a black person in San Francisco than I have felt in any other city. ... Someone has to be courageous and step up and address the issue of race in the city, starting in the education system and moving through the criminal justice system."

Delores Jones-Brown, a former prosecutor who is interim director of the Center on Race, Crime and Justice at the City University of New York's John Jay College of Criminal Justice: "Typically when we see disproportionate arrest rates for African Americans or other minorities, it is because the police have focused their forces or hot-spot policing on areas with large minority populations. What is the harm of targeting? Innocent people who are unfortunate enough to live in economically depressed neighborhoods aren't given the same measure of constitutional rights as their more affluent counterparts: They are stopped and frisked, have their cars and persons searched even without permission -- simply by virtue of where they live. It's unacceptable."

William Whitfield, officer who joined the San Francisco Police Department in 1994: "If I had to put my finger on one thing, it's the homes. I look at the kids on the corners, and 9 times out of 10 there's no dad and maybe 7 times out of 10 there's no mom in their lives and they are being raised by an aunt or grandma. Kids aren't being raised as I was -- there's just not that accountability in the homes. If they had someone at home they knew they had to answer to, that would stop a whole lot of it."

Tim Nichols, ex-San Francisco police officer, on the high black arrest rate: "It comes from the fact the majority of officers who want to take on criminals are in the Bayview and the Fillmore, which are heavily black. I don't believe it's racism. ... Officers have to pick and choose the severity of the crime they want to spend their time on, and officers who make a lot of arrests generally go after hard-core criminals." He also said black drug dealers are particularly visible: "How often do you see a group of whites standing on the street corner selling narcotics? Generally whites don't sell on the corner."

Sharen Hewitt, director of the Community Leadership Academy and Emergency Response project, which helps connect low-income clients with services, said when she has watched what happens on a Friday night on Union Street where the crowds are predominantly white, she finds "kids tearing up, fighting, smoking marijuana, drinking in the streets, guys being abusive to women, young men publicly urinating, and I don't see a whole lot of them being arrested. Some of these behaviors are developmentally appropriate, but I don't think African American young men get the luxury of having errors."

Reaction Mixed On Federal Lawsuit Charging Anti-Hispanic Bias (LH)

By Bill Hughes

Lower Hudson Journal News, December 17, 2006

PORT CHESTER - Village residents had a wide range of reactions yesterday to the news that federal officials have filed a lawsuit aimed at forcing an election district system that would increase the likelihood a Hispanic candidate could win a seat on the Board of Trustees.

Out of dozens of residents interviewed yesterday, only a handful were aware that the U.S. Department of Justice has been pressuring the village to address concerns that a municipality where more than 46 percent of the population self-identified as Hispanic in the last census does not have a single Hispanic elected official on its six-member Board of Trustees.

That pressure culminated with Friday's announcement that the department is suing the village to force some course of action to change the situation.

Among those who knew about the situation, there was wide disagreement about whether there even is a problem and what, if anything, should be done by the federal government.

"It's kind of like turning the game to make something happen that should just happen on its own," said Gabriel Hernandez, a 22-year-old registered Democrat who volunteers as a poll worker and studies business at Westchester Community College.

"I think we do really need a little more Hispanic representation, but we also need people in there who know what they're doing," Hernandez said. "You can't just have people in there because they're Hispanic, or black or white, or whatever. It just makes no sense to say, 'Oh, there's nobody Hispanic in there, so let's put someone in just based on the fact that he's Spanish,' when that person might not be qualified.

"To me, being Hispanic, that's like an offense to say, 'Oh, if they're not going to do it on their own, we'll make it happen for them,' " Hernandez added.

Carole McDermott, a lifelong resident of the village who was buying stamps at the post office on Westchester Avenue, said she didn't understand the logic behind establishing voting districts to replace the at-large designation for all six trustee seats.

"Isn't that how democracy's supposed to work?" McDermott asked. "I've never voted for somebody based on their ethnicity. Why should I, or anybody else for that matter, start now? Because somebody in Washington says we should?"

Others welcomed the idea of districts, agreeing with the contention that the all at-large system dilutes the collective strength of the Hispanic community to get behind a single candidate.

Alberto Rodriguez, a registered member of the Conservative Party, said that while he would not personally vote for a candidate based on ethnicity, he would support the creation of voting districts because he believes it would inspire more diversity on future ballots.

"There's always been like a status quo here - you accept whatever you get," Rodriguez said. "Dividing the locations based upon geography would probably enhance things and probably motivate a qualified Hispanic individual to seek nomination as a trustee."

In an interview Friday, Mayor Gerald Logan denounced the lawsuit, saying that voter apathy, not discrimination, was the primary problem in Port Chester. With roughly 21,600 residents 18 years and over, more than 3,000 of whom are believed to be Hispanic, a total of only 2,600 residents voted in the last election, Logan said.

Feds Intervene In Indian Voting Case (AP)

AP, December 17, 2006

CHEYENNE -- The U.S. Department of Justice is intervening in a federal lawsuit in which five American Indians are challenging Fremont County's system of holding at-large elections.

The department filed notice Thursday that it is intervening in the case for the limited purpose of defending the constitutionality of the federal Voting Rights Act.

Five members of the Eastern Shoshone and Northern Arapaho tribes, represented by the American Civil Liberties Union, sued Fremont County last year. They claim the county's system of holding at-large elections violates Voting Rights Act by impermissibly diluting the American Indian vote.

DOJ_NMG_0107240

The Mountain States Legal Foundation, based in Lakewood, Colo., is defending Fremont County. In its answer to the lawsuit filed late last year, the foundation argued that it would be unconstitutional to hold Fremont County to the section of the Voting Rights Act which prohibits practices that dilute minority voting.

Fremont County Attorney Ed Newell on Friday referred questions to the Mountain States Legal Foundation, but efforts to reach lawyers there were unsuccessful.

In its notice of intervention filed in the lawsuit this week, the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice stated that the United States has a right to intervene in any lawsuit in which the constitutionality of federal laws is questioned.

Laughlin McDonald, director of the ACLU's Voting Rights Project in Atlanta, said Friday that he believes abolishing at-large elections would help everyone in Fremont County.

"I think if we succeed in this suit, nobody loses," McDonald said. "If we succeed, and if we get a system that allows all the groups in that county to participate in that process, that really fulfills the premise of democracy."

McDonald said the lawsuit is set for trial in February before U.S. District Judge Alan Johnson in Lander.

Federal appeals courts have already rejected Mountain States Legal Foundation's argument that the Voting Rights Act is unconstitutional in a Montana case. The U.S. Supreme Court ultimately declined to review that case.

In last month's general election, Fremont County voters elected Keja Whiteman, a member of the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa, to one of three open seats on the county commission in an at-large election. The ACLU announced that it would continue with its lawsuit nonetheless.

"It frequently happens that minorities won't get elected until a lawsuit is filed; it's happened in a number of cases," McDonald said, adding that the fact that a minority person was elected didn't resolve the issue.

Fremont County Attorney Newell last month called Whiteman's election "a great thing for Fremont County."

Newell said Whiteman's election was proof that the county "isn't full of racists who vote along racial lines." And he said he believes Whiteman's success has weakened the ACLU's case.

"The entire premise of that lawsuit was an American Indian couldn't get elected, and this is clear proof that premise is false," Newell said. "She clearly got support from many Republicans and non-Indians to win like she did. She deserved to get elected, and she did."

In a field of six candidates, Whiteman received 6,422 votes -- more than 18 percent of all votes cast. She won four of the six precincts in Lander, where most of the voters are not American Indians.

Airline Deals Can Bog Down In The Details (HC)

By Bill Hensel Jr. And Brad Hem

Houston Chronicle, December 17, 2006

It's one thing to talk about merging two big airlines. Making it happen is another.

Since preliminary merger talks between Continental and United airlines became public last week, the talk of industry consolidation has grown louder and the market value of both airlines has increased.

No matter the buzz, there are obstacles, though surmountable, to such a deal getting struck, and pitfalls to it ultimately succeeding.

Before the airlines could reach a deal, many issues beg to be decided: Who runs the merged carrier? What is the name? Where is the headquarters?

Executives also look at fleet and route network compatibility and decide if potential labor kinks can be smoothed.

After any deal is struck, the parties wait to find out: Are there legal challenges or regulatory bombs? Is there problematic political fallout if the merged airline decides to shut down a hub or hubs?

"Big hurdles remain," Goldman Sachs airline analyst Robert Barry said in a recent report. "Airline mergers are never easy."

Continental Airlines Chairman and Chief Executive Officer Larry Kellner has not been enthusiastic about a merger but might decide he has no real choice. Experts say the carrier's board may feel pressure by shareholders to make a deal.

Kellner said again in a message to employees Friday he prefers that the Houston-based airline stay independent. But he also said the airline will do what it must to be competitive if the industry landscape changes.

Glenn Tilton, chairman, CEO and president of United, also weighed in to his employees in a taped message Friday.

"We continue to believe the industry would benefit from consolidation and that change of that kind is overdue," Tilton said. "We're in control of our decisions, and no one will be making them for us."

DOJ_NMG_0107241

With US Airways making a hostile bid for Delta Air Lines and AirTran Airways doing the same for Midwest Airlines, the industry could indeed be shifting around Continental.

CEO egosIf there is a Continental-United merger, most industry watchers believe it makes sense for Kellner to be the CEO. But that doesn't address the issue of whether Tilton would take a payout and retire or stick around as chairman or in some other capacity.

A big issue in mergers is always who is to be in control, said antitrust lawyer Jim Eiszner of Shook, Hardy & Bacon in Kansas City, Mo.

That was a concern when Continental and United talked previously, according to former Continental Chairman and CEO Gordon Bethune, who said executives from the two airlines met about four years ago to talk about a merger.

"That was an issue long before I retired," said Bethune, who stepped down at the end of 2004.

After spending years working to build the company into one of the industry's best, Continental leaders aren't going to simply hand the reins over, he said, to an airline that has had "mediocre management."

"The leadership of Continental is not going to ditch the employees," Bethune said. "It is not about getting a payday and moving on. Being leader of the company, you have a huge obligation."

The ability to complete a merger and the details that would follow come down to CEO egos, said Roger King, an analyst with research firm CreditSights.

The question is whether Kellner or Tilton would be willing to step aside and let the other team take over.

"If they can't make that work, the whole thing will fall apart," King said.

There shouldn't be much debate, King said. Kellner runs a successful airline, he added.

Even though King favors Kellner's team running any combination, he believes the name would be United because it's better known worldwide. Others experts agree it has superior brand recognition.

United, the second-largest airline in the U.S. after American Airlines, is based just outside Chicago, while Continental, No. 4, has its headquarters in Houston.

A vote for HoustonTerry Trippler, an airline expert with myvacationpassort.com, said he thought the headquarters of a merged company should be in Houston because it would be cheaper to operate than in Chicago. But CEOs can feel strongly about ties to a headquarters city.

The two airlines' route networks complement each other, and their fleets, while different, could probably mesh without too much difficulty.

Goldman Sachs said the merger would be a powerful combination.

"Continental's strengths in secondary Europe markets, the northeastern U.S. and Latin America are a great fit with United's Pacific, primary European market and West Coast strength," Barry wrote.

Continental and United have minimal competitive overlap, Eiszner noted.

Anthony Sabino, professor of law and business at St. John's University in New York, called the possible merger of United and Continental "the watershed event the industry has been waiting for."

A marriage of the two would create a megacarrier, he said, with the heft and solvency to stave off domestic and foreign competition.

Sabino said a merger of United's transcontinental and Pacific routes with Continental's flights to Europe, Latin America and the eastern half of the nation would be a "snug fit."

A load of other factorsIf a deal does get announced, there are still potential obstacles to overcome.

One could be what Northwest Airlines does. It has a so-called "golden share" of Continental that would allow it to block a takeover of Continental by United. It's generally believed, however, that the golden share wouldn't preclude Continental from being an acquirer.

Regulators and politicians could also intercede. The Justice Department could try to block any deal on antitrust grounds, Standard & Poor's airline analyst Philip Baggaley noted.

The Justice Department might also take a stern look at the so-called failing company defense, Eiszner said. Regulators might look more favorably on any type of big merger if one party is failing or at risk of failing.

In this case, Continental is healthy and United has just successfully emerged from bankruptcy.

Politicians might consider fears over rising ticket prices or potential hub shutdowns. Some are already sounding alarms.

The Business Travel Coalition called the potential United-Continental deal the ultimate warning of a "tsunami" of airline mergers most worrisome to business travel advocates.

DOJ_NMG_0107242

"The market power of resultant, reconfigured global alliances with antitrust immunity could be stunning," said Kevin Mitchell, the coalition's chairman. "The coalition believes that corporations that fund business travel activities would pay higher ticket prices as capacity would be removed as a consequence of these proposed mergers."

When it comes to hubs, industry experts say Continental's Houston and New York-area hubs are strong and are likely to remain in operation if a merger happens. The fate of its Cleveland hub is less clear.

Speed of deal an unknownHow quickly any deal might happen remains a question mark. That could depend, in part, on what happens with other carriers, including US Airways and its bid for Delta.

"If it appears that the bid could be successful, that could trigger other moves, such as a competing bid from United or Northwest for Delta," S&P's Baggaley wrote.

Continental and United were in their preliminary talks even before US Airways announced its move for Delta.

"It has been clear that consolidation was on its way," aviation consultant Alan Sbarra said. "What happens is even an airline that wants to go it alone needs to be proactive so they can control their own fate."

Lawmakers Alarmed By Airline Deals Concerns Include Loss Of Service And Jobs, As Well As Higher Ticket Prices. (AJC)

By Marilyn Geewax

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 17, 2006

Washington —- Even though the new Congress won't convene until January, key lawmakers already are preparing for hearings to examine the economic impact of possible airline mergers.

Many members of Congress are condemning the potential deals, while few, if any, support the idea of industry consolidation. Congress has no direct role in approving mergers, but it could help sway public perceptions and increase political pressure on the Justice Department to reject the airline transactions on antitrust grounds.

Perhaps the most controversial of the potential acquisitions involves US Airways Group Inc.'s unsolicited $8.7 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. The two carriers have routes that overlap significantly along the East Coast, as well as hubs relatively near each other in the West. Congressmen representing Atlanta, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Salt Lake City, Phoenix, Charlotte and other cities where the two airlines have major operations fear that a merger would wipe out jobs, diminish air service and drive up ticket prices, Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.) said.

Concerns about a loss of competition grew dramatically last week when word surfaced that UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, and Continental Airlines are considering a merger. In addition, AirTran Holdings Inc. offered to buy Midwest Air Group for about $290 million. With so many carriers now in play, the number of concerned congressmen is growing.

"We can voice our opinion," Lewis said. "And because we all represent different parts of the country, speaking out could have a tremendous impact on what happens."

Last week, incoming House Transportation Committee Chairman James Oberstar (D-Minn.) said that if it appears that the US Airways takeover of Delta would be going forward in the new year, he would hold a hearing on the matter. Teri Rucker, a spokeswoman for incoming Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii), said that panel also is planning a hearing.

Oberstar said that by publicly exposing the potential dangers of airline consolidation, his committee may be able to "throw cold water" on merger mania. "We can nudge the Justice Department to take the action they must" to prevent a loss in competition, he said.

Oberstar also said opposition to consolidation is bipartisan.

"I've heard from members on both sides of the aisle" as worries have grown about the impact on jobs and service, he said. "I haven't heard anyone come forward and say this is a really good deal."

Michael Boyd, president of Boyd Group Inc., an aviation consulting firm, agreed that Congress would become involved because so many lawmakers represent cities with huge stakes in the outcome. "There are a lot of dogs in this fight," he said.

Delta management opposes the transaction with US Airways, but if the deal were to go forward, the carriers would have to drop routes to avoid expensive redundancies and overcome antitrust concerns. That could eliminate jobs and flights, especially in smaller cities such as Savannah and West Palm Beach, Fla.

"Any Georgia legislator who doesn't stand up against this merger isn't doing his constituents any good," Boyd said.

Indeed, many already have jumped into the battle, making floor statements and working behind the scenes in Washington. For example, Rep. David Scott (D-Ga.) made a House floor speech shortly before the 109th Congress adjourned, saying that members of Congress should "do everything we can to stop this merger from going through on the grounds that it is anti-competitive, it is anti-consumer and it is anti-American."

DOJ_NMG_0107243

In recent weeks, Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) talked to White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and in a Senate floor speech, said a Delta-US Airways combination "would lead us to singular service in many cities, an absence of competition, an inevitable increase in rates and, unfortunately, less than the healthiest aviation industry."

Earlier this month, the two chief executives, Delta's Gerald Grinstein and US Airways' Doug Parker, each met with Oberstar to discuss their views.

Darryl Jenkins, an industry consultant based in Northern Virginia, said that whether Congress gets deeply engaged on the issue of airline competition may depend upon the views of creditors owed money by Delta, which is under the protection of a bankruptcy court. If by next month those creditors are in favor of the deal, then the bankruptcy judge may in turn support it and the transaction could be completed, pending Justice Department approval. That would push the other deals forward, too.

"Everyone is interested in this [Delta deal] because if one merger goes through, then two or three other mergers will follow," Jenkins said.

Lawmakers who want to head off that scenario should focus on stopping the deal, he said.

"It's a way to rally the troops," he said.

Airline Mergers: Déjà Vu All Over Again? (USAT)

USA Today, December 17, 2006

At the beginning of 1985 there were around 20 major airlines in the USA. Two years later half of them had disappeared – the victims of a wave of mergers that rocked the travel industry. Well-known brands like AirCal, Ozark, Piedmont, PSA, Republic, and Western Airlines disappeared almost overnight and other brands like American, Delta, and Northwest suddenly became much larger players.

Now everyone's wondering if it's about to happen again with recent merger talk between Delta-US Airways, AirTran-Midwest Airlines, and Continental-United Airlines. By the time you read this, more airlines may have joined the list of those reported to be in merger talks.

A number of airline chief executives have been predicting, warning, and perhaps secretly wishing for a round of consolidation. Those who foster the idea of remaking the big six into the big three see a world of decreased competition, fewer flights, and decreased seating capacity. This would help the surviving three airlines better cut costs and boost revenues … at the expense of business and leisure travelers alike.

Pulling it off

Some airlines have been shopping around, looking for an opportunity to merge. But pulling off an airline merger is no simple task. Managements of both companies must be amenable to the idea. Successfully integrating two disparate companies often with incompatible assets (like airplanes and routes) and contentious labor forces has foiled many an airline merger. And even if both managements can achieve harmonious union, many airline mergers are subsequently struck down as anti-competitive by the Department of Justice (DOJ).

A merger between smaller players like AirTran and Frontier might be easier to implement. But merger talks between large airlines, like Delta and US Airways or Continental and United, are much more likely to hit a dead end. Therefore, even though there are some big names out there pushing for mergers, like United's chief executive, Glenn Tilton, and US Airways chief executive, Doug Parker, I think it's still unlikely that any big six, network airlines will combine in 2007. But if history is our guide, I will say that if just one successful merger occurs among the big six it would likely unleash a new round of consolidation like the one we experienced in 1986-7.

Potential pairings

So if consolidation occurs, what will it look like? Who is likely to combine with whom? Airlines are busy talking to airlines. But in the end, if the Justice Department won't approve it, it's not going to happen. So I think it makes sense to sort out the potential pairings according to those that are likely to pass DOJ scrutiny and those that probably won't, or at least they probably "shouldn't" pass due to their adverse impact on competition.

I have divided the possible airline mergers into two categories: pairings with complimentary route structures, and those with overlapping routes. Although all airline mergers will probably result in reduced capacity and less competition, it is my contention that those airlines with overlapping route structures are the greatest threat to competition while those with complimentary route structures that don't overlap are less threatening and therefore more likely to pass scrutiny by the regulators.

As I reported in a recent column, the biggest problem with Delta-US Airways is the huge number of overlapping routes. If US Airways wants to grow, they would be better off pursuing American, Northwest, or United since they have primarily complimentary route structures. A combination with Continental and Delta, which also fly primarily up and down the east coast, would be very bad for competition.

Continental-United

Continental and United are already talking and they have a complimentary route structure. This would be a good merger if they can pull it off. Continental's Houston hub would give United at long last a solid foothold in the South and an alternative to Chicago and Denver when inclement weather strikes the Midwest. Continental's Newark hub would give United lots of feed for east-west routes. The combined Pacific, Latin America, and Europe routes could benefit both airlines.

But Northwest may be the spoiler

The biggest problem with Continental-United or Continental and anyone is the fact that Northwest has a financial investment in Continental that gives the carrier veto power over any other combination. This effectively takes Continental out of the merger market unless Northwest is willing to allow Continental to merge, a very unlikely scenario given that any Continental merger would likely generate increased competition for Northwest.

United's other options

If Continental is prevented from pairing with United, I believe United's other two merger options are Delta and US Airways. Both have positives and negatives. US Airways is small; Delta is very large. Both are heavily concentrated on the east coast where United is not that strong. Both airlines have a north-south route network and a Northeast shuttle that United would want. Although Delta and United have complimentary route networks, the resulting combined airline would be so large that a Delta-United merger may not pass DOJ scrutiny anyway.

The pursuit of Northwest

Northwest operates in the north central part of the country and in the Pacific where competition is limited. Therefore, Northwest is actually is a good merger partner for just about anyone in the big six except United due to United's extensive Pacific route overlap.

Other alternatives

Although I would expect to continue to hear a lot about potential mergers in the airline industry, hopefully none of them will come to fruition this year. Perhaps instead more airlines will operate marketing agreements like the recent one announced by AirTran and Frontier Airlines which should not result in higher airfares or service reductions. And hopefully DOJ will intervene if any mergers show the potential for curtailing competition and consumer options. But there really isn't much a frequent flier – or airline employee — can do but hope that it's not 1986-7 déjà vu all over again.

Credit Bureau Changes Will Cost Buyers Who Must Shop Loans (LAT)

By Kenneth R. Harney

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Home buyers and refinancers face higher fees for credit reports beginning Jan. 1 — a price boost that has mortgage, credit-industry and consumer groups fuming.

Some believe that the higher fees will have an inordinately heavy effect on moderate-income and minority first-time mortgage applicants who have nontraditional credit patterns, marginal credit scores or "thin" credit files.

They also predict that as a result of the increased costs, mortgage loan officers may not shop as aggressively for such clients — leaving those applicants with worse mortgage choices than they would have otherwise.

At the core of the controversy is a policy change by national credit bureaus Equifax and Experian that neither company announced publicly: Beginning next month, they expect to be paid every time a lender or a mortgage investor obtains an applicant's credit file as part of the funding process.

To understand the significance of the change, consider how mortgage brokers — who originate an estimated two of every three new home loans — go about their business. Brokers do not loan their own money; they connect borrowers with lenders. To do so, they must shop applications to competing "wholesale" lenders who generally have different interest rates, loan terms and specializations.

The shopping process involves sharing borrowers' key financial information, property details, credit reports and scores with potential lenders. For home buyers with straightforward credit backgrounds, high scores and substantial assets, a broker might need to send an applicant's file to only one or two lenders.

However, for applicants with more complicated credit histories and marginal scores, brokers often need to shop loan files more widely. Under the policy changes ordered by Equifax and Experian, each time a broker shops an application package to a potential lender, "reissue" fees would have to be paid to the credit bureaus. Under current practices, no additional fees are due.

Spokesmen for the two bureaus confirmed the policy change but would not discuss the higher fees to be charged. They said the change was designed to allow the bureaus to better comply with the federal Fair Credit Reporting Act, which requires them to track each exposure of a consumer's credit data. TransUnion, the third national credit bureau, has not said whether it intends to change its policy and did not respond to a request for comment.

"The whole goal," said David Rubinger of Equifax, "is strict compliance with [the law] and the security of credit information." Donald Girard of Experian said: "We believe we should be fairly compensated" each time the company's data are accessed. Harry Dinham, president of the National Assn. of Mortgage Brokers, a McLean, Va.-based trade group with about 30,000 members, estimated that for some loan applicants with marginal or incomplete credit profiles, brokers' add-on credit fees resulting from the new policy could raise total costs to the borrower by $100 to $200. For others, it would likely be less.

John Taylor, chief executive of the National Community Reinvestment Coalition, which represents a network of local groups that work with minority and moderate-income consumers, denounced the forthcoming fee increases as a "revenue grab" that "will be paid disproportionately by people of color."

An extra charge of $100 or $200 "may not sound like a lot," Taylor said, "but it moves the line on who is going to be able to afford to buy a house."

A potentially much more costly effect on minorities, recent immigrants and sub-prime applicants, said Terry Clemans, executive director of the National Credit Reporting Assn., is that some brokers, to avoid the new, higher charges, "will simply not send files to as many" wholesale lenders for competing offers. That, in turn, could mean that borrowers with complicated credit profiles requiring more extensive shopping "could end up with worse terms than they otherwise might have received" — higher rates, higher fees, less generous underwriting terms, Clemans said.

Brokers association President Dinham said, "We intend to fight this …. We think it is unfair that consumers are being forced to pay more but are getting no additional benefit." One independent credit reporting agency, Columbus, Ohio-based CBC Cos. Inc., has filed suit against Equifax over the issue, charging antitrust violations. Equifax has asked the U.S. District Court in Columbus to dismiss the suit, but no decision is expected before the end of the year.

Bottom line: Unlike other segments of the economy, there's no price competition for credit in the mortgage arena. When the bureaus say they want more, you pay more.

IMMIGRATION:

Employers' Immigration Pains (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

DENVER — The raid of six Swift & Co. meat packing plants last week spotlighted the fine line employers face because of increased government scrutiny: Make sure your employees are in the U.S. legally, but don't push too hard to find out.

This time, federal inspectors detained 1,300 Swift workers suspected of providing stolen Social Security numbers to the company. But four years ago, the company's requirement that Latino job applicants provide proof of their legal status led to a $200,000 fine for discrimination.

"Employers are very much hamstrung — if they go too far, they run the risk of a discrimination lawsuit," said David J. Ceccanecchio, an attorney for Wolf Block in Philadelphia who advises businesses that hire immigrants. "If they accept documents at face value, they run the risk" of becoming targets of stepped-up federal enforcement of immigration laws.

In the last year, the federal government has arrested 716 individuals for employing illegal immigrants, compared with 25 in 2002. In addition to the Swift raids last week, a Southern California fence-building company was fined $5 million for employing illegal immigrants, and two Florida men were each sentenced to more than four years in prison for "leasing" illegal workers to various companies.

At a news conference in Washington on Wednesday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff emphasized the importance of focusing on workplaces.

"We all know the primary economic engine that draws in illegal migration is work," Chertoff said a day after the Swift raids. "And when businesses are built upon systemic violations of the law … that is a problem we have to attack."

Some observers say that attack has changed the dynamic at workplaces nationwide, leading employers to worry more about becoming targets of immigration raids than of anti-discrimination suits.

DOJ_NMG_0107246

"There was more of a balance before," said immigration attorney Elena Park of the firm Cozen O'Connor. Federal law requires businesses to have job applicants fill out an I-9 form and to verify that the person can legally work in the United States by checking documents — usually a Social Security card and photo identification. But employers are prohibited from asking for additional documentation to prove legal residency.

"All the I-9s say in big, bold letters that the employee chooses what ID to show you, and if you ask for more, you can be sued for discrimination," said Angelo Amador, director of immigration policy for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Unless the documents appear to be forged, employers must accept them and verify Social Security numbers with the Social Security Administration — a process that can take months.

Even if employers receive a "no-match" warning that workers' identities don't correspond to their Social Security numbers, their next move is a matter of dispute.

In June, the Department of Homeland Security issued a proposed rule that companies give workers 60 days to resolve discrepancies in their Social Security records. But the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission warned that the proposal could lead businesses to violate nondiscrimination laws, and the rule has not been adopted.

The Cincinnati clothing manufacturer Cintas Corp., which employs 32,000 people nationwide, this fall began to require its workers to resolve discrepancies within 63 days or be placed on unpaid leave. Religious leaders and unions trying to organize Cintas workers protested, and Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), incoming chair of the House Committee on Homeland Security, warned the company in a letter last month that it may be violating anti-discrimination laws.

Cintas said its new policy was unrelated to the proposed Homeland Security rule. "It got changed this year to ensure that we're in compliance with the law and that our employees are eligible to work in the United States," said spokesman Mike Wallner. Employees can resume work after they resolve the matter with the Social Security Administration, he said.

Cintas is not the only company to take such a step. Last month, Smithfield Foods Inc. fired a few dozen workers at a Tar Heel, N.C., slaughtering plant who had received "no-match" letters. A thousand workers walked off the job in protest, and Smithfield rehired the dismissed laborers, giving them time to resolve the problem.

Labor groups contended that Smithfield, which a federal court ruled in May had harassed union backers, was trying to stifle organizing drives. But Smithfield officials said they were simply trying to do the right thing.

"We're getting battered from both sides," spokesman Dennis Pittman said. "We're just trying to figure out the law and follow it."

Legal experts say the anti-discrimination clauses exist to protect would-be employees often subject to the most scrutiny: low-income people with few documents.

"If an employer asks you to prove you're here legally, what would you bring to the employer" other than a Social Security card? asked Keith Cunningham-Parmeter, a law professor at Willamette University in Salem, Ore. "A passport? Those are the sort of things that low-wage workers don't necessarily have in their desk drawer."

Immigrant rights groups that warn of the dangers of employers aggressively questioning their workers have long pointed to the employment discrimination case the Department of Justice filed against Swift in 2002.

The complaint says that, since 1990, Swift's Worthington, Minn., plant requested extra proof of legal residence from job applicants "perceived to be non-U.S. citizens or foreign-born."

Arcenio Martinez applied for a job at the plant in 2000. A legal U.S. resident, he was asked to show a Social Security card and a work permit — more than was requested from non-Latinoappearing applicants, the complaint says. Even though he produced both documents, Martinez was not hired. Another applicant, a U.S. citizen who did not speak English, was asked for a birth certificate, driver's license and Social Security card before he was hired.

The federal government sought $2.5 million from Swift but settled for $200,000. Nonetheless, in a release, the Justice Department called it the largest employment discrimination case based on immigration status in history.

"Anyone who is entitled to work should be treated equally and without discrimination in the employment market," Assistant Atty. Gen. for Civil Rights Ralph F. Boyd Jr. said in a statement.

In testimony before the House Small Business Committee in June, Jack Shandey, Swift senior vice president for human resources, cited the case to highlight what he called contradictory government expectations of business. "To repeat, our company found itself in hot water for allegedly pushing too hard to ensure employees possessed the status they claimed," he said.

Now Swift is feeling pressure from another source.

The company since 1999 has used a federal online system, called Basic Pilot, for speedy verification of its workers' Social Security numbers. But Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents found that many Swift plant employees were using stolen Social Security numbers that were not flagged by that system.

DOJ_NMG_0107247

Chertoff said investigators advised Swift about the case and about the pending raid of the company's plants. The company interviewed suspected workers, and about 400 were dismissed, quit or did not show up for work. It also asked a federal judge in Texas to bar Immigration and Customs from raiding its plants. The judge refused, and the raids went ahead Tuesday.

Swift did not return repeated calls but has argued that it has been obeying the law.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Challenges Democrats To Cut Spending Earmarks (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 17, 2006

President Bush yesterday challenged Democrats to live up to their pledge to cut pork-barrel spending, using his weekly radio address to suggest they join forces to crack down on earmarks in spending bills.

Mr. Bush called it a "top priority" for Congress when lawmakers return next year.

The administration has been trying to find an issue where it has common ground with Democrats, and spending is an obvious area, particularly given Democrats' campaign and post-campaign pledges to cut waste.

"That was one of the clear messages American voters sent in the midterm elections," Mr. Bush said. "And one of the best ways we can impose more discipline on federal spending is by addressing the problem of earmarks."

Mr. Bush's own party was unable to rein in earmarks during its time in control of Congress, and many Republican leaders in Congress staunchly defend the current system.

Earmarks are line-items written into bills or congressional reports that direct money to specific projects, often at the whim of a single member of Congress and without any formal review or chance for a vote on the House or Senate floor.

Opponents refer to them as pork-barrel spending, and the Congressional Research Service says they ballooned after Republicans took control of Congress in 1995.

For example, earmarks in the spending bill for the Commerce, Justice and State departments grew from 253 in fiscal 1994 to 1,722 in fiscal 2005. The dollar value nearly doubled, as did the percentage of the total bill dedicated to earmarks: from 11.5 percent in 1994 to 21.8 percent in 2005.

Sensing the potency of the issue, Democrats have pledged to keep earmarks out of spending when they complete the fiscal 2007 appropriations process and to prevent earmarks in future spending bills until they pass a reform package that makes earmarks more transparent.

It would be a major step if Mr. Bush and Democrats in Congress could come to an agreement.

While applauding the president's challenge, Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, said Mr. Bush could do more to cut down on earmarks by refusing to follow through on those included in reports, which do not have the force of law.

"By rejecting this secret spending for politicians' pet projects, federal agencies could focus these funds on their core missions and serve true national priorities," Mr. DeMint said.

Among the options being floated on Capitol Hill are requiring every earmark to be listed along with its sponsor and some specific information about the provision, preventing earmarks that would benefit a lawmaker or those tied to him or her and allowing an up-or-down vote to strip individual earmarks from bills.

Mr. Bush said earmarks create the chance for wasteful spending "such as a swimming pool or a teapot museum." According to Citizens Against Government Waste, the Teapot Museum in Sparta, N.C., received $500,000 in federal spending during the last fiscal year.

But some members of Congress, including top Republicans on the House and Senate appropriations committees, argue members of Congress know their districts better than federal bureaucrats, so they are better at directing spending.

And while Mr. Bush points to questionable spending, defenders point to the Iraq Study Group, which was the result of a $1 million earmark.

The House passed an earmark-reform proposal this year, but the Senate did not.

Panetta Urges Bush, Congress To Just Get Along (HC)

By Anne Marie Kilday

Houston Chronicle, December 17, 2006

Former White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta, who served on the Iraq Study Group, said President Bush and the newly elected Democratic Congress must work together to confront the nation's problems.

DOJ_NMG_0107248

"There's a fundamental decision that both the president and the Democratic Congress have to make. And that is whether they are going to work together to govern the country, or whether they are going to be in confrontation or gridlock for the next two years," Panetta said. "It's not going to be easy for either side to do that."

Panetta was in Houston on Friday to speak to a group of Houston business leaders about the new Congress. He said there may be opportunities for the president and congressional Democrats to reach agreement on key issues, such as immigration and education.

The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by Houston lawyer and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former U.S. Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., released its final report about 10 days ago. Bush has said he will study the report before making a formal response in January.

"These are not easy issues," Panetta said. "I think the president needs to take the time to look at these issues and hopefully make the right decision."

Possible opportunities Panetta said Baker did a good job chairing the group, forging a unanimous report by the 10-member panel.

"We had some tough debates, but they were always civil. Nobody ever pounded the table and threatened to walk out. Everybody basically said, 'OK, we have some differences, let's work our way through it.' And, frankly, that's the way things are supposed to work in Washington," the former California congressman said.

Addressing future U.S. policy and strategy in Iraq is very important because of the lives at stake and the strong divisions in the country over the war, Panetta said.

An Army veteran of the Vietnam War, Panetta said our troops today have strong support from the American people.

"I think that the one thing I really see is the American people, despite divisions over the war, don't blame the troops. They really are supportive of the men and women in Iraq. And I think the troops over there understand that," he said.

'A very violent place' The visit to Iraq by the study group brought home the reality of the dangers soldiers stationed there face, Panetta said.

"Going into Baghdad, you have to wear a helmet and a flak jacket on the airplane, and we had to drop in a spiral descent from 10,000 feet, just to avoid missiles," Panetta said. "Then they put us onto helicopters to take us into the Green Zone, and we were still wearing our helmets and flak jackets, and there were attack helicopters firing flares in order to divert any heat-seeking missiles. So, that whole thing ... well, we suddenly realized that it really was a battle zone.

"And at night, you could hear the helicopters coming in. And I asked what that was about, and they said they were delivering the wounded. So, you realize that Iraq is a very violent place," Panetta said.

"Even if you get them 50,000 to 100,000 additional troops, the military commanders say it would only produce a temporary change," Panetta said.

"There really is no military victory in Iraq. The only way you can win is if the Iraqis govern themselves and control the violence," Panetta said.

"The goal is a stable Iraq. And that stability may not necessarily be achieved through the democratic process."

Panetta said Washington policymakers "always underestimate the intelligence of the American people."

Congress's Inaction Threatens Funding (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

The Republican-controlled Congress's decision to adjourn a week ago before completing many of the spending bills that finance the federal government will reverberate in ways large and small, such as understaffed U.S. attorney's offices, delayed renovations at the University of Bridgeport in Connecticut and a scuttled global nuclear energy exchange.

Republican leaders left behind just enough spending authority to keep the government operating through mid-February, less than halfway through the 2007 fiscal year that began Oct. 1. Democrats have signaled that when they take control of Congress in January they will extend that funding authority for the remainder of the year based largely on the previous year's spending levels, which will result in many cuts in programs.

The Democrats also will do something that is certain to anger many lawmakers but cheer critics of excessive government spending: They will wipe out thousands of lawmakers' pet projects, or earmarks, that have been a source of great controversy on Capitol Hill. In the past, lawmakers have peppered individual spending bills with earmarks benefiting special interests. But the funding resolution the Democrats intend to pass in lieu of spending bills will be devoid of earmarks.

Among the casualties will be $3 million for AIDS and homelessness programs in San Francisco pushed by House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and $3 million to establish the Charles B. Rangel Center for Public Service at City College of New York, pushed by the center's namesake, the Democrats' incoming House Ways and Means Committee chairman.

Efforts championed by President Bush, such as "clean coal" technology, will take a big hit, but so will programs favored by Democrats. The federal judiciary would run out of money to pay lawyers for poor defendants by July, effectively locking up the wheels of justice because trials could not proceed without legal representation for defendants.

Democrats say they had little choice but to take this tightfisted approach after Republicans dumped so many unfinished spending bills in their lap. "We did not call the shots here," maintained incoming House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.), who said that with the fiscal year well underway and Democrats assuming power with a full slate of priorities, he will have little choice but to put the government on autopilot. "We will try to provide modest adjustments where we can, but a lot of people will be left short."

But some Republicans suspect that's not the full story.

"What the Democrats didn't say is that they probably intend to take the earmark savings and spend it elsewhere," said Rep. Dave Weldon (R-Fla.), who was hoping to get $3 million for a new autism research center at the Florida Institute of Technology.

The collapse of the budget process was a long time coming, with roots stretching back to the Republican revolution of 1994. But this year, the system finally buckled under the weight of the president's austere spending recommendations, a difficult election year and the Republican leadership's efforts to placate both its most ardent conservatives and its endangered moderates.

Congress was able to pass only two of its 11 annual spending bills, those that fund defense and homeland security. Republicans punted spending measures for virtually every one of the government's domestic programs to the Democrats who assume control Jan. 4. Then last week, Democrats announced they would punt, too. A joint House-Senate resolution -- rather than carefully tailored spending bills -- will keep the government open through the end of the fiscal year, Sept. 30, largely at last year's levels.

The consequences will be substantial. At the Justice Department, officials said a resolution financing the government largely at 2006 levels would only worsen a severe staffing shortage at offices of U.S. attorneys around the country. The vacancy rate for federal prosecutors stands at about 10 percent on average, and House Democrats reported earlier this year that some larger offices have rates surpassing 20 percent.

The federal court system would not be spared, either. Operating at current funding levels would leave the judiciary with a $270 million shortfall for salaries and expenses, said Dick Carelli, spokesman for the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. Furloughs, layoffs or attrition would be needed to trim the payroll by 7 percent -- or almost 3,000 probation officers, court clerk workers and pretrial service staff members -- by the close of the fiscal year, Carelli said.

The Department of Energy is looking at a 20 percent cut in its administrative budget and could be forced to lay off many of the 960 people who help manage the department -- secretarial aides, lawyers and human resources staffers, said Craig Stevens, a department spokesman.

New presidential initiatives for 2007, such as the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, FutureGen, a clean coal initiative, and a health-care information technology program, are not likely to be funded, agency officials say.

Democrats will make some adjustments in the joint resolution to address the most pressing needs, especially in the Department of Veterans Affairs health-care system, which needs $3 billion more just to keep covering all the veterans it covers now, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which could lose 500 agents under current funding levels, said Tom Gavin, spokesman for incoming Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.).

What is certain is that thousands of earmarks will get nothing, at least until October, when fiscal 2008 begins. About $400,000 in hospital equipment for Perris, Calif., $1.5 million in biotechnology grants for the Illinois Institute of Technology, and another $1.5 million for bridge and street repairs in Columbus, Ohio, will be wiped out.

Budget hawks who have been crusading against such home-district projects hailed the Democrats' decision as an unexpected stroke of political bravery. Bush praised the move yesterday in his weekly radio address.

But the lawmakers who worked to get those projects into the now-dashed spending bills were left quietly fuming. Obey said Friday that he has fielded "a steady stream of calls from people in high dudgeon."

"I will work to reverse this decision," promised Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), who lost a transit center for Bridgeport, a waste-to-energy program for Stamford and a train station for South Norwalk.

It has been nearly 20 years since congressional failures left the government to be financed under spending guidelines and formulas rather than line-by-line policymaking. But to federal budget experts, this year's breakdown was hardly surprising. Not since 1994, the last year of Democratic control, has Congress actually passed all of its spending bills. Republican leaders almost ensured logjams by populating the House Budget Committee with conservative spending hawks whose views on the size of government were fundamentally different from many of the appropriators who would have to flesh out the committee's budget blueprints. Ultimately, compromises in those conservative principles have been laid at the feet of the Clinton White House, the demands of the post-Sept. 11 government, or a Democratic-controlled Senate, said Scott Lilly, a former Democratic staff director of the House Appropriations Committee.

But this year, conservatives dug in, backed by the White House and GOP leaders. Bush's domestic spending request for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1 actually sliced $2.2 billion from the 2006 level.

Rather than face a public fight over the cuts necessary to meet that goal, House Republican leaders decided not to bring the largest domestic spending bill, funding labor, health and education programs, to a vote before the election. The Senate did even less. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) simply decided none of the domestic spending bills would get time on the Senate floor before the election.

"The breakdown of regular order this cycle -- indeed the failure to get our bills done -- should be squarely placed at the feet of the departing Senate majority leader," said outgoing House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.).

Pelosi's House Diplomacy (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

One day last week, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi picked up the phone and asked John Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader of the House, if he would like to suggest some ways they could ensure better supervision of the page program, the subject of so much controversy in the scandal that led to the resignation of Florida Rep. Mark Foley.

Another day, when the San Francisco Democrat learned that her predecessor as speaker, Illinois Republican Dennis Hastert, was unhappy about losing his spacious office suite, she quietly found two rooms for him near the prime space allocated to the Ways and Means Committee.

Both moves were insignificant in themselves, and neither drew any notice. But they signal that the management of the House of Representatives is going to change substantively -- and not just symbolically -- when Pelosi is sworn in on Jan. 4 as the first woman to hold the third-highest office in the land.

No one -- including Pelosi herself -- can tell you all the ways the House will change. When I interviewed her last week, it became apparent that she was just getting into the details of her new position. That may seem odd, but I find it believable that during her campaigning and fundraising these past two years, her focus was not on becoming speaker but, as she said, on "getting the Democrats back in the majority" after 12 years out of power.

"It was not until I was nominated in the Democratic caucus [for speaker] that it hit me," she said.

But Pelosi has been thinking for a long time about how she would manage the House, if she ever got the chance. Two years ago, she and others in the Democratic leadership sent Hastert a letter outlining changes in House rules and procedures that would end some of the flagrant abuses of the legislative process that have taken place. The letter said that Democrats would live by the same new rules if and when they were the majority.

That was repeated a year ago, and Pelosi says it stands today.

It means, among other things, an end to congressional rides on corporate planes, a block on the revolving door between congressional staff jobs and lobbying shops, and a process that will make it harder to slip in special-interest earmarks.

It also means a radical overhaul of House rules -- a strict time limit on roll calls to prevent prolonged arm-twisting of reluctant members, and a requirement that conference committees work in the open and include minority party members.

After a decade of bitter partisanship that has all but crippled efforts to deal with major national problems, Pelosi is determined to try to return the House to what it was in an earlier era -- "where you debated ideas and listened to each other's arguments."

That does not mean she is abandoning the Democratic agenda. Far from it. But it does mean that she has grasped the key to doing her job: "I am the speaker of the House," not the leader of the Democratic Caucus. She expects few interventions in floor debate, and she is picking her spots carefully from a flood of television interview requests.

The transition from partisan combatant to speaker is not easy. In the view of many in her caucus, she erred when she intervened on behalf of Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania against Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland for majority leader. Hoyer's victory was a black eye for her, but it may not have long-term effects. Hoyer is an able floor leader, and Pelosi has named an ally of hers, Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, as caucus chairman and has transferred many of the public relations responsibilities to him.

The small gestures she has made to the Republicans suggest a willingness to accommodate, rather than a vindictive reaction to the Democratic victory.

DOJ_NMG_0107251

That bodes well for the future.

Intelligence Ignorance (WP)

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

HOUSE SPEAKER-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has come up with a deft solution to a problem identified by the Sept. 11 commission: the disjointed and inadequate congressional oversight of intelligence. It's not the solution that the commission endorsed, so Ms. Pelosi and the Democrats will take some hits for failing to live up to the letter of their pledge to enact all the commission's recommendations. But her proposal could go a long way toward fixing the dysfunctional organization the panel addressed.

The fundamental problem, for intelligence and other matters, is the separation between committees with substantive authority over particular departments or agencies (authorizers) and those who wield the power of the purse (appropriators). You can guess which executive officials are more responsive to. This problem is exacerbated when it comes to intelligence because its spending has been considered by the appropriations subcommittee responsible for all military spending. That means that intelligence issues don't get enough attention and that intelligence spending priorities may be skewed in the direction of military hardware.

To fix this disconnect, the Sept. 11 commission recommended that the House and Senate intelligence committees, either as separate panels or fused into one, be given both substantive and budgetary authority. Not surprisingly, that didn't sit too well with appropriators jealous of ceding any power. The Pelosi compromise would create an intelligence oversight panel within the appropriations committee, responsible for reviewing spending and recommending spending levels. In a key departure, this committee would include not only appropriators but members of the intelligence committee. This is a clever approach that merits serious consideration by the incoming Senate majority leader, Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.).

We wish we could be as enthusiastic about Ms. Pelosi's choice to head the intelligence committee. In an interview with Congressional Quarterly's http://CQ.com, the incoming chairman, Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.), exhibited a troubling lack of familiarity with basic knowledge that ought to be expected of someone in that important position. Asked whether al-Qaeda was Sunni or Shiite, Mr. Reyes replied, "Al-Qaeda, they have both . . . Predominantly -- probably Shiite." In fact, al-Qaeda's members are adherents of the Sunni branch of Islam and their viciousness toward Shiites is a key fact of recent Iraqi history. Mr. Reyes also flubbed a question about Hezbollah.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Reyes said he had misunderstood some of the questions but added, "My position is I screwed it up and will admit it and move on from there." As to doubts about his capabilities, he said, "It's my expectation that people, once they get an opportunity to see my work, won't have that doubt."

We hope he's right. In our interview, Mr. Reyes said he was not enthusiastic about some of the recommendations by the Iraq Study Group but couldn't name them. "I can't speak to the specifics, some I was not enthused about in there," he said. "Let me defer until I get my book. I know I tabbed and highlighted it." Mr. Reyes has a steep learning curve ahead.

OTHER NEWS:

Obama Says He Regrets Land Deal With Fundraiser (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

CHICAGO. Dec. 16 -- Antoin "Tony" Rezko is a political insider, an energetic Chicago dealmaker and campaign fundraiser often in the headlines for being on the wrong side of good government. Indicted in October on influence-peddling charges, he also has a habit of befriending prospective political stars.

One of them was Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who was offered a job by Rezko in the early 1990s while a top student at Harvard Law School. Obama did not take it, but over the years, the two men stayed in touch, and Rezko backed Obama's successful 2004 U.S. Senate campaign, raising money and contributing his own.

In June 2005, in what Obama now describes as a "boneheaded" mistake, Obama and Rezko's wife bought adjacent properties on Chicago's South Side, closing the deals on the same day. Seven months later, wanting a bigger yard for his $1.65 million house, Obama bought a slice of the Rezko property for $104,500.

After news of the deal broke last month in the Chicago Tribune, Obama said he had erred by creating the appearance that Rezko had done him a favor by selling him a portion of the lot. For the first time since he entered the national spotlight, the 45-year-old freshman senator found himself on the defensive, discussing a personal decision he had come to regret.

DOJ_NMG_0107252

"There's no doubt that this was a mistake on my part. 'Boneheaded' would be accurate," Obama said in a telephone interview Friday. "There's no doubt I should have seen some red flags in terms of me purchasing a piece of property from him."

Obama recently donated to charity $11,500 that Rezko had contributed to his federal campaign account.

There have been no allegations that Obama, whose political fortunes are soaring as he mulls a run for president, broke the law or committed any ethics violations. He said he has done no government business with Rezko, who is facing charges in two unrelated criminal cases.

But leaders of Chicago watchdog organizations describe Obama's behavior as a surprising error in judgment, particularly for a politician noted for his tactical skills, his ambition and his support of state and federal ethics legislation.

"It's disappointing because there has been speculation about Tony Rezko, and whether he was crossing ethical lines, for a number of years," said Cynthia Canary, director of the Illinois Campaign for Political Reform.

Jay Stewart, executive director of Chicago's Better Government Association, said, "Being a lawyer, he did everything by the book, but there's a higher expectation of him."

To Chicago political observers, it made sense that Rezko tried to get close to Obama. A Syrian-born businessman whose fortunes seemed to rise and fall with his latest deal, Rezko was known for cultivating politicians, including Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D) and Rep. Luis V. Gutierrez (D-Ill.).

Rezko created a real estate development company and operated dozens of Chinese eateries and pizza restaurants. After Blagojevich rode into office in 2002, Rezko emerged as a friend and close adviser. He recommended people for significant state jobs and, a federal grand jury charged, soon tried to shake down investment firms that wanted to do business with Illinois.

In one instance, Rezko and Stuart Levine, a member of two state boards, allegedly demanded that a firm seeking investment business pay a $2 million fee to a middleman or give $1.5 million to the campaign of "a certain public official," later identified as Blagojevich.

The company refused. Levine pleaded guilty this fall to federal charges and is cooperating with authorities. Blagojevich, who has not been charged, denied wrongdoing and accused Rezko of betrayal.

Chicago authorities alleged last year that Rezko set up a front minority company to win permission to open three Panda Express outlets at O'Hare International Airport. His nominal partner was Jabir Herbert Muhammad, son of the late Nation of Islam founder Elijah Muhammad.

Rezko and Muhammad settled the matter, which became public in 2005, months before Obama's house purchase. Without admitting wrongdoing, they agreed to end their O'Hare operations and were disqualified from the city's minority business program.

When Obama and his wife, Michelle, a hospital executive, decided to move with their two young girls from their Hyde Park condominium, they chose a spacious three-story Georgian revival home on a tree-lined street in the Kenwood neighborhood, not far from the University of Chicago. The owner had listed the house -- nearly 100 years old, with four fireplaces and a wine cellar -- and an adjacent lot as separate parcels.

The Obamas purchased the house, which had been on the market for several months, for $300,000 below the list price. On the day they closed, Rezko's wife, Rita, closed on the 9,000-square-foot lot next door for the asking price of $625,000.

Obama said Rezko, who knows the neighborhood, was one of several people he called for advice on the real estate market. Rezko told him he knew the developer who renovated the house. In a later conversation, Rezko said he intended to buy the empty lot and build on it.

Later, the Obamas bought a 10-foot-by-150-foot piece of the lot for $104,500. An appraisal put the value of the strip at $40,500, a spokesman said, but Obama considered it fair to pay one-sixth of the original price for one-sixth of the lot.

"It wasn't something we needed to have," Obama said. "It was something I thought would be nice, if it worked economically for him."

Rezko and Obama collaborated to build a fence separating the properties, and Obama has paid his landscapers to mow the lawn on the Rezko lot. Obama, who said city code required Rezko to fence the lot, paid for legal and design work to ensure it was done properly, while Rezko paid for the fence.

Obama said that he was unaware of Rezko's brewing troubles in 2005 and that Rezko sought no favors. He described himself, after eight years in the Illinois Senate and two on Capitol Hill, as careful to live within strict ethical boundaries -- refusing to allow lobbyists to pay for meals, for example, and reimbursing people for golf outings.

"I'm very proud of how I've conducted myself during the entire time I've been in public service," Obama said. "My hope would be that people come away saying, 'He's not perfect, but he owns up to his mistakes and tries to correct them as quickly as possible.' I hope they look at the entire body of my public service and would note that this is the first time anything has ever come up."

DOJ_NMG_0107253

Stewart, of the Better Government Association, said Obama took responsibility and did not shy away from questions. If there are no further revelations, he said, "it's going to wind up being a footnote," but "if anything further comes out, it's a different story."

To Those Who Surf: Time Salutes You (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

NEW YORK -- Congratulations! You are the Time magazine "Person of the Year."

The annual honor for 2006 went to each and every one of us, as Time cited the shift from institutions to individuals -- citizens of the new digital democracy, as the magazine put it. The winners this year were anyone using or creating content online.

"If you choose an individual, you have to justify how that person affected millions of people," said Richard Stengel, who took over as Time's managing editor earlier this year. "But if you choose millions of people, you don't have to justify it to anyone."

Time did cite 26 "People Who Mattered," including North Korea's Kim Jong Il, Pope Benedict XVI, President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Stengel said that if it came down to one individual, it probably would have been Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. "It just felt to me a little off selecting him," Stengel said.

The 2006 "Person of the Year" package hits newsstands Monday. The cover shows a white keyboard with a mirror for a computer screen -- showing readers their reflection.

Person Of The Year: You (TIME)

Time.com, December 17, 2006

From the December 25, 2006 issue of TIME magazine

[TIME.com] -- The "Great Man" theory of history is usually attributed to the Scottish philosopher Thomas Carlyle, who wrote that "the history of the world is but the biography of great men." He believed that it is the few, the powerful and the famous who shape our collective destiny as a species. That theory took a serious beating this year.

To be sure, there are individuals we could blame for the many painful and disturbing things that happened in 2006. The conflict in Iraq only got bloodier and more entrenched. A vicious skirmish erupted between Israel and Lebanon. A war dragged on in Sudan. A tin-pot dictator in North Korea got the Bomb, and the President of Iran wants to go nuclear too. Meanwhile nobody fixed global warming, and Sony didn't make enough PlayStation3s.

But look at 2006 through a different lens and you'll see another story, one that isn't about conflict or great men. It's a story about community and collaboration on a scale never seen before. It's about the cosmic compendium of knowledge Wikipedia and the million-channel people's network YouTube and the online metropolis MySpace. It's about the many wresting power from the few and helping one another for nothing and how that will not only change the world, but also change the way the world changes.

The tool that makes this possible is the World Wide Web. Not the Web that Tim Berners-Lee hacked together (15 years ago, according to Wikipedia) as a way for scientists to share research. It's not even the overhyped dotcom Web of the late 1990s. The new Web is a very different thing. It's a tool for bringing together the small contributions of millions of people and making them matter. Silicon Valley consultants call it Web 2.0, as if it were a new version of some old software. But it's really a revolution.

And we are so ready for it. We're ready to balance our diet of predigested news with raw feeds from Baghdad and Boston and Beijing. You can learn more about how Americans live just by looking at the backgrounds of YouTube videos those rumpled bedrooms and toy-strewn basement rec rooms than you could from 1,000 hours of network television.

And we didn't just watch, we also worked. Like crazy. We made Facebook profiles and Second Life avatars and reviewed books at Amazon and recorded podcasts. We blogged about our candidates losing and wrote songs about getting dumped. We camcordered bombing runs and built open-source software.

America loves its solitary geniuses its Einsteins, its Edisons, its Jobses but those lonely dreamers may have to learn to play with others. Car companies are running open design contests. Microsoft is working overtime to fend off user-created Linux. We're looking at an explosion of productivity and innovation, and it's just getting started, as millions of minds that would otherwise have drowned in obscurity get backhauled into the global intellectual economy.

Who are these people? Seriously, who actually sits down after a long day at work and says, I'm not going to watch Lost tonight. I'm going to turn on my computer and make a movie starring my pet iguana? I'm going to mash up 50 Cent's vocals with Queen's instrumentals? I'm going to blog about my state of mind or the state of the nation or the steak-frites at the new bistro down the street? Who has that time and that energy and that passion?

The answer is, you do. And for seizing the reins of the global media, for founding and framing the new digital democracy, for working for nothing and beating the pros at their own game, TIME's Person of the Year for 2006 is you.

Sure, it's a mistake to romanticize all this any more than is strictly necessary. Web 2.0 harnesses the stupidity of crowds as well as its wisdom. Some of the comments on YouTube make you weep for the future of humanity just for the spelling alone, never mind the obscenity and the naked hatred.

But that's what makes all this interesting. Web 2.0 is a massive social experiment, and like any experiment worth trying, it could fail. There's no road map for how an organism that's not a bacterium lives and works together on this planet in numbers in excess of 6 billion. But 2006 gave us some ideas. This is an opportunity to build a new kind of international understanding, not politician to politician, great man to great man, but citizen to citizen, person to person. It's a chance for people to look at a computer screen and really, genuinely wonder who's out there looking back at them. Go on. Tell us you're not just a little bit curious.

Web Users Of Content Sites Time's "Person Of Year" (BLOOM)

By Dan Hart And Courtney Dentch

Bloomberg, December 17, 2006

Dec. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Time Warner Inc.'s Time magazine named Internet users behind the self-made content on sites such as YouTube Inc. and MySpace.com as its ``Person of the Year,'' reflecting the Web's ``digital democracy.''

``For seizing the reins of the global media, for founding and framing the new digital democracy, for working for nothing and beating the pros at their own game, Time's Person of the Year for 2006 is you,'' staff writer Lev Grossman wrote in the cover story.

Time's selection of ``you,'' published in the magazine's Dec. 25 issue, was made from a list of nominees including Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, China's President Hu Jintao, former Secretary of State James Baker and North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

The issue will be on newsstands Dec. 18 and features a reflective mylar cover that allows readers to see themselves mirrored in a computer screen above the word ``you.''

``A mother in Baghdad with a videophone can let you see a roadside bombing, or a patron in a nightclub can show you a racist rant by a famous comedian,'' Time Editor Richard Stengel wrote. ``These blogs and videos bring events to the rest of us in ways that are often more immediate and authentic than traditional media.''

100 Million Videos

YouTube, founded in 2005, draws users that watch 100 million videos a day. That traffic drew a $1.65 billion offer in October from Google Inc., the Internet's most visited search engine, to buy the video-sharing site.

News Corp. bought MySpace.com, a social-network site where users create their own profiles, for $650 million last year, while Yahoo! Inc. has offered $1 billion to buy Facebook.com, a site that started with college students and expanded to allow anyone to use it.

Other Web sites have sprung up to compete with MySpace and Facebook such as Piczo and XuQa.com.

The magazine also recognized ``newsmakers,'' those whose actions in the past year have affected people's lives, for better or worse.

Chavez to Colbert

The list includes Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, Pope Benedict XVI and Cuba's Raul Castro. U.S. newsmakers included President George W. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, former Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Ford Motor Co.'s Bill Ford, comedian Stephen Colbert and the Iraq Study Group.

Last year, Microsoft Corp. Chairman Bill Gates, his wife Melinda Gates and rock star Bono were named by Time as its ``Persons of the Year'' for 2005 for their philanthropic efforts. President Bush was named ``Person of the Year'' for 2004, and the American soldier was chosen in 2003.

``Person of the Year'' doesn't necessarily honor its recipient, and controversial cover choices for issue have included Adolf Hitler in 1983 and Josef Stalin in 1939 and 1942.

Time magazine started the annual cover story in 1927 with Charles Lindbergh, the aviator who made the first solo trans-Atlantic flight. The first woman selected was Wallace Warfield Simpson, whom Britain's Edward VIII abdicated the throne for, in 1936. The magazine also has awarded the cover to phenomena, such as the computer in 1982.

Other recent winners include New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani in 2001; Bush in 2000; and, in 1999, Jeffrey Bezos, founder and chief executive officer of Amazon.com Inc.

The only three-time ``Man of the Year'' was former President Franklin Roosevelt in 1932, 1934 and 1941.

"You" Named Time's Person Of 2006 (BBC)

DOJ_NMG_0107255

BBC.com, December 17, 2006

"You" have been named as Time magazine's Person of the Year for the growth and influence of user-generated content on the internet.

The US magazine praised the public for "seizing the reins of the global media" and filling the web's virtual world.

Time has been giving out its somewhat controversial awards since 1927, aiming to identify who most affected the news.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Chinese leader Hu Jintao and North Korea's Jong-il were 2006 contenders.

Microsoft founder Bill Gates, his wife Melinda and rock star Bono won the accolade last year and recent winners also include President George W Bush, in 2004, and "The American Soldier" in 2003.

'Wresting power'

The magazine said naming a collectivity rather than an individual reflected the way the internet was shifting the balance of power within the media through blogs, videos and social networks.

Time cited websites such as YouTube, Facebook, MySpace and Wikipedia, which allow users to interact with the web, by uploading and publishing their own comments, videos, pictures and links.

"It's about the many wresting power from the few and helping one another for nothing and how that will not only change the world, but also change the way the world changes," Time magazine's Lev Grossman writes.

Time praised the tool that made such broad collaboration possible - the web.

"It's a tool for bringing together the small contributions of millions of people and making them matter," Mr Grossman said.

Time aims to pick "the person or persons who most affected the news and our lives, for good or for ill".

Previous winners have often sparked controversy - including Adolf Hitler in 1938 and, in 1979, Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini.

Fighting The "Prep School" Scandal (NYT)

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

Insiders have long whispered among themselves about bogus “prep schools” where barely literate high school athletes launder their transcripts by taking pablum courses and sometimes by taking no courses at all. The athletes then go on to big-time sports universities, where they fail or exhaust their playing years before landing back on the streets without job prospects or college degrees.

The prep school scheme was meant to circumvent academic qualification rules for college athletes laid out years ago by the National Collegiate Athletic Association. The N.C.A.A., which was slow to recognize the seriousness of the problem, has finally adopted policies to root it out. But those policies will not do the job unless the organization takes a hard-line approach with everyone involved, including powerhouse prep schools with friends in high places and college athletics departments that knowingly recruit students who do not meet academic guidelines.

The prep school scheme sends a dangerous message to poor neighborhoods, where young people too often ignore their studies, believing that they will magically become millionaires once the world sees their athletic talents. Even worse, it encourages students to drop out of legitimate schools before graduation — at which point their grade-point averages would be written in stone — to sign up with fake schools that can help them rewrite their academic records.

The N.C.A.A. has begun to scrutinize nontraditional schools for their academic programs and has actually decertified some. The organization has also stepped up its review of athletes’ transcripts and will pay special attention to athletes who attended several schools, showed sudden and implausible jumps in grade-point average, transferred to another school late in the senior year or took an implausible number of courses in one semester.

These measures are encouraging as far as they go. But the N.C.A.A. will need to wade much deeper into the problem if it hopes to break this scheme. For starters, it needs to make clear not just what courses high school athletes need to take to become eligible for college sports, but when they should take them. Until that happens, those who exploit young athletes will always be tempted to counterfeit the academic record at the last possible moment.

This Age Of Anxiety (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

The Sidney Awards, named for Sidney Hook, are a nice way to honor the best magazine essays of the year and to pass along a few nutritious holiday reading recommendations. But if you spend a few weeks poring over the highlights from a year’s worth of magazines, you also get a window on the spirit of the times.

DOJ_NMG_0107256

And 2006, let it be said, felt to many like the year of losing ground. There was a general sense that the forces of moderation in the Middle East were losing ground to the forces of radical Shiism. (The folks at Time are crazy if they don't name Nasrallah, Ahmadinejad and Sadr People of the Year.)

There was also a sense that we were losing ground in Iraq. One of the best magazine writers on that story, George Packer of The New Yorker, tended to profile American dissidents who were trying to change the way we fight that war.

In an April essay, "The Lesson of Tal Afar," Packer followed Col. H. R. McMaster, who argued that the Iraq war was as much a psychological and anthropological problem as a military and political one. Then, in December, his "Knowing the Enemy" appeared, about freethinkers in the Pentagon and elsewhere who were studying how Hezbollah and the Iraqi insurgents create narratives that demoralize their enemies, energize believers and create a sense of historical momentum.

One gets the feeling from his articles that America's enemies are playing a different game. They're waging an open-source campaign for cultural symbols, while we're oblivious to anything we can't drive over or kill.

The next great source of anxiety in 2006 was economic. The most influential article on this subject was Alan Blinder's essay "Offshoring: The Next Industrial Revolution" in Foreign Affairs. Blinder undermined many moderate Democrats' faith in free trade by arguing the negative effects of globalization will be much broader than previously thought. It's not just the unskilled who will lose jobs, but also people who provide "impersonal services" that can be delivered over the Internet: radiologists, accountants, even college professors.

Two or three times more Americans work at these sorts of jobs, Blinder observed, than work at manufacturing jobs.

Then there was a series of articles propelled by parental anxiety. In The Atlantic, Caitlin Flanagan wrote "Are You There God? It's Me, Monica," a sharp look at the way fellatio is supposedly becoming a casual element in teenage friendships.

"I'm not, however, terrified by the oral-sex craze," Flanagan wrote. "If I were to learn that my children had engaged in oral sex — outside a romantic relationship, and as young adolescents — I would be sad. But I wouldn't think that they had been damaged by the experience; I wouldn't think I had failed catastrophically as a mother, or that they would need therapy. Because I don't have daughters, I have sons."

Political writers offered policy prescriptions to parents who were falling behind. Karen Kornbluh wrote "Families Valued," in Democracy: A Journal of Ideas, on ways Democrats could make life easier for busy "juggler families." Yuval Levin had a parallel essay called "Putting Parents First" in The Weekly Standard, urging Republicans to face up to the tensions between free market dynamism and healthy family stability.

Finally, there was the sense the forces of decency were losing ground to primordial ugliness, especially anti-Semitism. John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt wrote a fevered essay on the power of the Israel Lobby, which cleared ground for a million anti-Semitic rants. Jimmy Carter has just published a book intended to make Israelis look like racists.

I'm not sure the classic essay on this latest recrudescence has been written, but Anne Applebaum had a useful piece in Slate called "Holocaust Denial Is No Joke," and Adam Garfinkle has a comprehensive look at "The Madness of Jewcentricity" in The American Interest.

It all adds up to quite a gloomy — though well-crafted — collection of essays, culminating in a National Journal piece by Paul Starobin called "Beyond Hegemony" on life in an age of declining American power.

I have to say, I'm as pessimistic about the Middle East as the next guy, but most of this broader existential gloom about America is absurd. The U.S. is in extraordinarily strong shape economically and socially. And whatever their short-term strengths, the Sadrs of the world simply do not have a social model that large numbers of people will want to live under.

Buck up, but stay informed.

Moderate Ex-President Takes Early Lead In Iran Vote (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec.16 — Early electoral returns on Saturday suggested that a moderate former president, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, had a strong a lead over a conservative opponent in at least one of the elections held Friday.

The semi-official Fars news agency reported that most candidates on the slate led by Mr. Rafsanjani were headed for a victory in the elections for the 86-member Assembly of Experts. Muhammad Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi, the hard-line cleric, had also received enough votes to get elected. Other Web sites reported that Mr. Rafsanjani received far more votes personally than Mr. Mesbah-Yazdi.

Officials close to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad backed Mr. Mesbah-Yazdi, who has often declared his opposition to democracy. "The vote for Mr. Rafsanjani was a clear message showing that the average middle class who came out to vote for him against Mr. Ahmadinejad last year has become stronger," said Saeed Leylaz, a political analyst. "This is because of Mr. Ahmadinejad's radical and wrong policies."

Mr. Rafsanjani lost the election for president last year to Mr. Ahmadinejad in a runoff.

The Interior Ministry said Sunday that the turnout for the double elections held Friday, the local council elections and the Assembly of Experts, was around 60 percent.

That is above the previous figure of 12 percent in 2003 for the local city council elections and 46 percent in 1998 for the Assembly of Experts.

The turnout carries political significance, and the results could suggest whether Mr. Ahmadinejad still enjoys strong popularity or people were casting their votes to protest his policies.

Reformers said they had won a majority in the local councils in at least four cities — Arak, Golestan, Ilam and Bushehr — where the counting had been completed, their Web site emruz.info reported.

Most analysts are expecting the 15-member council in Tehran to be divided among the reformers, the supporters of Mr. Ahmadinejad and supporters of the current mayor, Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, also a hard-liner.

But reformers said they feared that the votes could be tampered with by supporters of Mr. Ahmadinejad, who were responsible for supervising the elections. In a statement on their Web site, they warned that if votes were tampered with, "There will be huge costs."

Early Results: Iran's Conservatives Lead (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 17, 2006

Early returns on Saturday showed hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's conservative opponents leading in elections for local councils and a powerful clerical body, widely considered a test of popular approval for the hardline leader.

Ahmadinejad's anti-Israel rhetoric and staunch stand on Iran's nuclear program are believed to have divided the conservatives who voted him into power. Some conservatives feel Ahmadinejad has spent too much time confronting the West and failed to deal with Iran's struggling economy.

Tehran newspapers and semiofficial news agencies reported unofficial results Saturday showing that no single party would be able to claim outright victory in Friday's elections, partly because of divisions within the conservative faction.

Iran's political scene is broadly split between conservative and pro-reform camps.

Officials have said preliminary results are expected Sunday, with final results coming Monday or later.

The semiofficial Mehr news agency said unofficial results showed candidates who support Ahmadinejad trailing in Tehran's municipal elections behind supporters of Mayor Mohammed Bagher Qalibaf, a moderate conservative.

Former President Hashemi Rafsanjani, considered an Ahmadinejad opponent, was leading in the Assembly of Experts election in Tehran, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported. The assembly is a body of 86 senior clerics that monitors Iran's supreme leader and chooses his successor.

The race for the assembly is dominated by two main rivals: Rafsanjani and Ayatollah Mohammad Taqi Mesbah Yazdi, widely seen as Ahmadinejad's spiritual mentor.

Reformists are hoping the local elections would show there is still public support for their policies. They held the presidency and dominated parliament and local councils in the late 1990s and early 2000s, but hard-liners have dominated in recent years.

Government officials touted Friday's high voter turnout as a "message" to the West.

"Through their impressive turnout under the current sensitive circumstances, the Iranian people sent a clear message to enemies of Iran's development," IRNA quoted Interior Minister Mostafa Pourmohammadi as saying.

The minister was apparently referring to Western critics of Iran's nuclear program. Iran says its program is intended only for generating fuel, but the U.S. and its European allies believe it aims to produce nuclear weapons.

Iran started having council elections after a reform introduced in 1999 by President Mohammed Khatami.

More than 233,000 candidates ran for more than 113,000 council seats in cities, towns and villages across the vast nation on Friday. Local councils elect the mayor and approve community budgets and planning projects.

All municipal council candidates, including some 5,000 women, were vetted by parliamentary committees dominated by hard-liners. The committees disqualified about 10,000 nominees, reports said.

TERRORISM NEWS:

British Pilots Say No To Armed Marshals (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, December 17, 2006

British pilots oppose a proposed change in the United States' visa-waiver program that would require participating countries to provide armed security on U.S.-bound foreign airlines or allow U.S. air marshals to protect such flights.

"Any need to carry weapons on aircraft should be recognized as a failure of the airport security systems," the British Air Line Pilots Association (BALPA) said.

British pilots favor "proper passenger profiling" through a "database of potential terrorists, their known aliases and all their known associates as well as known disruptive passengers," the association said in a statement provided to The Washington Times.

Jarrod Agen, spokesman for the Homeland Security Department, said the program is in the early stages of being revamped to strengthen security, and changes still need to be discussed with foreign governments and approved by Congress.

"This is part of the issue, to have the ability to have federal air marshals on these international flights as part of the visa-waiver program," Mr. Agen said.

The proposal says the United States will ask the 27 countries that participate in the visa-waiver program to cooperate with the air marshal program.

"The United States benefits from the enhanced security of allowing U.S. federal air marshals to operate aboard international flights to and from the United States," it states.

The air marshal program requires personnel be sharpshooters who are able to requalify at a shooting range several times a year and carry Sig Sauer 9mm pistols.

Armed U.S. marshals already are permitted to fly on U.S.-owned airlines overseas. If air marshals in other countries do not meet U.S. standards, one option is to provide U.S. marshals for foreign airlines, Mr. Agen said.

The air marshal initiative is one of several reform measures the Homeland Security Department is pushing for the participating countries, including electronic travel authorizations, a passenger information exchange and stronger airport security standards.

"The United States will equally accept the burden of new security measures and will not require citizens of visa-waiver countries to adopt measures that we are unwilling to undertake ourselves," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said.

The visa-waiver program allows travelers from participating countries to enter the United States without a visa if they have an e-passport with biometrics data, or a machine-readable passport issued before Oct. 26.

"Long-distance flights are in jeopardy" if not protected by armed marshals, former air marshal Robert MacLean said.

"The key to the [Federal Air Marshal Service] being successful is to have [marshals] on as many different flights that can be covered," said Spencer Pickard, an air marshal in Las Vegas.

David Mackett, a commercial airline pilot and president of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance, said there is no alternative to defending aircraft with armed weapons, but that protection by marshals is too costly.

"With 30,000 flights a day, using air marshals, it would cost $14 billion per year and take a force the size of the U.S. Coast Guard -- it simply can't be done," Mr. Mackett said.

Instead, he said Congress should revamp the Federal Flight Deck Officer program to encourage more pilots to seek weapons training.

"Using armed pilots, we could protect every flight in the sky for about $30 million a year because the pilots ask no compensation," Mr. Mackett said.

The BALPA threatened to strike when Congress voted to allow American pilots to carry weapons when flying overseas, and the measure was withdrawn.

"BALPA is indeed still opposed to armed air marshals," spokesman Keith Bill said last week.

Unfinished Business (NYT)

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

Some recent images from George W. Bush's war on terror:

-- Jose Padilla, the supposed dirty bomber, submitting while guards blindfolded him and covered his ears for a walk from his cell to a dentist's chair.

DOJ_NMG_0107260

-- Government lawyers arguing that a prisoner could not testify that he was tortured by American agents, because their brutality was a secret.

-- A judge dismissing another prisoner's challenge to his detention, after a new law stripped basic rights from those Mr. Bush has designated "illegal enemy combatants."

-- The White House scorning lawmakers' attempts to rein in Mr. Bush's illegal domestic spying.

This is the legacy of a Republican Congress that enabled the president's imperial visions of his authority. It leaves the new Democratic majority with much urgent, unfinished business to restore due process, civil liberties and the balance of powers.

Military Tribunals

In the heat of the midterm campaign, Congress was stampeded into establishing military courts for suspected terrorists. The measure improved on Mr. Bush's own kangaroo courts, which were struck down by the Supreme Court. But the bill over all was a national disgrace.

Among the many things that Congress needs to fix are the bill's broad definition of "illegal enemy combatant," which could subject legal United States residents to summary imprisonment; its repudiation of the Geneva Conventions to allow the president to decide what prisoner abuse he will permit; its denial of the basic right of appeal to any noncitizen designated as an "illegal enemy combatant"; and its stripping of the powers of federal courts. The law is also far too lax on the use of coerced evidence and secret evidence. The definition of torture should be changed to reflect civilized norms.

We were greatly encouraged last week when Senator Patrick Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will head the Judiciary Committee, said fixing this bill would be a priority for his panel.

The C.I.A. Prisons

At the insistence of Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, the Military Commissions Act gave legal cover to the Central Intelligence Agency's secret illegal prisons, which house foreign citizens who are often abducted off the streets of their hometowns and brutalized. Congress should at minimum bring these prisons under the rule of law, and make sure that C.I.A. interrogators are given clear instructions comporting with American values. Ideally, Congress would investigate and decide whether this operation has any national security value, and if it doesn't, immediately close the prisons down.

Domestic Spying

Mr. Bush personally authorized the National Security Agency to ignore federal law and eavesdrop on telephone calls and e-mail between the United States and other countries without a warrant. Republican lawmakers have introduced bills that would legalize the program after the fact. The only remotely sensible measure is from Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who has proposed forcing the eavesdropping back under the 1978 surveillance law and giving the administration a bit more flexibility to do electronic surveillance.

But we agree with Senator John Rockefeller IV, the incoming chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, who says more needs to be known about the program before enacting new laws. The administration has stymied Congressional efforts to look into the spying operation, refusing even to turn over the presidential order creating it.

The Intelligence on Iraq

Nearly two and a half years ago, the Senate Intelligence Committee reported on the nation's spy agencies' prewar failure to figure out that there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, and promised to deliver a report on whether Mr. Bush and his team pressured the agencies to cherry-pick or hype evidence — or lied outright to Americans.

Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican head of the intelligence panel, dragged out the second phase of the report, with the aim of killing it. We hope Mr. Rockefeller finishes the job.

That will require heavy lifting on the most important section, comparing the statements of administration officials to what they knew about the intelligence. Mr. Roberts insisted that it cover every public statement by any administration official or member of Congress dating back to 1991. What President Bill Clinton or Senator Hillary Clinton said about Iraq is irrelevant. What matters is what was said by Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney — who ordered the invasion of Iraq — and by their aides. We hope Mr. Rockefeller's committee will sift through the hundreds of statements collected so far and focus on the ones that matter.

Unhappily, this is not an exhaustive list and there will be big fights over many of these issues. But it is not too late to take action. The midterm elections prove that despite all the posturing and fearmongering, the American public has not been blinded or deafened to what this country stands for and the need for truth.

Blocking Justice (WP)

By Emily Bazelon

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

On Wednesday, a federal judge dismissed the habeas corpus petition of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, a detainee at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Latin for "you have the body," habeas corpus allows detainees to ask a court to order their warden to explain the basis for their detention. Hamdan's petition was dismissed because of the Military Commissions Act, which Congress passed last fall to take away the habeas rights of Guantanamo Bay detainees. The MCA is a classic example of "jurisdiction stripping." When the courts hand down rulings that Congress doesn't like, lawmakers sometimes retaliate by trying to take away their power to hear certain kinds of cases, or by strictly limiting what they can do.

That is also the story behind another case this week, in which the Supreme Court reversed a lower court's decision to grant a new trial in a murder case. At the original trial, the victim's family members wore large buttons with his picture on them, which the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ruling violated the rights of the defendant, Mathew Musladin. Musladin brought a habeas corpus petition arguing that the buttons could have prejudiced the jury. Most of the Supreme Court justices agreed that seeing the victim's picture every day didn't exactly dispose the jury to be more fair. But the federal courts could not intervene, they ruled unanimously, because of a 1996 statute that allows them to give habeas relief only when the state courts have gotten the law utterly wrong.

Why does Congress get to take cases away from judges? In his book "America's Constitution," Yale law professor Akhil Reed Amar points out that judges weren't the heroes of the revolution. They were appointed by the British crown. The Constitution's drafters gave Congress weapons to use against the courts without giving judges much to defend themselves with. The president can draw his veto pen if Congress goes after him. The Supreme Court has to find a straight-faced way to declare a law unconstitutional when it weakens the judiciary's powers, Amar writes.

The MCA is such a law. It also may be unconstitutional in some cases. But Hamdan's case isn't one of them, according to last week's ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson. Hamdan's problem is that he's a non-citizen whose contact with the United States has been "involuntary." The MCA stripped Hamdan of the right to habeas corpus granted by federal statute. There are also constitutional rights to habeas. But non-citizens don't have the sort of "substantial connection with our country" that justifies invoking the constitutional right to habeas corpus, the Supreme Court ruled in 1990 in United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez.

If Robertson is right that this ruling applies to Hamdan -- a question the Supreme Court will eventually settle -- hundreds of Guantanamo Bay detainees won't get federal habeas review either.

The limitations of habeas review, in the wake of Congress's tinkering, are on display in cases such as Musladin's. The legislation that Congress passed in 1996 says that the federal courts can't grant a habeas petition that state courts have turned down unless the state court decision "was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court." That is a high bar. The ruling in Musladin's case underscores how high: The 9th Circuit was wrong to spend its time determining whether it was fair for the victim's family to wear the photo buttons in front of the jury. Instead, the federal courts can only look to see whether the Supreme Court has already said it's not fair.

There are reasons for federal judges to defer to state judges -- among them the principle of comity, according to which different branches of government show respect for one another, and the principle of finality, which in this context basically means that you get your habeas crack in the state courts, and that's enough. But habeas review has historically given defendants a chance to air their appeals outside the state system, with its giant caseloads and sometimes rushed rulings. Congress's 1996 habeas law has largely choked off this avenue. Consider Justice Anthony M. Kennedy's concurrence in Musladin's appeal. "Buttons proclaiming a message relevant to the case ought to be prohibited as a matter of course," he wrote, and called for a new rule to make it so -- in a future case. In other words, too late for Mathew Musladin.

If Musladin's predicament doesn't move you, consider that of Paul Gregory House. Twenty years ago, a Tennessee jury convicted him of a woman's murder after FBI testing appeared to show his semen on her clothing and her blood on his jeans. He was sentenced to death.

Then DNA testing showed that the semen on the victim's clothes came from her husband, and that the blood on House's jeans came from autopsy samples that spilled in the crime lab. Whoops. But House still had a big problem: His claims of innocence were barred by state procedural rules. Would the federal courts pry open the doors?

It was hardly a slam-dunk. Last June, in a dissent by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., four justices said that the courts need not reconsider House's appeal, because he had not proved his innocence. But five justices said that House should get his second day in court because he had shown that it was likely that no reasonable juror would find him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

Even so, House doesn't get out of prison, nor is he spared the death penalty. He doesn't automatically get a new trial. Because of the 1996 habeas law, he has to plunge back into the procedural thicket.

Letting Congress strip the courts of the authority to hear certain claims or cases means giving more power to the people, who can elect their lawmakers but not their federal judges. From a pre-revolutionary vantage point, that made sense. But these days it's more often judges whom we can count on, if we can count on anyone, to stand up for the procedural rights of murder defendants and Guantanamo Bay detainees. Should Congress be able to block them?

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Showdown Looms Over Domestic Spying (AP)

By David Kravets

AP, December 16, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO --Federal agents continue to eavesdrop on Americans' electronic communications without warrants a year after President Bush confirmed the practice, and experts say a new Congress' efforts to limit the program could trigger a constitutional showdown.

High-ranking Democrats set to take control of both chambers are mulling ways to curb the program Bush secretly authorized a month after the Sept. 11 attacks. The White House argues the Constitution gives the president wartime powers to eavesdrop that he wouldn't have during times of peace.

"As a practical matter, the president can do whatever he wants as long as he has the capacity and executive branch officials to do it," said Carl Tobias, a legal scholar at the University of Richmond in Virginia.

Lawmakers could impeach or withhold funding, or quash judicial nominations, among other measures.

The president, however, can veto legislation, including a law demanding the National Security Agency obtain warrants before monitoring communications. Such a veto would force Congress to muster a two-thirds vote to override.

"He could take the position he doesn't have to comply with whatever a new Congress says," said Vikram Amar, a law professor at the University of California, Hastings, and a former Supreme Court clerk.

Douglas Kmiec, a former Justice Department official under former presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush, speculated the younger Bush would assert executive authority to continue eavesdropping in the face of new legislation -- perhaps leaving the Supreme Court as the final arbiter.

"He has as much a constitutional obligation to assert himself, just as much as Congress does," Kmiec said. "We do need an arbitrator, an interpreter. That's what the courts, the third branch of government, was intended to be."

On Dec. 17, 2005, Bush publicly acknowledged for the first time he had authorized the NSA to monitor, without approval from a judge, phone calls and e-mails that come into or originate in the U.S. and involve people the government suspects of having terrorist links.

Bush said he had no intention of halting what he called a "vital tool" in the war on terror.

When the Republican-controlled Congress adjourned last week, it left the spying program unchecked.

The next move falls to the Democrats who take control in January and are considering a proposal to demands Bush get warrants and others lengthening the time between surveillance and when a warrant must be obtained.

A spokesman for Sen. Harry Reid, the incoming Senate majority leader from Nevada, said the eavesdropping issue "is something he expects to tackle early next year."

"He doesn't believe in giving the president a blank check to listen to the phone conversations of millions of Americans," spokesman Jim Manley said.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Nancy Pelosi, the San Francisco Democrat who will become House speaker, said eavesdropping legislation was under consideration and hearings on the topic were likely early next year.

Decisions are pending in dozens of lawsuits challenging the program.

The Cincinnati-based 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, the highest court squarely confronted with the issue so far, is to hear the American Civil Liberties Union's challenge Jan. 31. One stop short of the Supreme Court, the appeals court will review a Detroit judge's ruling that the program was unconstitutional.

The case is American Civil Liberties Union v. National Security Agency, 06-2095.

Padilla Terror Case Gets Closer Look (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — A federal judge in Miami will soon make one of the most important rulings in the Bush administration's war on terrorism and decide whether to publicly explore evidence that an accused terrorist was brutally mistreated for years inside a one-man isolation cell.

DOJ_NMG_0107263

The allegations involve Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen once portrayed as one of the most dangerous Al Qaeda operatives ever arrested. Padilla's lawyers have asked U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke to set him free because of the abuse they say he suffered.

Though federal judges rarely dismiss criminal charges before trial, the allegations are so extreme that they may prompt Cooke to hold a pretrial hearing in what would be the first public court examination into how detainees were handled after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Padilla's lawyers also hope to shut down his case by proving that his incarceration as an "enemy combatant" at a Navy brig for more than three years without charges had left him incompetent to stand trial.

Any hearing before the trial, scheduled for next month, could prove explosive, as defense lawyers are leaning toward putting Padilla on the witness stand. That too would be a first — a Sept. 11-era detainee testifying about his treatment.

He has told his lawyers and mental-health experts that he was held without sunlight, adequate food or a clock, and was injected with truth-serum drugs to coerce him to talk. At times, he said, his wrists and torso were chained to the cell floor.

Further heightening the drama is a defense request to question military officials about conditions at the brig. Some officials have expressed concerns in written reports that Padilla and two other enemy combatants held in the brig outside Charleston, S.C., were abused.

'No merit whatsoever'

Federal prosecutors repeatedly have denied that Padilla was mistreated. "Mr. Padilla's allegations of torture have no merit whatsoever," prosecutors said in court filings.

Padilla was arrested in 2002 on suspicion of trying to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the U.S. The Department of Justice, led by then-Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft, castigated Padilla as a major terrorist menace but eventually scaled back its assessment and filed lesser charges of conspiracy.

Prosecutors say they can prove he was part of a "North American terror support cell" that sent money and supplies to terrorists in Bosnia and Chechnya. The government is urging the judge to deny Padilla's dismissal request — without airing the claims in a court hearing.

The judge, a former federal prosecutor and a defense lawyer appointed to the bench by President Bush, has scheduled a meeting Monday with both sides, and could rule then on the torture and competency questions.

Should she grant a hearing into the allegations, that would mark a major victory for criminal defense lawyers and human rights activists who have said the administration routinely violated the constitutional rights of detainees arrested after the 2001 terrorist attacks on New York and the Pentagon.

"This is a very fair judge," said Neal Sonnett, a Miami attorney who chaired an American Bar Assn. task force on enemy combatants. "She's very bright. She knows the law very well. And I think this is the kind of case in which the court understands that the world is watching."

Chances of dismissal

Sonnett and other legal experts noted that dismissal motions seldom are granted because they deny prosecutors the chance to put on their case.

"A lot of bad things were probably done to Mr. Padilla," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia who has monitored many of the terrorism cases. "But that doesn't mean you automatically get a dismissal."

Padilla, 36, was born in Brooklyn, raised in Chicago and, after embracing Islam in South Florida, moved to Egypt where he allegedly became involved with terrorist groups.

He was taken into custody in May 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport after stepping off a plane from Zurich. Law enforcement officials said his arrest broke up a plot in which Padilla was sent back to attack targets in the U.S.

In June 2002, Bush designated him an "enemy combatant," and the military put him in the Navy brig. In November 2005, he was charged with aiding terrorists abroad. Last January, he was moved to a federal jail in Miami to await trial. He was moved into the federal system before the Supreme Court could rule on whether a U.S. citizen could be indefinitely detained as an enemy combatant.

Andrew Patel of New York, one of the defense lawyers, said the defense was not allowed into the brig until March 2004, only to discover that Padilla was alone in a two-tiered wing of 10 cells.

"Mr. Padilla was the only person housed in that unit," Patel said. "He had no contact with other human beings."

Patel said the cell windows were blocked; no natural light entered the 9-by-7 space. There was no mirror, no clock, no calendar: just a slot in the door for food and a steel platform for a bed.

Sometimes Padilla suffered deep chest pains and feared a heart attack. "He could neither breathe nor move," Patel said.

Another time, Patel said, Padilla smelled a "terrible odor" and believed that guards had pumped a noxious gas into the cell.

DOJ_NMG_0107264

He was often kept awake by loud noises or low temperatures, Patel said. Other times, he says, he was given a truth serum that lawyers said they believed was some form of LSD or PCP.

He coughed up blood, Patel said. He repeatedly scratched the back of his hand. He rapidly blinked his eyes. Goose bumps dotted his arms and neck.

Sometimes he sat bolt upright in his chair, as "if he had been stuck by a cattle prod." He showed little emotion about his trial, Patel said, seeming more like "a piece of furniture."

When Patel tried to discuss the case, he said, Padilla would beg off. "Please, please, please," he would say, fearful that if he helped his lawyers, he would be returned to the brig and solitary confinement.

Observations from experts

Dr. Angela Hegarty, a New York psychiatrist who examined Padilla for the defense over five days in June and September, told the judge the prisoner often "begged his guards not to put him in the cage."

She said Padilla could not understand that his trial was drawing near. "He has large memory gaps related to his detention, and he is unable to place events in chronological order," she said.

She concluded that Padilla, whom she said believed he was going to die during his detention, is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. "Mr. Padilla," she said, "periodically concludes that no matter what, win or lose, he will be going back to the brig, where he will die."

The defense team filed a new report Wednesday from Patricia Zapf, a clinical psychologist in New York, who examined Padilla twice in October. She concluded he suffered from depression and paranoia, and had "difficulty with memory, attention and concentration."

She said he told her that he did not want to testify — that he feared it would be too much like what he underwent during interrogations. Padilla "appears to be in a fragile psychological state," Zapf concluded.

Though it is not clear whether the government has had its own experts examine Padilla to counter what the defense has learned, prosecutors have insisted Padilla was never harmed.

"The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture — allegations made without support and without citing a shred" of evidence in court, they told the judge in court filings. They declined to discuss the case outside of the courtroom.

Government lawyers also told the judge that she should rule on Padilla's competency before deciding whether to hold a hearing into the torture allegations — pretrial skirmishing that could delay the long-awaited trial.

Indeed, much is weighing on the judge. Cooke, 52, began her career as a Legal Aid attorney and public defender in Michigan and worked through most of the 1990s in the U.S. attorney's office in Miami. Bush appointed her to the federal bench in November 2003; she was confirmed the following May.

She has proved decisive in the Padilla matter already, ruling in August that there were overlapping charges filed against him. She dismissed the most serious conspiracy charge, which could have brought a life sentence, and left intact two counts that could get Padilla 20 years for providing material support to terrorists.

Twenty years is far less than what the government wants; they have appealed her decision.

WAR NEWS:

Go Big, Go Long, Go Wide: Bush's No-exit Options For Iraq (AP)

AP, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON- President Bush has taken the most dramatic options off the table as he tries to change direction in Iraq, leaving him with a list of modest military and diplomatic moves to announce in the new year.

Bush probably will ignore the boldest suggestions from a bipartisan commission that studied U.S. options in Iraq, adopting some of the group's lesser prescriptions alongside those drafted by his civilian and military advisers.

The White House National Security Council has compiled recommendations from several agencies as the administration's internal reassessment of Iraq policy nears an end. Bush plans to address the nation in early January, two months after heavy Republican losses in congressional elections.

A look at some of the president's options:

On the military front, there are various ways to "go big," by adding 10,000 to 20,000 troops to the approximately 135,000 U.S. forces in Iraq. Bush has gotten competing advice about how many troops to add, whether to define their mission as temporary or long term and whether to add troops at all.

DOJ_NMG_0107265

Some military officers doubt that the results from any increase would be worth the damage to the Army's readiness. Others advocate adding forces and launching an offensive against Shiite militia leader Muqtada al-Sadr while increasing industrial and economic aid to civilians.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., has said the U.S. should send five to 10 more brigades of combat soldiers, translating to 15,000 to 30,000 additional troops. The current U.S. force includes about 15 combat brigades made up of 50,000 to 60,000 soldiers. Bush has been told that adding up to 20,000 troops would be fairly easy to arrange and a short-term surge of up to 50,000 could be done with difficulty.

The additional troops would be assigned primarily in Baghdad, where sectarian killing has surged out of control in the past 10 months. Some could go to Anbar province, where U.S. forces have been unable to dislodge the Sunni-led anti-government insurgency.

Another element of the "go big" idea is increasing the total size of the military. The chiefs of the Army and Marine Corps want to expand the size of their services, although departing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld opposed it. He cited an estimated cost of $1.2 billion a year for each 10,000 extra troops. The Army also wants the ability to mobilize Guard and Reserve troops more frequently than is now allowed; some in Congress are likely to resist such a change.

Bush probably will reject the Iraq Study Group's recommendation to pull back most combat forces by early 2008. Proposals before him include integrating or embedding more U.S. advisers in Iraqi Army units to provide guidance on tactics and leadership. The long-term goal would be a shift away from a primarily combat role, which some advisers say consigns U.S. forces to a defensive posture as they await the next attack by insurgents.

No matter how it is calibrated, this "go long" shift would reinforce the administration's recognition that U.S. troops will be in Iraq for years to come. Bush has rejected any suggestion for a quick withdrawal of U.S. forces, as some lawmakers recommend, and probably will not set a firm exit timetable. He is likely to endorse the basic idea recommended by the commission and others to condition at least some U.S. military and economic engagement to the performance of Iraq's government. Economic steps could include a significant jobs program. Unemployment in Iraq is estimated at between 20 percent and 60 percent.

Diplomatic options include expanding the U.S. outreach to various centers of power in Iraq and engaging Iraq's neighbors to help in a more vigorous and formal way - the "go wide" strategy. Bush probably will endorse elements of this approach while ruling out a new overture to U.S. adversaries Iran and Syria.

The State Department has recommended the U.S. keep supporting the shaky government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki but "diversify our portfolio," as one official put it. Seeking common ground with leaders in and out of government would help protect U.S. interests if, for example, al-Maliki were to lose power.

The starkest choice for diplomacy is one Bush is almost certain to reject: stop trying to recruit greater Sunni participation in a unified government and cast U.S. fortunes with the Shiite and Kurdish majority. Sunnis make up about 20 percent of the population but are blamed for fanning insurgent violence that accounts for most U.S. casualties.

A competing plan would woo the Sunni elite by guaranteeing them a share of oil revenue and reversing the previous policy of "de-Baathification," which purged ex-members of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led Baathist rule from the top layers of government institutions.

Bush is weighing plans for a more structured network of Arab nations with a goal of clamping down on the violence in Iraq. This regional forum could become an expanded version of an existing State Department-backed initiative, offering a framework for countries to discuss Iraq and meet with Iraqi leaders.

Such a partnership presumably would have to include Iran and Syria. Those countries, which share borders with Iraq, hold great influence inside Iraq. U.S. diplomats would participate alongside Iranian and Syrian representatives but Bush probably will not endorse direct negotiations with them, as the Iraq Study Group recommended.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said both nations would probably use direct talks to seek unacceptable "compensation" from the United States. If Iran and Syria see it as in their interest to help Iraq they will do so on their own, she suggested to reporters last week.

Bush also is likely to endorse a renewed effort to resolve other Middle East conflicts as a means to an end in Iraq.

Stubborn Or Stalwart, Bush Is Loath To Budge (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

In the late 19th century, the queen of England sent the president of the United States a desk made from the timbers of a decommissioned ship, the HMS Resolute. Almost every occupant of the White House since then has made the Resolute his desk. Perhaps more than most, President Bush has taken its name to heart.

DOJ_NMG_0107266

But now, as Bush rethinks his strategy in Iraq and approaches one of the most fateful moments of his presidency, he confronts difficult questions: At what point does determination to a cause become self-defeating folly? Can he change direction in a meaningful way without sacrificing principle?

For Bush, this is a tension that goes to the heart of his political identity and governing style. He captured and retained the presidency in part by portraying two successive Democratic opponents as finger-in-the-wind politicians without a core set of beliefs. The notion of bending to critics or even popular will cuts against his grain. Yet it is also true that at key moments in his career, Bush has been willing to abandon his position and shift gears dramatically.

No position has been more central to Bush's leadership than his decision to invade Iraq in 2003 and his unyielding defense of his conduct of the war ever since. But he went out of his way last week to give the appearance of a man genuinely seeking new ideas as he shuffled between the White House, the State Department and the Pentagon's ultra-secure "tank," and then delayed making a decision while he and his team debated the options.

"I think George W. Bush is a totally pragmatic politician," said former senator Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.), a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recommended a new course. "He's going to do outreach. . . . He is a total realist. He knows that the solid, march-in-step Republicans, at least in the House, are gone. . . . Now his legacy depends on the national interest, not partisanship."

Others don't buy it. On its Web site last week, the Democratic National Committee said Bush could be "the most stubborn man on Earth" for not immediately embracing the study group's plan. Critics predicted that any new strategy he announces after the holidays will be little more than a dressed-up version of "stay the course." And a recent Washington Post-ABC News poll found that 66 percent of Americans do not think Bush is willing to change his policies in Iraq.

"I just don't believe that this president, with this vice president whispering in his ear every moment, is oriented to change," said retired Col. Larry Wilkerson, who was chief of staff to Secretary of State Colin L. Powell in Bush's first term. "And even if he were, I don't believe his administration is capable of implementing change."

Lawrence J. Korb, a former Pentagon official under President Ronald Reagan, agreed. "When it comes to Iraq, he has basically confused stubbornness with steadfastness," said Korb, who is now at the liberal Center for American Progress. "I think he believes that regardless of what other people say, if he simply stays the course, he'll be eventually proved right. But what he fails to see is the current course isn't working and he has options."

The perception of Bush as unusually stubborn has defined his tenure to some extent, much to the consternation of adversaries and sometimes even allies. But Bush was deeply influenced by the fate of his father, whose decision to break his no-new-taxes pledge as president helped doom his reelection. The lesson: Stick to decisions regardless of shifts in political winds.

The seemingly unshakeable confidence in the rightness of his positions has helped the current president weather political storms that might overwhelm others. For a man who presides over an unpopular war, just lost Congress and faces a final two years with constrained options, Bush gives little sign of self-pity. At holiday parties for friends and family in recent days, he has found himself bucking up others depressed by the turn in his political fortunes. "Don't worry, it's not as bad as it looks," he told one friend visiting the White House. "There's a lot we can get done."

The friend, who shared the private moments on the condition of anonymity, was struck by how upbeat Bush seemed. "But he's not a fool," the friend added. "He knows how bad all this is, trust me. There is some resignation that this is where he finds himself. I know he's got a lot of second thoughts about how he got there. Anybody would."

Bush decided a long time ago that expressing second thoughts publicly would be seen as a sign of weakness, according to some close to him. "I'm oftentimes asked about, 'Well, you're stubborn,' and all this," Bush told a group of conservative journalists in September. "If you believe in a strategy, in Washington, D.C., you've got to stick to that strategy, see? People want you to change. It's tactics that shift, but the strategic vision has not, and will not, shift."

Despite Bush's reputation as unbending, he has reversed himself before in the interest of expediency. During battles over education legislation or funds for religious charities, he changed key positions. Perhaps the most notable example was the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, which he strongly resisted until embracing the idea as if it were his own.

"He always starts out by stressing his maximum position and then doesn't budge until he absolutely has to," said Bruce Buchanan, a professor at the University of Texas at Austin who has watched Bush's career for years. "He could conceivably be doing that right now."

Advisers reject the idea that Bush never changes. " 'Stubborn' is just a convenient characterization that's not really accurate," said Mark McKinnon, his political strategist. McKinnon recalled how Bush pivoted after losing the New Hampshire primary in 2000. "That was a serious blow, and we had to really redirect the campaign strategically. He recognized that we had to amend our strategy, and we did."

John Bridgeland, Bush's former domestic policy adviser, said the president is more interested in other points of view than people think he is. He drills aides with questions that challenge even his own beliefs. "He's like a boxer, and he'll hit you right between the eyes with a really tough question," Bridgeland said. "And if you don't have a really good answer, he'll tell you you're losing altitude."

Still, history shows that Bush does not change easily or quickly. For years, he ignored calls to fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, even when the idea was endorsed by his own top aides. He waited to oust Rumsfeld until the day after midterm elections handed Congress to Democrats -- too little, too late, in the minds of Republicans who grumbled that he cost them their majorities. Robert M. Gates will take over the Pentagon tomorrow with different views about how to proceed. The question is whether Bush will heed him.

"He changes his mind all the time, as any thinking human being would," said David Frum, a former Bush speechwriter and sometime critic. "He probably changes his mind somewhat less than other politicians do, but he's not set in concrete." Having said that, Frum said Iraq is too critical to waver on. "A lot of people want him to change his mind on the central decision of his presidency. And on that, he hasn't, he shouldn't, and he won't."

Ex-Defense Chief Warns On Iraq Direction (WP/AP)

The Washington Post/AP, December 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former Defense Secretary William Perry, a member of the Iraq Study Group, said Saturday that Iraq could turn into a "quagmire" if the Bush administration fails to change strategy.

Perry, who led the Pentagon under President Clinton, delivered the Democratic Party's weekly radio address.

Referring to the Vietnam War, Perry said: "The term 'quagmire' recalls one of the saddest periods in American history, which we do not want to relive. But I believe that is likely to happen if we 'stay the course' in Iraq."

Perry reiterated the recommendations of last week's report from the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton.

"We need to accelerate the training of Iraqi army and police forces," Perry said. "We need to begin to pull out U.S. combat brigades, with the goal of having all except rapid-reaction forces out by first quarter of 2008. ... We need to push friendly regional powers to assist. We need to put pressure on unfriendly regional powers to stop arming militias and fomenting violence. And finally, we need to invigorate the Israeli-Palestinian peace process."

President Bush has been meeting over the last week with current and former military leaders _ as well as advisers from other parts of the government _ to assess possible new strategies for the Iraq war. But he has made it clear he will not map out a new war strategy until his new defense secretary, Robert Gates, has taken over and offered his counsel.

The Iraq Study Group report was critical of just about every aspect of the administration's war policies. Bush welcomed some of its recommendations but dismissed others, particularly the call for withdrawing a substantial number of U.S. troops over the next year.

Perry said he believed the report "will frame the debate in our country this coming year. And it will demonstrate that it is possible, even in the poisonous political climate that now exists, to address important national problems in a truly bipartisan manner."

Roadside Bombs Kill Troops At Highest Rate Of Iraq War (BOS)

By Bryan Bender

The Boston Globe, December 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- US troops in Iraq are dying in roadside bombings at a higher rate than any period since the war began -- some in follow-up attacks in the same locations -- but commanders still have no effective means to monitor the deadliest routes for patrols, according to Pentagon officials and documents.

Military deaths from roadside bombs have hit an all-time high in recent months: In October, 53 US troops died from improvised explosive devices, while in November, 49 troop deaths were blamed on so-called IEDs -- the second and third highest monthly tolls of the war, official statistics and casualty reports show.

That is far higher than the overall monthly average of 28 IED-related deaths since July 2003, when the data were first compiled. And in the three previous months, between 22 and 29 soldiers and Marines died from roadside bombs.

But the Pentagon office charged with solving the problem is still a step behind the bombers.

Officials at the Joint IED Defeat Organization admit that most of the billions of dollars they get each year goes to developing high-tech gear to detect or disarm bombs rather than addressing the root of the problem: finding out where the bombs come from and who is planting them.

DOJ_NMG_0107268

"The enemy has the ability to freely fabricate IED and car bombs, plant and set ambushes, rocket, mortar and IED attacks, and have the recruits and resources crossing borders to reinforce and resupply the insurgent forces undetected," according to a recent briefing prepared for top Pentagon officials responsible for counter-insurgency strategy.

December is on track to become the deadliest month of all. According to news reports, 53 soldiers died as of Dec. 16; Pentagon data indicates that roughly 60 percent of all casualties this month came from roadside bombings. Throughout much of the war, IEDs have caused about half of all US combat deaths in Iraq, according to a September study by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service. .

That has spurred outrage among military officers, Pentagon contractors, and members of Congress. They charge that, after spending billions of taxpayer dollars to address the problem there is still virtually no solid intelligence on how the bombers operate.

Senator Gordon Smith , a Republican from Oregon who had been a longtime supporter of the Iraq war, put it bluntly in his critique of the Iraq war on the Senate floor last week:

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day. That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore."

The Joint IED Defeat Organization, which had been hailed as the "Manhattan Project" of the roadside bomb problem, "has been a disaster," said Ed O'Connell , a counter-insurgency specialist at the government-funded Rand Corporation in Santa Monica, Calif. , who has advised US commanders in Iraq.

For its part, the organization claims some progress. They say that the percentage of bombs that are disarmed or detonated before they can kill or maim has remained "stable and consistent" over the past 18 months, and they say there are now fewer casualties per IED attack.

The "vast majority" of IEDs are disarmed or otherwise rendered harmless, the office said in a statement.

But officials acknowledged that the number of roadside bombings has "risen dramatically over the last two years," though they would not provide statistics.

That increase has confounded the military and raised questions about whether gathering intelligence on the bombers should be the office's top priority. The Pentagon briefing paper, provided by a defense contractor to the Globe, concluded that there is "an urgent need" in both Iraq and Afghanistan for "persistent surveillance" to track the bombers and neutralize the IEDs.

Congress this fall set aside $100 million to acquire new aircraft for what the military calls "wide field of view" surveillance: watching particularly active areas and intercepting the bombers. The goal would be to make it "a suicide mission" for insurgents to plant a bomb, according to a report attached to the 2007 Defense Authorization Bill.

Cheap and lethal, roadside bombs are the tactic of choice for both Sunni and Shia Muslim insurgent groups opposed to the US military presence. Authorities believe some insurgents are getting supplies and training from Iran and the Lebanese militant group Hezbollah.

Most of the explosives, US officials say, are assembled with munitions left over from Saddam Hussein's arsenal, while others are built from explosives smuggled across Iraq's porous borders. They are triggered by a variety of inexpensive means, including trip wires, cellphones, and household timers, and the insurgents have created increasingly sophisticated bombs to stay a step ahead of US countermeasures.

But in its detailed assessment of the Iraq war, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group concluded that, nearly four years into the war, US forces know little about insurgent operations.

And, after spending almost $2 billion this year on IED countermeasures, according to the study group, the White House "has not put forward a request to invest comparable resources in trying to understand the people who fabricate, plant and explode those devices."

For its part, the IED office told the Globe that it spends 63 percent of its budget on ways to "defeat the device," while only 30 percent goes to attacking "the network" that creates and plants the bombs. The rest of its budget is spent on new training methods for US troops operating in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But military specialists say that the Pentagon needs to pay more attention to dissecting the "kill chain" -- the source of the bomb components, who made the bomb, and who planted it.

"We can't even detect their explosives," said Loren Thompson , a military specialist at the Lexington Institution, an Arlington, Va., think tank that supports strong military preparedness. "We don't have the resources to police or survey every road. The IED problem is a case study of how military transformation has failed.

"It sounds like a threat where good intelligence and good surveillance would make a big difference," she said. "But we don't seem to be able to develop those things."

DOJ_NMG_0107269

That lack of intelligence, however, is not only blamed on the IED office but also on commanders in the field, who some specialists say aren't forthcoming about the extent of the problem.

A previously unpublicized assessment generated by the Republican staff of the House Armed Services Committee and obtained by the Globe effectively accused the generals of hedging the truth when Congress asks what they need to protect the troops.

The 2005 congressional report said that on numerous occasions, generals assured lawmakers that they have "complete [intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance] coverage over the respective theater battlespace; and in effect, 'they get everything.' " That has repeatedly been proven wrong, it said.

"The assumption then has always been that the troops also 'get everything' in the way of warning and intelligence, but this has not been the case," the report said. "The fact that the enemy still has the ability to go out at night and set dozens of IEDs, mine and cut pipelines, and have hundreds of new recruits coming in to join and reinforce the insurgent forces undetected gives testament to the fact that something is gravely wrong."

Ties That Bind Iraqi Forces Break Easily (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

KARMAH, IRAQ — As U.S. forces train Iraqis to take more responsibility in fighting insurgents in Al Anbar province, they say that leadership in the Iraqis' enlisted ranks remains in short supply.

An Iraqi army unit here sagged after the death of one of its soldiers, whom Marines nicknamed Sgt. Barnes after a hard-nosed character in the movie "Platoon." And Marines say the unit's combat effectiveness fell apart after a sergeant they respected was killed by a roadside bomb.

"As long as they have one or two guys who know what they're doing, the rest follow them," said Marine Lance Cpl. Andrew Gendron, 20.

Maj. Sean Riordan, the executive officer of the Marines' 2nd Battalion, 8th Regiment, speaks Arabic and has worked with the armies of Kuwait, Oman, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates. The problem facing the Iraqis is common to many armies in the Arab world, he said.

"They do not have a very broad-based approach to decision-making," Riordan said. "They are particularly dependent on strong, forceful leaders, and when they lose one, they have trouble continuing."

Master Sgt. Daniel Masters, 44, a 21-year Marine veteran, said armies of the former Soviet bloc faced similar problems because of centralized decision-making. Many of the officers in former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's army were trained by the Soviets.

Masters is in charge of the Marine contingent at a tiny, ramshackle compound for Iraqi police and soldiers and Marines in this farming community outside Fallouja. The police fled recently after threats from insurgents, and the soldiers were transferred elsewhere. Masters hopes they will return.

A year ago the Marine Corps changed its priorities to emphasize the training of Iraqi security forces. At this station, Marines and Iraqi soldiers went on joint missions but details often had to be withheld from the Iraqis for fear they would inform the insurgents.

"You want to trust them, but you really can't," said Lance Cpl. Robert Warren, 20.

First Lt. Scott Burlison, 38, said he had seen signs that Iraqi troops were improving, but that the soldiers needed better equipment and logistical support from the central government in Baghdad.

The effort to work with Iraqi forces also has helped improve relations with the local population, he said.

"They're not so much negative around here as neutral to us, which is better than negative," he said. "Nobody expects them to be our best friends."

First Sgt. Paul Archie, 37, said the hardscrabble upbringing of many of the Iraqi soldiers has served them well, but that they need better leadership.

"They've grown up fighting. For them it's nothing new to see an AK-47," he said. "They're not cowards."

One soldier who had earned the Marines' trust was named Saddam Hussein. He was an Iraqi special forces sergeant who fought against the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, and later cooperated with the Americans. He was killed by a roadside bomb.

The Marines appear more distant from the Iraqi police. While the army is mostly composed of Shiites, the police, recruited locally, are nearly all Sunni Arabs.

Police suspected of ties to the Sunni-led insurgency were recently purged by the government. A few days later one former police officer from Karmah was shot and killed by a Marine while planting a roadside bomb in nearby Saqlawiya.

DOJ_NMG_0107270

The police stationed here fled after a campaign of intimidation by insurgents. Several had been killed. Insurgents warned the local gas station not to sell them gas for their vehicles.

"Twenty of them just turned in their badges and walked away — left their weapons and walked," said Cpl. Evan Wicha, 23. In other areas, there have been clashes between police and Iraqi soldiers.

In Karmah and elsewhere, Marines are incredulous at the idea of being able to simply quit and go home. In an informal discussion, someone joked that such a military unit was ideal.

"Not if they're your allies," another responded.

Legal System In Iraq Staggers Beneath The Weight Of War (NYT)

By Michael Moss

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

BAGHDAD — In a cavernous room that once displayed gifts given to Saddam Hussein, eight men in yellow prison garb sat on the floor facing the wall, guarded by two American soldiers.

Among them was Abdulla Sultan Khalaf, a Ministry of Industry employee seized by American troops who said they found 10 blasting caps and 100 sticks of TNT. When his name was called, he stood, walked into a cagelike defendant's box and peered over the wooden slats at a panel of three Iraqi judges of the central court.

The judges reviewed evidence prepared by an American military lawyer — testimony from two soldiers, photographs and a sketch of the scene.

The evidence went largely unchallenged, because Mr. Khalaf had no lawyer. The judges appointed one, but Mr. Khalaf had no chance to speak with him. Mr. Khalaf told the judges that the soldiers were probably chasing a rogue nephew and denied that the explosives were his or ever in his house. "Let me examine the pictures," he insisted. The judges ignored him. His lawyer said nothing, beyond declaring Mr. Khalaf's innocence. The trial lasted 15 minutes.

The judges conducted six trials of similar length and depth before lunch, then deliberated for four minutes. Five defendants were found guilty; one was acquitted. "The evidence is enough," Judge Saeb Khorsheed Ahmed said in convicting Mr. Khalaf. "Thirty years."

The United States established the Central Criminal Court of Iraq three years ago, envisioning it as a pillar of a new democracy. But like the faltering effort to create effective Iraqi security forces, the system for detaining, charging and trying suspects has instead become another weak link in the rule of law in Iraq, according to an examination of the justice system by The New York Times.

The stakes are rising. The court has begun sentencing American-held detainees to death by hanging, 14 this year.

Almost every aspect of the judicial system is lacking, poorly serving not just detainees but also Iraqi citizens and troops trying to maintain order.

Soldiers who have little if any training in gathering evidence or sorting the guilty from the innocent are left to decide whom to detain. The military conducts reviews to decide whom to release, yet neither Iraqi detainees nor defense lawyers are allowed to attend, according to military documents and interviews.

Tens of thousands of detainees have been released by the Americans, often under political pressure from the Iraqis, but American soldiers complain they are apprehending many dangerous insurgents again and again. At the same time, detainees are held for long periods by the Americans without being charged, in some instances for as long as two years.

Even detainees who are formally charged and brought to the Iraqi court have little ability to develop a defense against evidence collected by American lawyers and soldiers. Most defense lawyers are appointed by the court and paid $15 per case. Even if they are so inclined, they are largely unable to gather evidence because of the threat of violence. One American lawyer said that in 100 cases he handled, not one defense lawyer had introduced evidence or witnesses.

The central court resembles the narrow end of a funnel crowded with suspects captured by American and Iraqi forces. No figures are available on prisoners held by Iraqis, but the Americans have held about 61,500 over the past three years and are now holding 14,000, military officials say. Roughly 3,000 have been charged and tried in the Iraqi court.

The court acquits nearly half of the defendants, but both Americans and Iraqis involved in the process say that political interference, threats from militants and the judges' fear for their lives weigh heavily in many verdicts. The military has found housing in the protected Green Zone for only 12 of the 30 judges on the criminal court. The others commute to work.

"The most fundamental thing that we need to do in Iraq is establish the rule of law," said Mark Waller, an Air Force Reserve major and deputy district attorney in Colorado, who spent four months this year in Baghdad helping to prosecute detainees. "It's the cornerstone of a civilization. Without it you have anarchy. And we are falling short."

Beyond the scandal at Abu Ghraib and the trial of Mr. Hussein, the system of holding and prosecuting detainees in Iraq has largely escaped public scrutiny. The day-to-day details of these government operations emerged from interviews with American and Iraqi officials, former detainees, a review of military records and a visit to proceedings in the Iraqi court normally closed to the public.

A classified Pentagon assessment completed in June of the American effort to strengthen Iraqi justice found one sign of progress: the prosecution of former senior government officials. Everything else, from training judges to building court capacity to minimizing civil rights abuses by Iraqi security forces, had fallen behind, according to the assessment by the National Security Council.

"Iraq's judiciary is technically independent but unable and unwilling to assert itself or provide a balance to Iraq's powerful political parties," it said. "The criminal justice system is overloaded and lacks the capacity to consistently process those arrested and/or detained."

Even though the American military helps to prosecute cases in the court, it does not always release detainees whose cases are dismissed, officials acknowledged in interviews. Maj. Gen. John D. Gardner, the commander of American detainee operations, orders those defendants held if the military believes they remain a threat. According to military officials, this has happened approximately 60 times, or in about 4 percent of the dismissed cases.

American officials said that within the confines of the nascent Iraqi justice system they were striving to protect American troops, while promoting due process. "Our goal is to balance detaining the people who are the real threats, and releasing those who are not, and that's a fine line," General Gardner said.

The justice system is most troubling for people like Intisar Jaafar. Her 29-year-old son, Laith al-Ani, was taken from his home in Baghdad by American troops in October 2004 in a search for weapons his mother said they never found. The military said he was a "security detainee" but would not elaborate.

Mr. Ani, a women's clothing merchant, is being held at Camp Bucca in the desert of southern Iraq, his relatives said. They have made the daylong trip to visit him, but it brought them no more information about when he might be charged, released or brought to court.

In a recent letter he drew a caged heart reaching out to his wife and two children, and wrote, "I hope I can be dust in the storms of Bucca so that I can reach you."

A Grand Vision

At 9 a.m. on a recent Monday, two United States Army trucks guarded by seven Humvees pulled to a halt in central Baghdad, just outside the protected Green Zone.

The soldiers fanned out with their rifles ready as a man in a black hood and yellow prison garb emerged, followed by more than 30 others, their hands and feet shackled.

The men shuffled down two flights of stairs into the Central Criminal Court.

The courthouse did not exist before the war, with most criminal cases left to provincial judges. In 2003, the Bush administration decided Iraq also needed a central court — like the American federal judiciary — for major national crimes like significant corruption or violence.

The vision was grand.

"Evil doers will face justice in honest and fair Iraqi courts," L. Paul Bremer III, the administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority, said in an address to the Iraqi people in November 2003.

Zuhair Maliky, an Iraqi lawyer tapped by the Americans as a chief judge, said: "It was to be a model for all of the courts around the country, where students would come to read the records and learn how courts work. There was to be a library, a conference room where judges would give lectures, and computers where court records would be kept."

But that vision has run into the realities of Iraq — the insurgency, a lack of resources and politics.

Security concerns have effectively closed proceedings to the public. Court records are not kept on computers, but mostly in paper files held together by yarn. And the daily proceedings, observed by a reporter, are hardly a model of deliberative justice.

That day's defendants came from two American detention camps and from sundry Iraqi jails.

Shortly past 10 a.m., two American soldiers escorted Hussan Lotfi Abdulla upstairs to a judge's office for a preliminary hearing. Mr. Abdulla, who had been in detention for nearly two years, sat next to his court-appointed Iraqi lawyer, whom he had never met.

Facing them in front of the judge's desk was Capt. Lisa Gorog, a military lawyer who had come to Baghdad to help the military unit that runs the American detention operations in Iraq.

The unit is doubling its legal staff to more than 100 lawyers and aides, drawn largely from the military and prosecutor's offices throughout the United States.

Even for experienced prosecutors, identifying strong cases among the mass of detainees is difficult given the quality of the evidence. Capt. Matt McCall, who focuses on men like Mr. Abdulla who have been detained in the volatile Anbar Province in western Iraq, said he had to sift through the files of 50 detainees to find 2 that he thought could be convicted. The rest were left in detention either because the soldiers who captured them were not readily available as witnesses or because the evidence was too weak, he said.

The case against Mr. Abdulla presented its own challenges. The one-page case summary prepared by Captain Gorog for the judge said Mr. Abdulla was detained on Jan. 27, 2005, when American soldiers grew suspicious of the taxi in which he was riding. When they forced it to stop, a man got out and tossed a grenade, which did not explode. They killed the man, and searched the taxi where they said they found rocket-propelled grenades, launchers and armor-piercing ammunition.

But Mr. Abdulla had another problem. He is Syrian but had no passport when he was detained. He faced at least 15 years in prison if Captain Gorog could show he had come to Iraq illegally to fight.

After the judge asked some perfunctory questions, Captain Gorog jumped in.

"Why did you come to Iraq?" she asked through an interpreter.

"For work and study," he replied.

"Why did you come to Ramadi?"

"To visit a friend."

"Didn't you know the man throwing the grenade?"

"No. I heard the explosions, but I was lying on the ground."

"How did you know it was a grenade?"

"The investigator told me."

"He was right there! Didn't you see the incident?"

"I was handcuffed on the ground. I didn't see it."

Mr. Abdulla's lawyer remained silent. The judge, who reserved judgment on whether Mr. Abdulla would be tried, asked the clerk to write a one-page summary of the hearing, which the lawyer signed without reading.

In the hall later, Mr. Abdulla's lawyer, who asked not to be identified for fear he would be killed, said he had been given the case just moments before the hearing and would have liked to have met with Mr. Abdulla, "to know how to defend him." But he said lawyers had stopped asking to meet with American detainees because judges had denied their requests.

"They said it's the Americans who don't allow this," the lawyer said. "It's in order that we don't dictate what they say."

American detention officials denied that was their policy but said it was difficult to arrange for defense lawyers to meet defendants either at detention camps or at the courthouse before the proceedings.

Although Iraq has an inquisitorial system in which judges are empowered to investigate, question witnesses and elicit evidence, defendants have a constitutional right to a lawyer. "We can't imagine a fair judiciary system without a defense lawyer where he can practice his duty," said Diya al-Saadie, who until this month ran the Iraqi Bar Association.

Karen Hanrahan, an international law expert who was the State Department's rule-of-law coordinator in Iraq until recently, devised a plan to create a public defender system to train and pay defense lawyers. She said it was never financed in part because judicial planning was dominated by American prosecutors who took a dim view of defense lawyers.

American lawyers have been brought in to help prosecute cases. Iraqi judges have been flown to Prague and The Hague for workshops. But, Ms. Hanrahan said, "there was no effort to train and work with lawyers."

Charles W. Larson Sr., the United States attorney for the Northern District of Iowa and an adviser in Iraq in 2004 and 2005, said his team was mindful of defense lawyers but chose to focus on helping judges because "it is a judicially driven system."

Rapid-Fire Proceedings

By late morning, the courthouse halls bustled with court personnel, private security guards, Iraqi police, American soldiers and their detainees.

At 11:30 a.m., Judge Saeb Ahmed, the chief judge, entered a large courtroom and took the middle of three seats at the dais. Behind him, the scales of justice had been painted on the wall. Black Hawk helicopters passed outside the windows. Explosions could be heard in the distance.

Judge Ahmed and his colleagues had a full docket, but they worked quickly.

The first two men to stand trial were detained by Iraqi security forces on Jan. 3, 2005, in connection with several Baghdad attacks, one on a hospital. Their families had hired a lawyer, Abdul Ami Ali, for $2,500, and with a flourish he told the judges that he had learned that one of the alleged attacks never occurred. He produced a letter from the hospital administrator to prove it. Judge Ahmed added the letter to the defendants' file, ended the trial and called the next case.

Sad Mahmud Saleh, a 24-year-old truck driver, was accused by American soldiers of having contraband weapons, including a hand grenade, in his house. His trial consisted largely of Judge Ahmed asking questions. At one point the judge stood and raised his voice.

"Are you a terrorist?" he asked.

"No," Mr. Saleh replied, standing in the tall wooden defendant's box.

DOJ_NMG_0107273

"Are you involved in any organization?"

"No."

"Why did they bring you here?"

Mr. Saleh's lawyer, appointed to represent him just as the trial began, simply asked for mercy.

After four more trials, each lasting about 15 minutes, the judges adjourned and cleared the courtroom. It was 1:05 p.m.

At 1:09, they reopened the doors and announced their verdicts and the sentences.

The American military lawyers had mixed results.

Saif Raad Mohammed, who was detained in January 2005 when soldiers said they found a machine gun with a silencer in his home, was sentenced to six years in prison.

The judges issued a string of long sentences, including 30 years for Mr. Saleh in the hand grenade case, and 30 years for the hospital attackers.

The defendants' lawyer was devastated, saying he figured that the hospital administrator's letter would have at least prompted the judges to investigate. Judge Ahmed declined to discuss any of that day's trials or make available any court records. But The Times obtained the judges' one-page written decision in the hospital attack case. It made no mention of the administrator's letter.

The judges dismissed the case against a man accused of joining an armed group after the Iraqi prosecutor told them there was not sufficient evidence.

He smiled as his verdict was read, but he did not leave the courthouse a free man. All the American-held detainees were taken back to the detention center. Those found guilty would be sent to Iraqi prisons. The man whose case was dismissed would be reviewed again by American military officials, who would determine whether to release him.

Overcrowded Stockades

The population of American-held detainees now crowding the central court and the prison camps grew quickly and unexpectedly. Shortly after Mr. Hussein was toppled, American soldiers began pulling looters and other troublemakers off the street.

Judge Gilbert S. Merritt, a federal judge from Nashville, Tenn., who was in Baghdad to help rebuild the justice system, said he asked American officials, "What are you going to do with these people now that you've picked them up?"

"They were holding them, here and there in stockades, and most were taken to Abu Ghraib, the only facility that the Americans knew about," Judge Merritt said.

When the insurgency took hold, the trickle of petty thieves turned into a torrent of people suspected of being terrorists and captured fighters. By the time the Abu Ghraib abuse scandal was disclosed in the spring of 2004, the Americans were holding about 7,500 people.

Largely unnoticed, the flood of detainees has only increased since then. But neither the Americans troops, who were fighting an insurgency for which they were not prepared, nor the newly reconstituted Iraqi police, had a comprehensive plan for handling them.

Untold numbers of detainees have also been captured and questioned by American soldiers, then turned over to Iraqi security forces who often hold prisoners in miserable conditions.

Early last year, a United States Army unit in Baquba found 450 people, including a few women and children, living in hot, fetid cells built for 150. The Iraqis seemed to have little idea where the detainees had come from and had no means to adjudicate their cases. Lt. Col. Robert Risberg, an officer in the unit, said they discovered that roughly a third of the prisoners had originally been captured by the Americans.

"A majority were people lost in this bureaucratic mess, and it took a while to straighten it out," he said.

The development of the American detainee operation in Iraq runs contrary to the Pentagon's practice of avoiding the role of jailer in a foreign country and instead, working to speedily transfer prisoners of war to allies. Maj. James F. Gebhardt, a retired Army historian, said this doctrine stemmed from the Korean War when murderous gangs and infiltrators ravaged the American detention camps.

But in Iraq, where detainees were seen as potential sources of intelligence on the insurgency, the military built its own detention facilities and then put a team in charge that had little experience handling long-term detainees. After the Abu Ghraib scandal in 2004, a new detention unit — Task Force 134 — was formed, but it started with a staff of just five to manage facilities holding 5,000 detainees. By the following summer the number had doubled to 10,000.

With the closing of Abu Ghraib in August, the Americans are holding its detainees mainly in two prisons that at times have been filled beyond capacity: Camp Bucca, a sprawling complex in southern Iraqi, and Camp Cropper near the Baghdad airport.

Military commanders have come under political as well as legal pressure to keep detainees moving through the system. Iraqi officials have persuaded the Americans to release detainees, saying the long detentions are contributing to unrest and violence.

The military conducts reviews in the camps to screen detainees for release. Many have been swept up at the scene of bombings or other violence, and the detention camp boards have recommended releasing as many as 60 percent of the detainees whose cases they reviewed.

Officials have sought to tighten the evidentiary standards used in deciding whether to detain suspects. Last year, for example, Maj. Gen. William H. Brandenburg, then the task force commander, became concerned about a swipe test that soldiers used on suspects to detect gunpowder. The test was so unreliable that cigarette lighter residue and even a common hand lotion would register as gunpowder.

Military officials have another reason to thin their camps. The longer people remain in detention, the more likely they are to be hardened by the experience, officials say.

"We know that inside the compounds, individuals are trying to recruit and promote a fundamentalist network, and we are trying to mitigate that by fighting a small counterinsurgency," General Gardner said. In an effort to thwart recruitment, detainees are grouped by level of ideology and are given moderate Arab newspapers.

But releasing detainees carries its own risk. Officials estimate that 6 percent of released detainees, or about 2,800, have been recaptured, some in battles with American troops. Soldiers in Mosul were outraged last year to discover that their commander, Lt. Col. Erik Kurilla, had been shot by a man who was set free by the Iraqi court two weeks earlier.

In September, soldiers captured a man suspected of fighting with Al Qaeda in a raid in western Iraq only to find that he was first caught in September 2005 and released in June in the Iraqi government's unity and reconciliation program, according to military records and interviews.

The release of detainees is such a concern for Americans that the military has put the onus on soldiers to act like police officers and collect evidence. An instructional guide warns that without "sufficient evidence for prosecution, the detainee will be released" and "may attempt to attack soldiers again."

The guide instructs soldiers to take witness statements, document tests for explosives and record serial numbers of contraband weapons. It also tells soldiers how to use photographic evidence to its best effect.

When suspects are caught away from or fleeing a crime scene, like a bomb or a weapons cache, the guide tells soldiers to take pictures of the suspects at the scene. For example, the guide lays out this chain of events: "Your squad conducts a raid on a house, in the house you find 2 adult males. 50 meters from the house you find a large weapons cache buried 2 feet underground."

Among the instructions: "Take pictures of the individuals with the cache."

A Case Falls Apart

On May 12, 2005, a car bomb exploded near a market in southern Baghdad, killing at least 17 people, and the Wolf Brigade flexed its might.

The brigade, an Iraqi commando unit, stormed a neighborhood in eastern Baghdad and arrested four men. By the next day, Iraqis could see results for themselves.

The four men appeared on "Terrorism in the Grip of Justice," a prime-time television show broadcast by Iraqiya, which featured commando interrogations. They confessed on the air.

But one year later, the four men, who were held in Iraqi detention and faced death by hanging, walked out of the central court, with all charges dismissed.

Their story, pieced together through interviews and court records, is one of a narrow escape from Iraq's fractured system of justice. It is also the story of an unlikely civil rights lawyer who beat the system for the four men and a handful of others.

Faraj Mahmoud, 42, a grocer, was not totally shocked when he and his two brothers were arrested that night, with a friend.

Their families had emigrated from Palestine after the 1948 war, and like other Sunni refugees had been favored by Mr. Hussein over Iraq's own Shiite peoples.

The Wolf Brigade, an Interior Ministry unit made up mostly of poor, young Shiites from Sadr City, had developed a reputation for singling out Palestinians and using torture to extract confessions. The unit's commander, Abu Walid, who questioned the men on the show, has denied the charges.

In recent interviews, the four men, who have fled Iraq, said they had been tortured in a variety of ways. " 'We will beat you until your meat is cooked,' " one of the men, Amer Mahmoud, 27, an auto mechanic, said an interrogator had told him.

Faraj Mahmoud, who had married six days before he was captured, said he was stripped and hanged from the ceiling. An electric prod applied to his genitals made his body bounce off the walls, he said. Hania Mufti, a Human Rights Watch official with extensive knowledge of Iraq's jails, said other prisoners had described similar abuses.

DOJ_NMG_0107275

The men said their captors also threatened to fetch their families, and they saw naked women and girls being walked through the jail. That is when they all signed confessions.

Among those watching the television show the night the men confessed was Abdul Razzaq, a 31-year-old Iraqi lawyer, and he agreed to take the case without a fee.

Mr. Razzaq handled mostly divorces before the war. After the invasion he began representing mostly criminal defendants. It took him two and a half months to find the four men in the Iraqi detention system. A jailer demanded $50 to lead him to their cell, he said. It smelled so bad that the jailer wore a mask. "All four of us started to cry," Amer Mahmoud said. "The lawyer started to cry. We didn't want to let him go."

Mr. Razzaq picked apart the case. For starters, one of the Mahmoud brothers had confessed to hiding 600 pounds of TNT beneath the backseat of a car, an Opel, that has no space for such a load.

The lawyer found 14 witnesses who he said could provide alibis for the men. He got statements from the police saying that a string of other attacks to which the men confessed had never taken place.

He also went after the man who had directed the Wolf Brigade to his clients. The court eventually agreed that the man, who had confessed as well, was mentally incompetent.

Along the way, Mr. Razzaq said, the Central Criminal Court was typically frustrating. Clerks asked for money to hasten the preparation of judicial orders, a practice that other lawyers have also alleged. The judge who held the preliminary hearing grew impatient, ordering the four men returned to jail for more questioning, he said.

The trial was still months away when Mr. Razzaq received a note, signed by the families of victims of the car bombing: "This is the last notification to you, for you will be a victim and a cheap sacrifice goat for terrorists. Do not defend those atheistic Palestinian criminals and their followers (the worshipers of the atheist, Saddam), or else your destiny shall be death for sure."

On May 21, 2006, a three-judge panel ordered the release of all four men and their accuser. Citing their confessions at the hands of the Wolf Brigade, the judges wrote, "If it is assumed that the initial confession was correct, it was not supported by any convincing evidence."

Faraj Mahmoud said: "We couldn't believe our feet were touching the ground. It seemed like there were a thousand people at home, singing. No one expected us to get released."

Two days later, the men and their families fled Iraq. Mr. Razzaq then won an acquittal for a Syrian truck driver detained for not having a passport. But the man was kidnapped as he emerged from the prison with three other freed prisoners and was never seen again, Mr. Razzaq said.

He blames himself. "If I had not gotten him out of prison, he would still be there, alive," he said. Discouraged about practicing law in Iraq, Mr. Razzaq fled the country in October.

The Military Under Pressure

Many of the cases the American military has brought to the Iraqi central court involve multiple defendants. And the evidence connecting them to a specific attack or other crime often varies widely. As a result, despite many victories for the military in court, about half of the 3,000 American-held detainees who have gone to trial have walked free.

There is much finger-pointing about why prosecutions fail.

"We're in a wartime situation where judges unfortunately have to be concerned with their livelihood and their lives," said Judge John J. Carroll III, a federal judge from North Carolina, who was a military lawyer in Baghdad this year. "We've had cases where the detainees should have been convicted and weren't because of political pressure, from the government and even from terrorist groups, indirectly."

Qasim Hassan al-Aboudi, the manager of legal and media affairs for the Higher Judicial Council in Iraq, blames the Americans for bringing cases without the kind of evidence that Iraqi law requires.

"Your troops make many mistakes," he said. "Sometimes they destroy the weapons without documenting them, and they put detainees in for a long time so that other detainees can coach them on what to say in court. We can see that criminals get away, but it's not the judicial system's fault. It's the fault of the mistakes in gathering evidence. We have to respect the law."

The military is starting to bolster its cases with forensic evidence, including fingerprints and bullet-shard analysis, as well as a video conferencing system that allows soldiers who have returned to the United States to testify in the Iraqi court.

Officials overseeing detention operations said they recognized the importance of defense lawyers, and in an effort to help detainees with their cases they are creating legal assistance centers at detention camps.

The gravity of the cases is increasing as the central court imposes more death penalties. Ten of the 14 American-held detainees sentenced to hang have been convicted since September, and all 14 are awaiting transfer to Iraqi executioners pending an automatic review by Iraq's court of appeals. Mr. Hussein, who has been sentence to die, was convicted in a special tribunal.

DOJ_NMG_0107276

The military declined to identify the men facing death but said they included a man from Saudi Arabia who admitted traveling to Iraq to fight, a Tunisian who participated in dozens of attacks on American troops and three members of a kidnapping ring.

Also awaiting death is Mohammad Munaf, a 54-year-old man born in Iraq who became an American citizen in 2000. He was convicted on Oct. 12 of helping to arrange the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists, who were released unharmed.

Given the state of the justice system in Iraq, however, using the death penalty concerns even one of the American prosecutors who helped bring cases against detainees.

"There are a lot of bad guys out there trying to kill U.S. troops and I want nothing more than to stop those guys," said Mr. Waller, the Colorado deputy district attorney and Air Force Reserve major. But he said the Iraqi court system needed safeguards to prevent innocent defendants from being sent to the gallows.

"If I had the right guy and I had the right case I think I'd be O.K. with that," Mr. Waller said. But, today in Iraq, he said, "I don't think that situation would present itself."

Gunmen Stage Mass Kidnapping In Baghdad (AP)

AP, December 17, 2006

Gunmen in Iraqi army uniforms staged a mass kidnapping on Sunday at the office of the Iraqi Red Crescent in downtown Baghdad, police said.

An official of the Iraqi aid group said the assailants abducted 20 to 30 employees and visitors, but left women behind. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because of security concerns.

Police, however, said they did not know how many people were kidnapped at the office in Andalus square. They said the gunmen arrived at the office in five pickup trucks.

The Red Crescent, which is part of the international Red Cross movement, has about 1,000 staff and some 200,000 volunteers in Iraq. It works closely with the International Committee of the Red Cross, which visits detainees and tries to provide food, water and medicine to Iraqis.

Several mass kidnappings have been carried out in the Iraqi capital in recent months, possibly by armed groups on either side of the sectarian conflict between Sunnis and Shiites.

On Thursday, gunmen in military uniforms kidnapped people from a commercial area in central Baghdad, police said. The attackers drove up in about 10 sport utility vehicles and began rounding up shop owners and bystanders. Police said 50 to 70 people were abducted, but at least two dozen were later released.

Last month, gunmen in Interior Ministry commando uniforms abducted scores of men from a Higher Education Ministry office building. The Education Ministry is predominantly Sunni Arab. About half of the victims were released.

Reserves, National Guard Feel The Strain (BOS/MCT)

By Dave Montgomery, Mcclatchy Newspapers

The Boston Globe/McClatchy, December 17, 2006

A half-million called up since the 9/11 attacks

WASHINGTON -- The nation's National Guard and Reserve forces are displaying signs of strain after five years of deployments in what has become the biggest active-duty mobilization since the Korean War.

More than 500,000 Guard and Reserve troops have served in active duty since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and they've made up nearly half of the force fighting against terrorists and in combat missions in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Military leaders, pointing to an upswing in recruiting and retention, describe the nation's reserve force as the most professional and combat-seasoned in history, bonded by a keen sense of patriotism.

But at the same time, many Guard units are struggling with chronic equipment shortages and funding problems that threaten their ability to respond to disasters and other emergencies in their home states. Thousands of reservists are serving in patchwork units cobbled together in piecemeal fashion from other units, often with little or no sense of cohesion.

"I think you're seeing the leading-edge indicators of strain and fraying the edges," said Arnold L. Punaro, a retired Marine Corps general who chairs a commission looking into a possible overhaul of the Guard and Reserve. "And, yes, they are doing a good job of recruiting and retention, but at what cost and how long can they sustain it?"

The widening concerns over the reserve component come at a time when US military leaders are pressing for even more reinforcements from the Guard and Reserves to help ease the pressure on active-duty forces.

General Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's top general, warned Punaro's commission on Thursday that the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq "will break" the active-duty force unless the Pentagon changes its mobilization policy to allow more involuntary call-ups from the Guard and Reserve. Schoomaker also wants to add thousands of active-duty forces.

DOJ_NMG_0107277

Lieutenant General David Poythress, the state adjutant general for the Georgia National Guard, said he agreed with Schoomaker that there need to be changes in the Army's structure, since it's configured to fight high-intensity, short-duration wars, not the grinding guerrilla conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. But he expressed concern that the National Guard may be carrying too much of the load.

"You need readily available manpower on both the active and the reserve side," Poythress said. "There is a danger of breaking the Army, but there is an equivalent danger of breaking the Guard. Guardsmen don't sign up to be full-time soldiers. If that's what they wanted, they'd join the active Army."

Reserve advocates are noticing indications that some 30-something junior officers and noncommissioned officers are thinking about pulling the plug on their reserve status to keep from falling behind on the civilian career ladder.

"They're at a point in their civilian career where they're making their mark," said Lieutenant General Charles G. Rodriguez of Austin, adjutant general for the Texas National Guard. "Now is the time for them to punch their tickets and do all the hard things in their civilian jobs. If they're not there, they can't punch those tickets."

Of the 88,500 currently mobilized, California has the largest contingent (4,559), followed by Texas (3,935), Pennsylvania (3,578), and Minnesota (3,079).

The Army National Guard and Army Reserve represent the biggest share of deployments, but all of the other services also have sent thousands of their reservists into active-duty service. More than 4,000 personnel have been deployed from Naval Air Station Fort Worth, the nation's largest joint reserve base, which serves as home to some 20 major units attached to the Air Force, Army, Marines, and Texas Air National Guard.

Lieutenant General Jack C. Stultz, commander of the Army Reserve who's also a 25-year employee of Procter and Gamble in Orlando, Fla., said the men and women in today's Reserve and Guard are vastly different from the Reserve unit he joined in 1979. Back then, he said, the unit commander opened the annual two-week active tour by asking who'd buy the beer for the end-of-tour party.

"These kids are the next Greatest Generation," Stultz said, referring to a name commonly given to America's World War II generation. "We've got a different caliber of soldier than we did in 1979."

Thousands joined up in the patriotic surge after the terrorist attacks. Members of the Guard have been deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan and also have served in antiterrorism missions in Africa and peacekeeping forces in Bosnia and Kosovo.

How To Talk To Enemies (LAT)

By Joseph McMillan

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

CAN WE negotiate productively with our enemies in the midst of a war? It's not something most Americans find appealing, scarred as we are by the memory of protracted and ultimately unsatisfactory peace talks during the Korean and Vietnam wars.

But it's what the Iraq Study Group, chaired by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, says we need to do to extract ourselves from the mess in Iraq.

Not only do they want us to launch a "new diplomatic offensive" that would include Iran and Syria — two countries with which our relations have long verged on active hostility — they are calling for us "to engage all parties in Iraq," even militia chiefs like Muqtada Sadr and leading figures in the Sunni insurgency.

To some degree, American skepticism about talking to the enemy is justified. Under the best of circumstances, it is a risky business, as 2,500 years or more of diplomatic history bear out. The wartime diplomacy that Baker and Hamilton call for promises to be especially tricky, given the number of parties involved and the nature of their involvement in the conflict. Nevertheless, history demonstrates that talking while fighting, when conducted by statesmen who understand the distinction between wartime and peacetime diplomacy, can make a big difference in the outcome of a war. As we move forward, however, it is important to remember a few things:

· Fighting and talking are two sides of the same coin. Wartime diplomacy is most effective when actions on the battlefield are directed toward shaping the adversary's willingness to come to terms. Ideally, the enemy must believe that any delay on his part in reaching an agreement will lead to a worse outcome.

One reason the Korean armistice negotiations dragged on in the early 1950s was that the American negotiators representing the United Nations Command agreed at the outset of the talks that the final cease-fire line would follow the existing line of contact between the forces. North Korea was told, in effect, that there would be no real price for its refusal to come to terms.

As we enter the complicated array of negotiations with Iraq's neighbors and warring factions, we must find a way to convince each of our adversaries that the price of recalcitrance will be a certain and painful loss — not a military loss but a serious political loss — for itself or its proxies.

Unfortunately, the Iraq Study Group report fails to offer any ideas for using our considerable military presence in Iraq to achieve such leverage. On the contrary, the recommendation to set in motion the inexorable withdrawal of U.S. combat forces yields a situation in which military pressure is relinquished with respect to our adversaries and exercised only against our ally, the government of Iraq!

· Keep expectations realistic. The diplomat cannot expect to gain at the conference table what his armed forces cannot plausibly gain in the field. Moreover, he must understand that although he has no control over them, military operations will inevitably affect the course of his negotiations.

In August 1814, when American and British diplomats convened in Ghent, Belgium, to negotiate an end to the War of 1812, the British side opened the talks by laying out a series of extravagant demands. One would have required the United States to give up most of what we know as the Midwest to create an independent state under Indian tribal sovereignty as a buffer between the U.S. and British-held Canada. Another called for the U.S. to cede a slice of northern Maine to provide a more direct transit corridor between Quebec and Halifax.

The British maintained these positions even after a series of U.S. victories in mid-September made it clear that they had no decisive military advantage to leverage. It took a frank assessment from the Duke of Wellington — "I confess that I think you have no right, from the state of the war, to demand any concession of territory from America" — to induce the British diplomats to lower their sights. Like Wellington, Baker and Hamilton make a compelling case for lowering our sights. What they don't provide is a military strategy that would preclude having to lower them even further in the future.

· Understand the role of passion. In his 1716 essay, "On the Manner of Negotiating with Princes," the French diplomat Francois de Callieres identified a "phlegmatic temper" as one of a diplomat's most desirable personal attributes. But in wartime, the parties that are engaged in combat are unlikely to bargain coolly and rationally, no matter the negotiator's personality. They will inevitably be affected by the sentiment, memorably expressed by Abraham Lincoln in 1863, that "these dead shall not have died in vain."

Even worse, the diplomat may find his own words or his armed forces' actions unexpectedly stiffening rather than weakening the adversary's resolve. Just as the London Blitz of 1940-41 made the British less, rather than more, likely to accept a negotiated peace with Adolf Hitler, the burning of Washington in August 1814 reinforced American resolve not to accept a humiliating peace with Britain.

In the case of Iraq, some of the parties we have to deal with — particularly the external ones — are not yet as inflamed by passion as the Sunni and Shiite populations within Iraq. But we have learned to our detriment how easily public anger can be roused to fever pitch in the Middle East. Part of the close interagency coordination called for in the Baker-Hamilton study must be aimed at keeping passions from becoming even more heated than they already are.

· Patience, patience. Above all, Callieres told his masters, the successful diplomat requires "a patience which no trial can break down." In a wartime situation, however, it is not the patience of the negotiator himself that is the key, but that of his government and people. Obviously the side that is more eager for peace is at a distinct disadvantage in the bargaining process, as the British government — under pressure from merchants weary of shipping losses and landowners weary of wartime property taxes — found in 1814.

As those in the region evaluate American opinion polls, election results and the Baker-Hamilton report, they are likely to conclude that we, like the British in 1814, are tired of a war in which military victory seems unattainable and in which any possible political benefits may not be worth the cost.

If our adversaries perceive that the primary aim of U.S. policy is the fastest possible extrication of U.S. troops from Iraq, then, just as happened in Vietnam, it will become impossible for American diplomats to achieve anything more than that.

The Baker-Hamilton study rightly points out that "time is running out" to fix Washington's strategy toward Iraq, and it offers a useful if incomplete manual for carrying out the necessary repairs. If we are not willing to give a new strategy time to work, however, it won't matter how well it is designed.

No Talks With Iran And Syria (LAT)

By David B. Rivkin Jr., Lee A. Casey

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

SHOULD THE United States negotiate directly with Syria and Iran over the future of Iraq? These countries are sworn enemies of the U.S., governed by relentlessly repressive governments.

Yet the Iraq Study Group argued that the U.S. has often negotiated with unsavory regimes, including the Soviet government during the Cold War, and that skillful American diplomacy can steer discussions away from matters on which the

DOJ_NMG_0107279

U.S. absolutely will not compromise — such as Iran's nuclear weapons program — and toward Iraq, where we might be able to work together. According to this argument, even if negotiations with Damascus and Tehran fail, there is nothing to be lost by talking.

Unfortunately, this argument is fallacious. In fact, there is a great deal to lose.

Winston Churchill's aphorism that "to jaw-jaw is always better than to war-war" has been cited often, but it was not representative of his policy while in office. In fact, despite pressure from his Cabinet, Churchill refused in 1940 to negotiate with Italy's Benito Mussolini, fearing Britain's will to prosecute a tough war against Germany would be undermined by hopes of a separate peace with one of Adolf Hitler's allies.

Indeed, history is replete with examples of well-intentioned negotiations gone wrong — ill-judged at the outset or so badly managed in practice that they inflamed rather than calmed tensions. The most famous is the tragic spectacle of British and French appeasement of Hitler during the 1930s, but U.S. Cold War diplomacy is also rich with instances of talks that backfired.

During the September 1959 U.S.-Soviet summit, for example, President Eisenhower fed Nikita Khrushchev's vanity, calling him a great leader and hosting the Soviet delegation at Camp David. Eisenhower also agreed to hold another summit in 1960 to be largely devoted to Germany, which was a major Cold War flashpoint and a key Soviet diplomatic priority.

From this, Moscow concluded that Washington was overawed by the growing Soviet military power and that it could be persuaded to abandon Berlin. To encourage this, Khrushchev intensified his efforts, through the use of boastful rhetoric and doctored intelligence, to deceive the U.S. into believing that Soviet nuclear forces were much larger than American forces — the famous "missile bluff." Eisenhower's diplomacy raised hopes to unrealistic levels, tensions actually increased and NATO's cohesion was weakened.

The June 1961 Kennedy-Khrushchev summit in Vienna was equally unhelpful, convincing the Soviet leader that the young new president was weak. As a result, Moscow increased pressure on Berlin and, in 1962, took an enormous strategic gamble by surreptitiously installing missiles in Cuba. Khrushchev's miscalculation, rooted in his misreading of American diplomacy, brought the world closer to nuclear war than it has been before or since.

Of course, there are times when talking to an enemy makes good sense. When he was secretary of State, Iraq Study Group Co-Chairman James A. Baker III himself ably conducted a successful dialogue with Mikhail Gorbachev as the Soviet Union dissolved in the early 1990s.

But negotiations are unpredictable, and timing is all-important; they should never be commenced without realistic, identifiable goals and a clear idea of what compromises are acceptable. Any notion that the U.S. could open talks with Syria or Iran without being prepared to give something (in return for something) is wrongheaded and dishonest. The very act of negotiating (at least of negotiating in good faith) implies a willingness to strike a deal, to accept a quid pro quo.

The questions, therefore, for Baker and others who support immediate, unconditional, direct talks with Syrian President Bashar Assad and the Iranian mullahs are what exactly does the U.S. hope to gain from their assistance in Iraq, and what would it be prepared to give in return? Those questions have not been answered, and it is unlikely that they will be anytime soon.

At the same time, the costs of talking to Damascus and Tehran are clear. For example, the U.S. and France have diligently worked to isolate Syria, primarily because of its suspected involvement in the assassination of senior Lebanese officials. Engaging Damascus diplomatically would instantly relegitimize the Assad regime.

Similarly, the U.S. has spent years building a coalition within the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran over its nuclear weapons program, insisting that Iran must suspend uranium enrichment activities as a precondition for any serious diplomatic dialogue. Abandoning this posture precipitously, and opening an unconditional dialogue, would be humiliating and would irrevocably undermine all of this diplomatic spade work.

Ironically, the Iraq Study Group, for all of its emphasis on diplomacy, vastly underestimates the forces that diplomatic discourse can unleash. Diplomacy is a serious exercise, capable of producing either good or bad consequences.

Jaw-jaw matters a great deal, especially when conducted by a great power like the U.S. This explains why most rogue regimes are eager to dance a diplomatic minuet with the U.S., whether they acknowledge it or not. They grasp that once the U.S. begins to talk to them, it implicitly legitimizes at least some of their positions and impedes the building of regional and global coalitions against them.

Other than an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, it is difficult to conceive a course of action more perilous to our interests in the Middle East than seeking the Baker-style assistance of Iran and Syria.

This does not mean that the United States should not talk to reprehensible regimes, or to its enemies, when such talks are in the national interest — as they sometimes are. Although the Bush administration has often declared that, as a matter of principle, it would eschew negotiations with the world's rogues and despots, its bark has been far worse than its bite. Indeed, its attempts to use multilateral diplomacy to persuade Iran and North Korea to curb their nuclear ambitions reflect traditional realpolitik considerations. This approach has merit because its multilateral framework limits the ability of Iran and North Korea to split the U.S. from the rest of the world, and because concrete concessions are being sought upfront from both of these countries.

What does not make sense is to open a dialogue with two of Washington's bitterest enemies without a clear notion of whether their help in Iraq would be worth the price in the long run.

U.S. Military Rehearses Terror Hearings (AP)

By Michael Melia, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 17, 2006

The U.S. military is rehearsing for hearings on whether 14 top terror suspects can be held indefinitely without charge as enemy combatants, but defense lawyers say the outcome is preordained.

Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and the 13 others will be the highest-profile detainees to undergo the so-called Combatant Status Review Tribunals, and the first to do so in two years. The proceedings, expected early next year, are open to the media.

At the hearings, a military panel will evaluate whether the men should be classified as "enemy combatants," a designation which allows them to be held indefinitely and prevents them from challenging their detention in the U.S. court system.

"The biggest thing we're doing is opening up the books, reviewing procedures and conducting rehearsals so that we do it correctly," Navy Capt. Philip Waddingham told reporters who recently visited Guantanamo. He is the lead officer at Guantanamo for the Pentagon-based office in charge of determining detainees' status.

It is unclear whether Mohammed and the others — who until recently were being held in secret CIA prisons — will agree to attend the hearings. If they do, the military says they will remain shackled and would be forbidden to talk to reporters.

The rehearsals are being conducted inside the same space reserved for the hearings — a small room inside a trailer equipped with a few leather chairs, one plastic seat for the detainee, and little else.

Combatant Status Review Tribunals were held for 558 detainees between July 2004 and January 2005. All but 38 were deemed enemy combatants.

Defense attorneys have condemned the hearings as shams because classified evidence is withheld from the detainees and they are not afforded defense lawyers.

"There is no question that these 14 have no chance," said Brent Mickum, an attorney who represents two Britons at Guantanamo. "The decision has (already) been made that they are enemy combatants."

At the hearings, a panel of three officers will evaluate whether detainees merit the designation. A military "personal representative" will help prisoners prepare for the proceedings.

Bush announced on Sept. 6 that the 14 detainees had been transferred to Guantanamo.

Mohammed, who was believed to be the No. 3 al-Qaida leader, has not been seen in public since he was captured in Pakistan in 2003. The others include the alleged architects of the USS Cole bombing in Yemen in 2000 and the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The 14 are in a maximum-security section of the prison, which sprawls over a cactus-studded patch of arid ground overlooking the Caribbean. Officials say they are treated like other detainees, and can receive reading materials and have access to mail censored by the military.

Waddingham said in September that he expected the hearings for the 14 new detainees to be held within three months. That timeframe has been pushed back to early 2007 as top officials at the Pentagon, the Justice Department and the military Joint Task Force in charge of the prison camps coordinate the proceedings, he said.

About 380 men have been transferred from Guantanamo to other countries since the detention center opened in January 2002. About 395 detainees remain, most of them held for nearly five years without charge on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

U.S. authorities repatriated a 28-year-old Bangladeshi man on Sunday after years of imprisonment in Guantanamo, a police official at the airport in Bangladesh's capital Dhaka said. The official, Tahera Banu, said the man was being interrogated.

Open-Source Spying

The allure of a "spy system . . . that can quickly assemble disparate pieces that are already lying around" is so very American and so very wrong (Clive Thompson, Dec. 3). America has always been conflicted over the role of classic espionage. Thus, the idea of discerning high-value intelligence from behind a desk in Washington (by harvesting open sources of information and sharing this data via wiki or blog technology) has real appeal. In fact, it is no substitute for human and technical penetrations of our enemies. Sept. 11 was not simply the result of a failure to share intelligence or employ the latest data-analysis tool. It was the result of not having sufficient intelligence penetrations of Al Qaeda. A well-placed source is more efficient, more reliable and more useful than a million disparate pieces of information.

When a technician discovered child pornography on the company president's computer, the Ethicist advised "silence" (Dec. 3). This advice was reckless and naïve.

Each image of child pornography is a crime scene, and its possession is a felony in 42 states and under federal law. Furthermore, reproducing such images again victimizes the innocent child. The Ethicist flippantly advises silence because speaking up would be "too ineffectual in protecting children." But real children have been rescued by the discovery of images. Without the images, we cannot find and rescue victims or punish the predators. The Ethicist demonstrates a disappointing lack of understanding of how law enforcement works.

This is unacceptable, and I urge all Americans to reject this poor advice. A child's life could hang in the balance all because a self-described "ethicist" muses over vague excuses rather than advising immediate action.

The employee should make sure he's protected as a whistleblower and then call the police. They'll figure out if the activity is illegal. That's their job, and it is our job, as good citizens, to report suspected crime.

Kristen Fehlhaber

I disagree with the Ethicist's conclusion that the employee's "best recourse" is silence. Without revealing particulars, he might first check with corporate counsel, risk management or human resources about the company's policy on company-owned computers. Many companies have a policy that clearly states that all material, including e-mail, generated or stored on a company-owned computer, is company property, and that employees have no right or expectation of privacy with respect to such materials. Further, the company may have expectations that its Internet technicians report known or suspected illegal use of its equipment.

If his company has such a policy, he might then advise corporate counsel that he saw what looked like illegal materials on an (unnamed) person's computer and ask what he should do. If counsel chooses to investigate, it should do so within the context of the company's policies. Even if no action or investigation is taken once the party is known (e.g., the president is the owner of the company), it is counsel's responsibility to advise the president to clear out the material and cease any further activity at the risk of imperiling his company. Federal authorities can and do investigate people who visit or download materials from such Web sites.

An internal investigation does not necessarily mean that his job, reputation or company is imperiled, though certainly at most companies any person other than the owner would have his job at risk for misuse of company property.

While I don't disagree with the Ethicist's opinion on the technician's personal moral obligations, my personal values would make it impossible for me to stomach working for this president, and I would probably report him.

Eyal Press's essay (Dec. 3) on the lower crime rates in immigrant communities was thought-provoking. As to why immigrants commit less violent crime, common sense suggests they came here, whether legally or illegally, to work, and they're too busy doing that — and are too well rewarded by economic opportunities they find here that don't exist in their former countries. Illegal immigrants may be deterred from criminality by the relatively high penalty of deportation for even minor crimes,

What It Takes To Make a Student

Paul Tough's article (Nov. 26) on closing the race and class gaps in school performance usefully looked beyond what schools do to what parents do and to the enormous gaps in parent-child communication among middle-class and poorer families, in vocabulary, in the ratio of encouragement to discouragement and in promoting questioning and critical discussion, rather than simple obedience to orders.

But what lies behind this "parenting gap"? Might the poor and less-skilled working-class parents be replicating with their children what they experience on the job — limited opportunities to develop a wide range of skills, demands for simple obedience rather than discussion of what to do next, an authoritarian environment of bosses and managers full of "negative communications" and the frustrations of low pay, low recognition for their work and pervasive powerlessness?

Longer school hours, intensive tutoring and more quality pre-schooling may reduce the school-performance gap between the economic classes, but they cannot eliminate it. Schools are asked to overcome the effects of a system of stratification in which some people do the thinking and give the orders while other people are expected to simply obey orders and perform repetitive tasks out of fear of losing their jobs, while raising families on very low incomes. Schooling by itself cannot destratify a class society; class structure keeps reproducing itself. It needs to be attacked head on.

Your article on education spent only a few lines on an obstacle of charter schools — the teachers' union. A review of the National Education Association's Web site shows that the union is not merely "skeptical" of charter schools but also fights other potential reforms, including vouchers and merit pay. The only "solution" consistently advocated by the teachers' union is to put additional money into a system that has failed for the vast majority of poor, minority students.

My thanks to Paul Tough for a thorough analysis of No Child Left Behind as it applies to minority students. He did not mention, however, one of the most pernicious aspects of the legislation as it affects most of our classrooms: it treats all schools as if they were the same.

This failure to distinguish among different schools with their very different student populations and, therefore, different needs, makes solving the problems of low-performing schools impossible and, as I have been experiencing for the past five years, injects unnecessary and often counterproductive requirements into schools that had been performing well. As a result, our worst schools only seem better and our best schools are in danger of slipping into mediocrity (simpler textbooks that all students can read; simpler classes that all students can pass).

The statistics cited at the beginning of Tough's article indicate that we are reducing the performance gap as much by causing high-performing schools to do worse as by helping low-performing schools to do better.

Your article omits mention of an enormous factor in children's lives today: the influence of a frenetic, often-violent and fiercely anti-intellectual popular culture.

While it is true that middle-class children may wallow in this morass of video games and rap videos as well, less-privileged youngsters do not have the advantage of parents who can offer an alternative behavioral universe. This was a very encouraging article about people actually doing something to address a longstanding national problem. Instead of profiting from sales of polemical books and television appearances, organizations like Kipp are on the ground making a real difference. I am concerned, however, about Kipp's desire not to attract too many well-prepared students. It is these very students that have the most to lose if they remain in inadequate public schools. Surrounded by peers that often view high academic achievement as "acting white," they risk succumbing to the prevailing low standards.

Paul Tough accurately points out that a child's family life is the dominant factor in determining success at school. I've taught for 15 years in a public high school. The first week of every school year, I ask each class for a show of hands to the question "How many of you ate dinner with your family (TV turned off) at least three of the last seven nights?" Overwhelmingly, the lifted hands belong to students who will maintain a high class average, will do well on standardized tests, will speak and write with an advanced vocabulary and will not be a discipline problem.

No Child Should Be Left Behind at Home — but that is a tough one to legislate.

Drawing parallels between America as Vietnam's "leading trading partner" today and Iraq 30 years from now is wishful thinking (David Rieff, Nov. 26). Iraq is more likely to look to China for trade and business. Just as China is Vietnam's historic rival, America's imperial misadventure in Iraq has made it Iraq's. The wounds inflicted upon Iraq will not scab over quickly; little is forgiven or ever forgotten there. In Iraq "the long march of history" is measured not in decades but in centuries.

Thank you for

Harriet Brown's article on anorexia (Nov. 26). From the other side of the planet (far northern Australia), our family has a story achingly similar to Harriet's. We watched in stunned horror as anorexia transformed our bright, beautiful, happy 14-year-old daughter into a starving, terrified, angry and withdrawn child. Like Harriet, we treated our daughter using the Maudsley approach, taking full control of her diet until she was capable of doing it again herself. Despite anorexia's fierce resistance, a regime of good food and healthy weight gain lifted our daughter from the black pit of anorexia, and she has now resumed her normal, happy life.

Harriet Brown's account of her daughter's struggle with anorexia gave me a ray of hope. Having worked with therapists and other health-care professionals to help my elder daughter through her eating disorder, we have returned to them for their advice, care and expertise as our younger daughter battles her own demons in her eating disorder. No parent should try to treat this illness alone. Brown's story does not stress enough the need to involve professionals with expertise in treating teens with eating disorders as essential partners with parents. It's a bewildering and exhausting journey, even with the best of professional care.

Susan Smith

East Moriches, N.Y.

· As a psychologist who encounters young girls and women with eating disorders, and their families, on a daily basis, I was troubled by the reference to a "parentectomy" as a descriptor of the more "conventional" approach to the treatment of anorexia.

While not a proponent of Maudsley, I, too, see the family as "the best chance a child has for recovery." However, as acknowledged in many other areas of parenting (and relationships in general), those closest to a person or most invested are often not best able to objectively address that person's problems. It is for precisely this reason that surgeons do not operate on their own children.

Instead, we see food and eating as metaphors for deeper emotional issues, and accordingly, we ask parents to join their adolescent's treatment by committing to parenting and family therapy. In so doing, parents convey an openness to the notion that the marital and larger family dynamics also "weigh in" on the issues with which their children grapple.

Of course, anorexia is a life-threatening disorder, and a child must reach a standard of medical and nutritional stability before she can effectively participate in, and benefit from, psychological treatment.

As a social worker who has worked in the field of treating eating disorders since 1989, I was overwhelmed by the parents' love for their daughter and the lengths they took in order to get her on the road to recovery. This approach of refeeding is a wonderful way to make her feel safe by showing that she is loved and cared for. Too often anorexia is thought of as an illness that stems from issues of control. Children who develop eating disorders do so, in part, because they are feeling unsafe and unable to express feelings of sadness, anger, embarrassment or depression. For many who are unable to articulate or define their feelings, it is easier to say, "I feel fat." And often we see families getting into power struggles around food and weight, rather than helping these children express their feelings.

Part of society's misunderstanding of the illness is the belief that once treatment is given, the demons that Brown described go away. Families are better off knowing that the demons will always be there. Recovery is when the demons no longer control the behavior.

A well-recognized trait of women is a need to know as much as possible about a man with whom they have a relationship; Merkin's article demonstrates the pique when the male resists. Her article was subverted by recurrent unflattering references to Stoppard's attitudes and various preferences. Furthermore, although she acknowledges that he has been labeled "conservative," she failed to detail not only why but also how his positions have, at times, made him a pariah among the left in London; witness the hue and cry when he made remarks considered inimical to some modern artists and their works several years ago. She might have fixed on one of the major themes of "The Coast of Utopia," which suggests that the concept of collectivism that mesmerized the intellectual European community during the 19th century probably led to a number of the horrors of the 20th century.

Atlanta Gay Donor or Gay Dead?

John Bowe's article (Nov. 19) increases awareness about the reality of the diversity of family life in America. Ozzie and Harriet are, and always have been, a myth.

While Bowe explores the families of gay fathers and gay donors as somehow "redefining" family, the simple truth is that extended and complex family structures are the norm and are hardly unique to gay- and lesbian-headed families.

As lesbian mothers of twin 4-year-old boys, my partner and I raise our children with the help of a network of loving friends, neighbors, aunts, uncles, grandparents and other family members. We know firsthand how important all of these relationships are to the well-being of our sons. Gay fathers and gay donors could say the same thing about their families.

What I consider a significant cause of stress on lesbian and gay parents did not come up in your article. It amazed me that John Bowe managed to write an article about gay fathers and co-parenting that depicted such a skewed collection of seemingly self-indulgent gay men and controlling lesbians. Now maybe you can do an article on full-time gay fathers, those of us who stay up all night with a sick infant, soothe tears from a child's face, host a gaggle of toddlers at a birthday party and communicate openly with the people with whom they have chosen to parent. My husband and I, along with our co-parent and our 1-year-old daughter, have created a nurturing three-parent, two-household family. As she grows up, our daughter will know the love of a committed full-time father — she's got two of them!

Denver China's African Adventure

As

James Traub's article (Nov. 19) makes clear, the United States should be taking a close look at China's energetic campaign of engagement with Africa, both for what it tells us about Chinese intentions and what it means for our interests.

The visible signs of Chinese engagement in Africa — from new soccer stadiums to better roads — are clear to any traveler to the continent. Unfortunately, in places like Angola, Zimbabwe and Sudan, China has also shown a willingness to support authoritarian or corrupt governments and ignore human rights violations.

China's willingness to do business with some of Africa's most repressive regimes is not only bad for Africa — it is also self-defeating. Corrupt African regimes harbor terrorists, mismanage economies and often generate regional instability that isn't in any nation's interest. As we learned during the cold war, American strategic interests in Africa will be advanced by sticking to our principles and by supporting good governance, democratic institutions and human rights. We should treat China's growing engagement in Africa not as a threat but as a reminder of the strategic significance of a part of the world too often ignored. In the vast and diverse continent of Africa, critically important partners, markets, and leaders — as well as real security threats — are emerging. The United States should ensure that our efforts and investments pay off for the people of Africa and international security.

Gabe Hudson's Lives column (Nov. 19) brought back some mixed memories. In 1955, I completed a similar course at Camp Lejeune. After graduation, I was kept on for a year as a platoon sergeant. The essay's conclusion struck a responsive chord; the guy you hate the most could be the one who saves your life. In 1960, as an infantry platoon leader, I had a C.O. who fit that description. He had received the Navy Cross for heroism at the Chosin Reservoir and drove us relentlessly. Though we all hated him, we also respected him. If our company went to war, he was the guy we wanted to lead us. But I do take issue with another part of Hudson's conclusion. The guys he called Meat and Potatoes stole a rifle from one of their fellow marines, his most important possession. In my day, that kind of action would rank right up there with losing your weapon. They were lucky to only get their butts chewed. Had they been my troops, I would have recommended them for nonjudicial punishment.

If I were now in Iraq and had Meat and Potatoes as my fellow squad members, I would be concerned. What kind of stunt might they hatch to teach another marine a lesson and get somebody killed in the process? Could I depend on them in combat? I think not.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

A Push To Fix The Fix On Wall Street (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton
The New York Times, December 17, 2006

AFTER Enron and then WorldCom foundered amid multibillion-dollar accounting scandals, exposing layers of corporate malfeasance that are still coming to light now, Washington moved belatedly but forcefully to stiffen regulations, toughen enforcement and improve corporate audits.

The goal was to shore up confidence in Wall Street, particularly among individual investors who had been pushed more than ever into the stock and bond markets by the decline of company pension and health-insurance plans, along with soaring college costs. Tales from thousands of investors who lost their life savings were a powerful indictment of lax government oversight.

Is the pendulum swinging back, to less federal oversight and more self regulation?

The question arises because prosecutors and regulators in Washington took steps last week — almost exactly five years after Enron filed for bankruptcy — to roll back some of the tough new measures adopted in that first blush of scandal.

The Justice Department started by saying it would restrict prosecutors in corporate corruption cases. The Securities and Exchange Commission followed a day later by proposing looser auditing standards for thousands of smaller public companies.

The timing was somewhat jarring. Fannie Mae, the nation's largest mortgage finance company, was suing its auditors last week for claiming they were negligent in helping to prepare financial statements that led to a $6.3 billion restatement of earnings, and The Wall Street Journal was uncovering a new scandal involving the improper back-dating of executive stock options.

Some investor groups and outside experts criticized the proposals, saying they open loopholes in the law that unscrupulous companies are likely to exploit, effectively defanging the post-Enron changes. But others said that the adjustments by the Justice Department and the commission did not represent a wholesale retreat.

Indeed, they suggested that the changes announced last week could actually benefit small investors by taking pressure off the new Congress to go much further in rolling back the post-Enron rules, as the United States Chamber of Commerce and other groups advocate. They are seeking to curtail shareholder lawsuits and cap the liability of accounting firms.

"We still are living under the shadow of Enron and WorldCom and that has tempered the business community's attempts at more precipitous action," said Joel Seligman, a securities law expert and authority on the history of the S.E.C. who is also the president of the University of Rochester.

Mr. Seligman and others also said that the commission's action on small companies, an interpretation of Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, was an appropriate trimming of a rule that was being applied to excess. That section requires public companies to assess their internal financial controls, a process that became a lightening rod for criticism because of its costs.

The Sarbanes-Oxley law was approved in 2002 as lawmakers grew concerned that they might be swept out of office by millions of middle- and lower-income investors who owned their share of the marketplace through mutual funds, I.R.A.'s, 401 (k)'s, and 529 college-savings programs.

Since then, as the scandals and trials have receded to the back pages, investors have poured even more money into the markets and a new and deregulatory-minded mood has taken hold in Washington. This Thursday, that movement will be on full display in a federal district court here, where a judge will consider a case that challenges the validity of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, a new agency created by the Sarbanes-Oxley law to oversee auditors.

Some business groups, as well as the treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson, have raised concerns that more companies are listing their stock overseas because of the regulatory climate in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0107287

Last month, a committee of academics and businessmen headed by R. Glenn Hubbard, the former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and now dean of the Columbia Business School, and John L. Thornton, a former president and co-chief operating officer of the Goldman Sachs Group and the current chairman of the Brookings Institution, proposed a series of measures they said would address this problem. The remedies include protecting corporations from criminal and civil cases, imposing new restrictions on shareholder lawsuits, and capping the liability of accounting firms.

AT the core of critics' arguments is the idea that American laws make foreign markets more attractive than domestic ones.

But some experts discount that link and point to other reasons why more companies are seeking out foreign markets. Listing and underwriting fees are significantly lower in many countries, and a number of companies that have recently listed in Europe and elsewhere overseas would never have met the disclosure or financial standards of American markets, even with the latest changes.

"You can reduce American regulations to zero and overseas markets would still be attractive to some companies," said Richard C. Breeden, a former chairman of the S.E.C. "The proportion of offerings in the United States is going down. But India is getting richer and China is getting richer, and these trends reflect that."

Wall Street firms like Goldman Sachs are also posting record earnings, Mr. Breeden added, a sign that American underwriters have not suffered.

Barbara Roper, director of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America, said it was also incorrect to blame shareholder lawsuits for the growing appeal of foreign markets, or to assert that such litigation has been unduly burdensome.

The number of securities lawsuits has steadily and dramatically declined in recent years, Ms. Roper said, with a 45 percent drop in the first six months of this year. On an annualized basis, she added, the number of cases are at the lowest level in 10 years.

Ms. Roper attributed the trend to better corporate governance and the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. Moreover, only five shareholder lawsuits cited accounting firms in 2005; in the first half of this year, only one.

Other experts said that last week's actions could represent the high water mark for the retrenchment.

"Given the significant amount of change that took place, I'm not surprised that there is this counterrevolution," said Charles M. Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. "What is significant is that there is no attempt here to throw the piano out the window. What we are seeing instead is simply a movement of the furniture around the room. The changes being made are really at the margins and there remains a broad consensus that the bigger changes that were made were reasonable ones."

Justice, SEC Actions Backpedal A Bit On Post-scandal Rules (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, December 17, 2006

WASHINGTON -- They were two early Christmas gifts for corporate America -- with potentially far-reaching effects for investors and the financial landscape.

At the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, separate actions last week both had the effect of easing landmark rules laid down in response to the 2002 crisis of corporate malfeasance.

Culminating an intense monthslong lobbying campaign by an array of companies, the five SEC commissioners voted at a public meeting Wednesday to propose a plan giving corporate managers more flexibility in assessing the strength of internal financial controls. It would especially benefit smaller companies.

The sweeping anti-fraud law known as Sarbanes-Oxley was enacted in 2002 amid the wave of scandals that engulfed Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and other big corporations.

The law contains a key section requiring public companies to assess the strength of their internal safeguards to ensure that their financial statements are accurate.

Companies have complained to the SEC that those rules are overly burdensome and costly, especially for smaller businesses.

The Justice Department, meanwhile, restricted its prosecutors' ability to crack down on companies that withhold confidential information during criminal fraud investigations, in new guidelines issued Tuesday that clipped back the aggressive legal tactics authorized after the scandals.

They bar the government from seeking harsher penalties for companies that won't cooperate with prosecutors -- either by denying the prosecutors corporate attorney-client communications or by helping their employees under investigation by covering their legal fees.

"The real issue is how do you get the balance right?" said Joel Seligman, the president of the University of Rochester and an expert on securities law.

DOJ_NMG_0107288

The new policy might be closer to striking a balance between the need to prosecute corporate crime and the "unequivocal" right of defendants to litigate, he suggested.

The policy "is going to set the tone," Seligman said.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, who wrote the new guidelines, said they won't hinder prosecutors from vigorously pursuing companies accused of fraud and other white-collar crimes.

But critics, including a group representing whistle-blowers, called the changes a setback for shareholders and employees who risk losing billions if scandal-tainted corporations aren't fully prosecuted.

They accused the Justice Department of caving in to pressure from business interests.

The actions by both the Justice Department, which carries out the Bush administration's policies, and the independent regulator SEC might eliminate the need for Congress to act in similar veins.

Some business-friendly Democrats who are assuming power positions in January have expressed support for Sarbanes-Oxley relief for companies -- and their preference for the SEC to wield its regulatory scalpel as opposed to Congress' heavier hand of legislation.

The SEC move was a "reasonable approach" in light of the disproportionate burden of the financial-control rules on small companies, said James Cox, a professor at Duke University who also is a securities-law specialist.

Still, he said, with more leeway under the SEC plan -- allowing, for example, less stringent testing of internal controls for some companies, "Those (financial) numbers are going to be less trustworthy than they would be otherwise. ... Investor protection's going to suffer."

SEC officials insisted that would not happen. Agency Chairman Christopher Cox called the new plan "making Sarbanes-Oxley work for investors at the right price."

McNulty said the new prosecutorial policy should help companies curb fraud internally by encouraging open talk between corporate attorneys and their clients. "It, in no way, slows down the ability to prosecute these cases successfully," he said.

The actions of both agencies follow a report issued last month by an influential private-sector group, the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, that has been part of the business push for a softening of the laws and rules that flowed from the 2002 scandals. That campaign has gained traction with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson questioning recently whether regulations are hurting the competitiveness of U.S. financial markets by driving some companies away from them.

Among the committee's recommendations: easing of the financial-control rules under Sarbanes-Oxley and tightening the legal standard the government must meet to charge companies with crimes.

The group also urged reducing the liability of auditors in shareholder lawsuits over accounting fraud and a shift to a financial regulatory system based on principles rather than rules.

Closer Look At Corporate Pay (AP)

By Marcy Gordon

AP, December 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Investors are getting access to clearer and more detailed information from public companies on their top executives' pay packages and perks under federal rules that took effect on Friday.

Companies' 2006 annual reports issued early next year will reflect the changes, which were ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission in July in a major overhaul of disclosure rules for executive compensation.

The new requirements include disclosure of the dating of stock option grants to executives. Companies must provide detailed information on how they determine when executives receive option grants and, if they do so, how and why they backdate options. Suspect timing of option grants has turned into corporate America's scandal of the year, with more than 100 companies under investigation by the SEC or the Justice Department, more than $5 billion in profit erased by restatements and 18 CEOs swept out of office.

An academic study completed this fall found that corporate executives gained an average of $600,000 a year each from backdating of stock options between 2000 and 2004. By contrast, shareholders were hurt by an average loss in market value of 8 percent, or $500 million, for each affected company from the negative publicity of being under government investigation, the researchers at the University of Michigan found.

When stock options are backdated, they are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price — fattening profit for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices.

Backdating options can be legal as long as the practice is disclosed properly to investors and approved by the company's board. In some cases, however, the practice can run afoul of federal accounting and tax laws.

DOJ_NMG_0107289

For the first time, under the new disclosure rules, companies are required to furnish tables in annual filings showing the total yearly compensation for their chief executive officers, chief financial officers and the next three highest-paid executives. Most of the disclosures, in annual reports and other regulatory filings, must be written in plain English.

The rules were designed to enhance corporate accountability and address an issue that has angered company shareholders and the public: lavish compensation for executives, unrelated to their performance, even as companies stumble and lay off employees.

In the SEC's 72-year history, no other issue has stirred as much interest, with more than 20,000 letters filed during the public comment period that followed the proposal being floated last January, according to agency officials.

The SEC removed from its original proposal, though, a requirement for companies to disclose the pay details of as many as three non-executive employees whose individual compensation exceeds that of any of their top five executives.

Federal Finance Probe Still Lives (MACT)

By Travis Fain

The Macon Telegraph, December 17, 2006

Federal investigators served the city of Macon's finance office with two subpoenas in the past three months, seeking massive amounts of information in an ongoing Justice Department inquiry into the city's use of federal grants.

The subpoenas, released to The Telegraph under the Georgia Open Records Act, commanded the city to turn over financial data as part of a Justice Department investigation into "allegations of misconduct."

The first subpoena, dated Sept. 29, demanded documentation for every purchase card transaction made by the Macon Police Department from June 2002 through July 2004. The other, dated Dec. 4, sought documentation for 63 separate journal entries in city financial records.

Federal investigators, by law, cannot comment on an ongoing investigation or even confirm its existence, U.S. Attorney Max Wood said. But several city sources, including Macon Finance Director Adah Roberts and Mayor Jack Ellis, said the subpoenas appear to target the city's so-called faith-based program.

That program, a federally funded initiative run by the Macon Police Department in 2002 and 2003, is officially called the Safe Schools Initiative. That program, which split a $1 million grant between the city and various church youth programs, was one of several city initiatives that a Bibb County grand jury investigation targeted before District Attorney Howard Simms handed the inquiry over to the U.S. Attorney's Office in July 2005.

The subpoenas show that inquiry continues, though few details have leaked out.

City Councilwoman Elaine Lucas said the public is ready for answers and an end to the investigation.

"I think anything that's at the federal level is serious," she said. "And I would hope that with this kind of in-depth investigation that we would finally know the truth ... good or bad."

Since the investigation was turned over to federal officials, several area preachers and former city employees told The Telegraph they have been contacted by an investigator asking questions about the Safe Schools Initiative.

Police Chief Mike Burns said the police department received its own subpoena from the Justice Department in August. That subpoena called for "documentation on all federal grants for the police department from fiscal years 2002 through 2004," Burns wrote in an e-mail to The Telegraph.

Ellis on Friday directed questions about the most recent subpoenas to former Police Chief Rodney Monroe, who headed the department during the Safe Schools Initiative. Monroe left in early 2005 to become chief of the Richmond, Va., police department. He has not returned phone calls seeking comment about the initiative in the past and did not respond to a phone message or an e-mail Friday.

Said Ellis: "I have all the faith and trust in Chief Monroe that this grant was executed in a proper manner. ... Whatever information (investigators) have asked for, as far as I know, has been provided."

The September subpoena took several weeks for the city to fill. In late October, numerous boxes of information were carried by firefighters from City Hall to the Bibb County District Attorney's Office, where assistant district attorney Sharrell Lewis works. Lewis has been assigned to the U.S. Attorney's Office to help with the case.

"It was 40-something (boxes) as I recall," Simms said. "It filled up half the hallway."

Simms said his office called the U.S. Attorney's Office and the boxes were picked up, but he's not sure where they were taken. The U.S. attorney has an office in Macon, but the subpoenas state that the documents were bound for the Office of the Inspector General in Arlington, Va. Letters accompanying both subpoenas are signed by the special agent in charge of the Department of Justice's Fraud Detection Office there.

The December subpoena has not yet been filled, and the deadline is Jan. 5.

DOJ_NMG_0107290

The information will join an already huge cache of documents collected in the inquiry, which now spans more than two and a half years. That includes the local grand jury investigation and the current federal one. Simms has said his office compiled more than 500,000 documents into 50 three-ring binders during his involvement.

No one has been indicted as a result of the inquiry, and Ellis has repeatedly referred to the investigation as a politically motivated witch hunt. Though not indicted by the grand jury, former City Finance Director Kelly Clark was arrested on a conspiracy charge in 2005. But that charge was dismissed, which Ellis has pointed to as a vindication.

City Council President Anita Ponder said a federal inquiry is obviously a concern.

"Any time there's a federal subpoena for any reason," she said, "that's a red flag. ... The jury is still out in my mind as to the severity of it."

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Attorney General: Hub's Violent Crime Grave Concern (BOSH)

By O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, December 16, 2006

The blood spilled on Boston's streets this year drew the attention of the nation's top prosecutor yesterday as he attended a conference on gang violence at a time when the city hopes a fractured gang truce can stop a street war from erupting.

"I am concerned that, despite the diligence of the men and women in this room, preliminary crime reports in Boston for the first six months of this year show an increase in violent crime," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Nonfatal shootings are up 10 percent this year, while fatal shootings are up 13 percent. With 71 murders on the year, Boston is approaching last year's 10-year record homicide total of 75.

Gonzales, who was in town to speak at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood Conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center, said the feds have put street violence under a microscope, not just in Boston, but across the country.

"To help cities like Boston - and any city or state facing a violent crime challenge - Justice Department officals have been traveling the country, meeting with state and local law enforcement in areas that have violent crime increases and those that have experienced decreases so we can better understand why in each case," he said.

In Boston, a cease-fire between long-feuding gangbangers from H-Block and Heath Street was strained when H-Block peacemaker Jahmol Norfleet, 20, was murdered.

Sexual Assault Stats May Not Tell Whole Story (STAMADV)

By Natasha Lee

The Stamford Advocate, December 17, 2006

The afternoon rape of a woman inside a downtown hotel parking garage in October was one of 22 reported in Stamford this year and reflects a gradual increase in reported rapes over the last four years.

Such statistics and public attention on sexual predators, including "To Catch a Predator" on "Dateline NBC" and high-profile sex-assault cases, such as one involving Duke University lacrosse players, would suggest sexual violence is on a rapid rise. National statistics, however, indicate otherwise.

Rape has dipped more than 85 percent since the 1970s, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. Last year, the number of rapes decreased by nearly 2 percent nationwide, even as other violent crimes increased, the FBI reported.

Law enforcement officials say the trend could be the result of an increased jail population, and that rapists, who often commit other crimes such as burglary and robberies, are behind bars.

Although the national statistics might be applauded, some experts and advocates aren't clapping just yet.

Victim advocates and experts say the numbers are unreliable, and that despite greater awareness and outreach with crisis centers, support groups and hot lines, rape remains an underreported crime.

Some advocates and crisis centers are leery about accepting data that is not representative of the population they serve, said Susan Howley, director of public policy for the Washington D.C.-based National Center for Victims of Crime.

"Sexual assault advocates have reservations," she said. "Especially when sexual assault groups are not seeing the number of clients decline and still have more people coming through than they can serve."

Advocates say surveys, such as the National Crime Victimization Survey conducted by the Justice Department, exclude populations more vulnerable to rape and other sex crimes, including homeless victims, mentally ill and disabled victims, and immigrant victims. The survey said only 38 percent of rapes and sexual assaults were reported last year.

DOJ_NMG_0107291

The annual survey, released last year, interviews about 134,000 people, 12 years and older, about crimes committed against them.

The statistics don't reveal much about the crime, said Dean Kilpatrick, director of the National Crime Victims Research & Treatment Center in Charleston, S.C. For instance, the survey does not indicate what types of rape, such as date rape or stranger rape, are increasing or decreasing - information that could help crisis centers and advocates target groups most likely affected, he said.

Also, the survey limits its definition of rape to sexual intercourse by penetration, which could lead to the exclusion of many cases, Kilpatrick said.

"It is so insensitive to picking up rape cases that it doesn't make a lot of sense to put great credence in terms of the data," he said.

In Stamford, reported rape cases peaked in 1998 and 1999, with 32 and 35 respectively, according to police. Those same years, the Justice Department reported 0.9 rapes for every 1,000 people. Stamford's population in the 2000 census was about 180,000.

Stamford police statistics show a sharp decline the following year, with nine reported rapes in 2000, but the numbers crept back up in subsequent years. Last year, 18 cases of rape were reported in Stamford, up from 12 in 2004.

Stamford police say the higher numbers don't necessarily mean an increase in assaults. The increase could suggest more victims are coming forward, said Stamford Officer Joanne Anzenberger, who helps train officers on how to handle victims of sexual assault.

Anzenberger credits improved police training and the department working with the Stamford-based Sexual Assault Crisis & Education Center for contributing to the increase.

"Better training . . . results in a professional approach that does not leave the victim feeling as though she is being assaulted a second time by uncaring police officers," she said.

Officers' approach to rape victims has also changed over the last 25 years, Anzenberger said.

"(Police) used to expect you to fight them (attackers) off. . . . If someone is holding a gun to you and demanding that you give them money, are you going to put up a fight? Why is this any different?" she said.

Still, the national decline remains a mystery.

Local advocates and law enforcement officials say those numbers warrant several explanations.

One might be that while there are fewer incidents of stranger rape, victims sexually assaulted by relatives or friends are remaining silent.

"The national statistic speaks to the myth of the guy jumping out of the bushes and sexually assaulting a woman," said Cathy Malloy, executive director of the crisis center in Stamford. The center serves lower Fairfield County, and has provided services to victims 21Ú2 years old to age 94.

Often, victims of acquaintance rape are reluctant to report the crime because they may not recognize the attack as a crime, feel shame or worry about being believed or blamed, advocates say.

Even with strong victims' rights laws and efforts by police and prosecutors to help ease the process of reporting a rape, people still don't like to talk about it.

"It's like AIDS, there's less of a stigma than there was, but there still is," said Kari Pesavento, the center's director of operations. "It's still the only crime that people are blamed for. If I get mugged, then the suspect is blamed. But in cases of rape, the victim is blamed for what happened to them."

For fiscal years 2004 to 2006, the center served 762 victims of sexual assault, and officials say the center has not seen a dramatic decline.

"We've been here for 30 years, and we're still struggling," said Malloy, whose husband is Stamford Mayor Dannel Malloy. "We wish we could be out of business, but we're busier than we've ever been and we're using every ounce we have to raise awareness."

High-profile rape cases, such as the cases of basketball star Kobe Bryant and William Kennedy Smith, may have an impact a victim's willingness to come forward out of fear of public criticism and exposure of their personal lives, said Dr. Kathleen Casey Jordan, a professor of justice and law administration at Western Connecticut State University in Danbury.

Still, there has been progress. Women are more careful about putting themselves at risk, Jordan said.

"Women are a lot more savvy about their behaviors. Women have reconciled that they have the right to walk alone, drink alone, flirt with men, but these behaviors are often stupid, and irresponsible, not illegal, but not wise," she said.

Sexual assault education is also increasing, not only in schools and on college campuses, but in church groups and other organizations, Pesavento said.

DOJ_NMG_0107292

"I think the biggest message that anyone can send to a victim is that they're in control and that if they need help, there's places out there to help," she said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

HIGH BLACK ARREST RATE RAISES CALL FOR INQUIRY Range Of Explanations Offered By Experts, Officials For S.F.'s Disparity With Other Cities (SFC)

By Susan Sward

San Francisco Chronicle, December 17, 2006

San Francisco police arrest African Americans for serious crime at a much higher rate than officers in California's other biggest cities.

Black people in San Francisco are arrested for felonies at nearly twice the rate they are in Sacramento. They are arrested at twice the rate of black people in Fresno, three times the rate in San Jose, Los Angeles, Long Beach and San Diego, and four times the rate in Oakland.

The disparity between San Francisco's black felony arrest rates and the seven other largest cities' -- measured by the number of African Americans arrested per 1,000 black residents -- is so large that many experts and civic leaders who reviewed the numbers said they are "disturbing" and require an investigation.

The numbers prompt several questions, all of which basically boil down to this: Is the high arrest rate of African Americans because of the way the San Francisco Police Department does its policing, or because of criminal activity within the community?

Mayor Gavin Newsom and Police Chief Heather Fong said they do not think the department is going after African Americans in an unfair manner. They also said they were consulting experts to try to learn why the arrest numbers look the way they do.

Newsom said he found the numbers "outrageous" but was not shocked by them because of the time he has spent attempting to tackle the root causes of poverty.

"There is no question in my mind that this deserves immediate attention and investigation, and I will be doing that," Newsom said. He said the investigation would be conducted by a University of South Florida criminologist, Lorie Fridell, who will "do aggressive data analysis" of the arrest numbers and report back to him and Fong in about two months.

While Fong said the arrest numbers merit review, she suggested that the disparity exists in part because the perception that sometimes San Francisco is "soft on crime" may draw criminals from out of the city who feel they can come here and "not be held accountable."

Fong's staff said they hand-counted arrests made by the Tenderloin Task Force last year and found that more than 60 percent of the African Americans arrested were listed on booking cards as "no local" -- a term often applied to transients -- or gave addresses outside San Francisco. The department does not have similar data for other districts besides the Tenderloin, which police looked at because they believe many nonresidents are involved in drug dealing and other crimes there.

San Francisco officers arrest criminal suspects as they find them, not based on the color of their skin, Fong said.

"I don't think just by looking at the numbers, you can prove or disprove that there is any targeting," she said, adding that factors such as repeat offenders and out-of-town criminals influence the numbers.

Others who reviewed the numbers for The Chronicle found them startling.

"What is significant about these numbers is that they beg serious attention," said San Francisco District Attorney Kamala Harris. "These numbers are clearly based on a legitimate collection of data and are not based on emotional cries."

Merrick Bobb, a nationally recognized expert in police practices, said the city must look harder to explain the numbers.

"The strongly disparate impact of San Francisco policing on African Americans begs for a convincing set of reasons based solidly on empirical fact," said Bobb, who heads a nonprofit organization in Los Angeles that advises departments nationwide.

"The SFPD, to date, has not persuasively explained what legitimate factors cause San Francisco to have felony arrest patterns so different" from the state's other biggest cities, Bobb said.

Sheriff Michael Hennessey, who runs the city's jails and has tracked their racial composition for years, said his lockup population reflects the black arrest rate. "The disparity is just incredibly dramatic," he said. "If you are an adult white male, your chances of being in my jail are 1 in 365, and if you are an adult black male, your chances are 1 in 23."

The Chronicle began examining the city's black felony arrest rate after its investigation of the department's use of force, published in February, found officers were arresting African Americans and reporting use of force on them at rates about five times greater than their presence in the city's population.

San Francisco police cited several factors they say contribute to African Americans accounting for about half of all felony arrests in the city, where they are less than 8 percent of the population. In 2005, 1 out of 3 arrests of black people involved narcotics.

Officers interviewed by The Chronicle said most of the dealers coming from out of town by BART or car to sell drugs -- primarily crack cocaine and sometimes methamphetamine -- are African Americans. Moreover, said Capt. Timothy Hettrich, head of the narcotics division, black drug dealers often sell out in the open on street corners, thus increasing their chances for arrest.

Fong also has said that some of the offenders are arrested time and again, thereby increasing the black arrest numbers.

Also, she said, the department has had to devote a lot of resources to combatting gangs of youths responsible for many of the city's black-on-black homicides. William Whitfield, an African American officer who has worked in the department for more than a decade, said factors such as out-of-town criminals do affect arrests.

"I've seen that with my own eyes -- I got a guy once with an automatic weapon around his neck on a shoestring coming off of BART," Whitfield said. "He had the weapon under his jacket, and I was buying dope undercover. I saw him walk up from BART, and when they moved in and arrested him and the crew he was working with, they found the weapon. He was an Oakland guy."

Whitfield said many black criminals today quickly resort to violence and this occurs at a younger and younger age. People are "selling dope in the Sunset, don't get me wrong, but they aren't shooting each other over it, and they are out in the Bayview and the Fillmore. It's not all about dope and gangs, either, because you've got that everywhere. Sometimes a shooting is a personal beef, sometimes it's jealousy, sometimes it's as simple as, 'You were looking at my girlfriend.' "

'Disturbing' numbers

Many experts acknowledge that the factors Fong and her officers cite may contribute to the city's black arrest rate. They also note that in cities throughout America, African Americans are arrested in numbers that exceed their presence in the population.

But they say the black arrest rate in San Francisco is so much higher than other California cities that the disparity cannot be explained completely by the factors cited by police.

"America's criminal justice system disproportionately affects African Americans, and San Francisco is no exception," said Bobb, the police practices expert. "What stands out in this city is the degree of disproportion, which is higher than what I've seen elsewhere on the West Coast."

Joseph Marshall, a member of the San Francisco Police Commission and co-founder of the Omega Boys Club who has worked with at-risk youth for decades, said he knows the Police Department has made a concerted effort to combat black gang violence "to reduce the homicides, and those numbers are down."

But he added: "These numbers on arrest rates are disturbing and scream for an explanation. Is there something going on within the SFPD that makes the numbers so different?"

James Bell, executive director of the San Francisco-based W. Haywood Burns Institute for Juvenile Justice Fairness and Equity, has been wrestling for years with Marshall's question. About 60 percent of juveniles detained in the city are black.

"If you are an intelligent, caring person in San Francisco, you should be disquieted that in a supposedly liberal city, black youths are so much in the overwhelming majority among the detainees," Bell said. "The numbers are just too disparate for anyone to credibly advance the 'you-do-the-crime, you-do-the-time' syndrome as an explanation. To believe these numbers, you'd have to believe that white kids in places like the Haight and the Sunset are basically doing no crime."

Hettrich, who heads the narcotics division, says numbers don't convey what police confront.

"The real story is we go after the drugs, and we go where we have had complaints," Hettrich said in a ride-along interview where he pointed out drug dealing hot spots around the city and the high numbers of African Americans and Latinos making sales. "Those arrest numbers may indicate we are doing a good job in areas where we have had complaints.

"Color means nothing to us," Hettrich said. "We are prejudiced against dealers."

David Dockery, an African American officer who walks a beat in the predominantly black Hunters Point housing projects, said most citizens "want more of us out there. If I could stand in front of their houses all day long, that's what they'd like."

Dockery and his African American partner, Officer Mike Robinson, said the department's crime chasing is "color blind." They also said what many officers believe -- that criminals are drawn to San Francisco because they feel that if caught, their punishment in the courts will be lighter than it would be in surrounding counties. "We know a guy with four cases pending," Robinson said. "Where does this stop?"

Answers, not speculation

San Francisco's high black arrest rate is not of recent origin: 20 years ago, San Francisco was making black felony arrests at a rate much higher than California's seven other largest cities, state Justice Department reports show. In 1986, for example,

DOJ_NMG_0107294

San Francisco's black felony arrest rate was almost 45 percent greater than Los Angeles' and almost 51 percent higher than Oakland's.

In the decades since then, San Francisco's black felony arrest rate has climbed by more than 35 percent while the other seven major California cities' rates have dropped -- often by a considerable amount. During those 20 years, Los Angeles' black felony arrest rate dropped by more than 36 percent and Oakland's declined by more than 52 percent.

When evaluating why San Francisco's black arrest numbers are so different from the other cities', Bobb said speculation is not productive.

"It is not helpful, in the absence of thorough research and hard evidence, for the SFPD merely to speculate as to possible reasons, just as it is unproductive for others to speculate that there must be police antipathy to African Americans," Bobb said.

A second review was conducted at The Chronicle's request by Samuel Walker, a criminal justice professor emeritus from the University of Nebraska, Omaha, who has consulted with the U.S. Justice Department on matters ranging from police use of force to questions of race-based civil rights violations by police agencies.

Walker concluded that San Francisco police are targeting black people in their law enforcement efforts. To him, the numbers indicate that "many law-abiding citizens" are confronted by officers "solely because of their skin color."

"No other factor than race could possibly explain the San Francisco arrest data given the fact that they are so far out of line compared with other departments," Walker said.

Two figures in San Francisco's criminal justice system expressed similar conclusions.

Public Defender Jeff Adachi said that he does not believe the department has a go-after-black-suspects plan, but he added that by focusing on heavily black neighborhoods plagued by crime and violence, police inevitably drive black arrest numbers up and often use those high numbers as proof they are in the right spots to catch the criminals.

"I believe that the San Francisco Police Department has focused its efforts, in terms of 'crime crackdowns,' in those neighborhoods where there is a high concentration of blacks -- the Western Addition, Tenderloin, Visitacion Valley, Potrero Hill, Ingleside Terrace and Bayview-Hunters Point," he said. "This has long been the trend since the crack cocaine epidemic, when task forces were formed to focus buy-bust operations in those neighborhoods."

Sheriff Hennessey said the problem does not just lie with the police.

"I think this is a reflection of institutionalized racism: You are more likely to get arrested for the same act if you're black, you are more likely to be retained in jail for the same crime if you are black, and society is more likely to care less about your incarceration if you are black," Hennessey said.

Officers in the department said they go where the crime and violence is happening.

Mikail Ali and Toney Chaplin, African American inspectors in the gang task force, said police concentrate their efforts on areas where violence is occurring.

"African American youth are shooting each other at a rate far greater than other groups, so we try to get those kids on some charge if we can't get them on a homicide," Chaplin said. Ali added: "Social neglect by the community, government and business have caused environments populated predominantly by black people to be conducive to crime and violence, and law enforcement ends up having to deal with the bottom line -- young black kids killing one another at a disproportionate rate."

The community perception

Chief Fong says officers are taught to treat all citizens equally. Police Academy recruits are given 52 hours of training -- more than twice the state requirement -- on discrimination and cultural diversity as it relates to African Americans, and other races and segments of society, including gays and lesbians, seniors and the homeless.

But in San Francisco's black neighborhoods, many believe police give them special attention.

At the Ella Hill Hutch Community Center -- a hub of activity for African American youths living in the Western Addition -- Executive Director George Smith says he is blunt with young people about what he believes they face.

"I tell young kids that you shouldn't break the law because this is a system so poised to arrest young African American males," Smith said.

Guy Hudson, who works two jobs as a city athletics coach and as a security guard, knows many of the kids in black neighborhoods all over town, and he said that many black people believe they often can "talk things over" with police in San Francisco when that wouldn't work in Oakland, Santa Clara or Daly City.

Even so, Hudson says, it's a reality that police focus on black people in San Francisco. He recalls the time three officers stopped him in Hunters Point after he "drove down a hill a little fast" and they emerged from their car "pointing guns at my head."

Hudson, 42, said he asked them, "Out in the avenues, would you be jumping out of your car with an automatic machinegun?"

DOJ_NMG_0107295

The police eventually let him go. Before they drove off, Hudson said, one of them told him that someone recently had fired shots at an officer on Harbor Road. Hudson said he responded: "That gives you the right to pull pistols on everyone in the community?"

Police Commissioner Marshall, who is African American, wrote a book, "Street Soldier," in which he described the deep-seated antipathy black people hold for police. "There's not a black person I know who doesn't see the police as an occupying force in the community. At the same time, though, I'm convinced that if black folks stopped blowing each other's brains out, they'd be in a much better position to deal with police issues."

However, there are African Americans who approve of the way officers conduct themselves in their neighborhoods.

Al Harris, who lives in the Ingleside and works as an organizer for the Safety Network group, which is funded by the Mayor's Office of Criminal Justice, says police often have to confront a "pretty rough world -- you go into neighborhoods and you're hated. In some neighborhoods, it's instilled from when kids are little that the police are the enemy."

"I think the police are doing a pretty good job," Harris added. "I know officers who do all kinds of good stuff for the kids, participating in community events, giving toys at Christmas, hundreds of turkeys at Thanksgiving."

Asked about whether it appears that police are targeting black people for arrest, Harris said: "Definitely not. There's no need to target the African American kids. They're the ones out on the streets selling the drugs."

Earlier study

The numbers revealing the high arrest rate of black people in the city are not the first statistical indication that African Americans get special police attention.

In 2002 the American Civil Liberties Union issued a report, "A Department in Denial: The San Francisco Police Department's Failure To Address Racial Profiling," which found black motorists were more than three times as likely to be searched as whites after a traffic stop.

That year San Francisco police arrested black people for felonies at the department's highest rate in the years reviewed by The Chronicle -- 171 for every 1,000 African Americans in the city's population.

The next year, the department adopted a new general order establishing its commitment to "unbiased policing" and stating officers "must be able to articulate specific facts and circumstances that support reasonable suspicion or probable cause" for detaining, stopping, arresting and searching citizens or seizing their property.

The black arrest rate began to drop. In 2003 it was 150 per 1,000, in 2004 it was 146, and in 2005 it was 145. Even in that last year, though, the rate was three times higher than Los Angeles, San Jose, Long Beach and San Diego and four times higher than Oakland.

Search for explanation

Looking at the 2000 U.S. census to try to find possible reasons for the arrest rate, The Chronicle found some similarities and some differences between San Francisco and the seven other cities.

Like black residents of those other cities, San Francisco African Americans' median household income lags considerably behind that of the city's total population, and their level of education is also typically years behind that of the total population.

Police Commissioner Marshall says answers that might seem at least part of the explanation -- such as poverty, lack of education and the flight of large numbers of middle-class black residents from the city in recent decades -- end up providing no real guidance, because those patterns are found in other cities where the arrest rates are far lower.

In two ways, though, San Francisco does stand out: During the 1990s, the city's African American population declined faster than in any other major U.S. city, dropping by 23 percent, according to 2000 census figures.

The black percentage of population also dropped in Oakland, San Jose, Los Angeles and San Diego. In Fresno, Long Beach and Sacramento, it rose somewhat. Today San Francisco, which is 7.8 percent African American, has the second smallest proportion of black people among the state's eight biggest cities. San Jose, with 3.5 percent, has the smallest, and Oakland, with almost 36 percent, has the largest.

A second difference involved unemployment numbers. While African Americans in all the cities had high unemployment numbers, only in San Francisco was their unemployment rate -- 6.2 percent -- more than double that of the rest of the population.

Need for investigation

Walker, the Nebraska criminal justice professor, said San Francisco's high black arrest rate should be investigated by the U.S. Justice Department and the state attorney general's office.

Fong said she did not feel the need for a state or U.S. Justice Department investigation of San Francisco's black felony arrest rate. Instead, she said she was consulting with outside experts and plans a review of department policies to see if changes are warranted.

DOJ_NMG_0107296

She added that the department's efforts to analyze its arrest record are made difficult by the fact its record keeping system is being overhauled and she can't "go to a computer right now and pull up arrest data with all this information you have spoken about."

Newsom said while he is convinced there is no "significant racial profiling in our department," he cannot "in good conscience defend the disparity" between San Francisco and other cities' black arrest rates. Referring to the arrest numbers, he said, "On face value, they are outrageous."

The mayor added that as he has worked to push programs tackling concentrated poverty in the city, such as a tax credit for working families, he has concluded "the issues of crime for me are overwhelmingly correlated with issues of poverty."

Newsom added that Fridell, the University of South Florida associate professor of criminology selected by the city to review its arrest data, was picked in part because she has special expertise in the area of racial profiling.

One way or another, San Francisco has to discover why it is arresting black citizens at a higher rate than the other California cities, said Bobb, the Los Angeles police practices expert.

What is at stake is the concept of equal treatment under the law, he said.

"The Supreme Court has held that the Constitution prohibits selective enforcement of the law based on considerations such as race," Bobb said. "Courts across the country have ruled that using impermissible racial classifications in determining whom to stop, detain and search violates the equal protection clause."

Walker, the law enforcement expert who has consulted for the Justice Department, says the San Francisco Police Department "should be looking at its own operation to see if there's anything it could be doing differently."

The equal protection under law guarantee of the 14th Amendment is "the bedrock of all civil rights laws in the United States and a fundamental principle upon which our country is based," he said.

Jack Jacqua, who founded the Omega Boys Club with Marshall, said the policing of black people in San Francisco is a problem for the city and its leaders.

While he acknowledged that police have "the most dangerous, difficult job in America," he said they "most times treat poor kids from the hood differently than they do more affluent kids."

Jacqua, who has devoted his life to working with at-risk youths, added that many black youths come from "a population where there is virtually no middle class because the middle class people can't afford to live here, and many of these youngsters end up in the criminal justice system."

It works this way, Jacqua said: If a kid shoplifts in the Sunset District, police are probably going to call Mom and Dad and have them take their child home. "But if you shoplift downtown and your address is in the Bayview, then they will take you to jail."

As for the black community, he said much of it "is a mess -- it's destroying itself. Not enough people are involved in standing up and challenging these youngsters to take responsibility for their lives. Where is the leadership?"

And what of the city's liberal political establishment that has reigned for many years?

"The bottom line," said Jacqua, "is that poor blacks are in the way of what this city wants to be, though the city won't admit it because 'we're liberal and believe in diversity.' But the city really doesn't want poor folks and especially poor black folks."

VOICES: From double standards to police strategy to social factors, there's no tidy explanation

Heather Fong, San Francisco police chief: "I support the crime-fighting efforts of the officers of this department, who day after day, under challenging and perilous circumstances, work tirelessly to protect the people of San Francisco, and do so in an impartial manner."

Victoria Gray, social worker for the nonprofit Family Service Agency: "If you are out here black, selling drugs and your pockets full of drugs and you get busted and holler 'Racism!' -- that's not racism. ... Of course there's racism. This is America. But everything isn't linked to racism. ... You have to understand all our men want is a piece of the American pie, the American dream. I don't blame them for wanting some of the pie, but I blame them for how they go about it."

Damone Hale, member of the San Francisco Juvenile Probation Commission and an attorney who has represented many young African Americans: "You see officers whose talk is rude and disrespectful, and time and again the only distinguishing factors we could find is that the defendant is African American. It's consistent and this treatment is permitted by our society."

Arlene Ackerman, former San Francisco school superintendent now teaching at Columbia University's Teachers College in New York City: "I believe that race in San Francisco is the elephant in the room and people refuse to talk about it and if you bring it up, then you are the racist. I felt more uncomfortable as a black person in San Francisco than I have felt in any other city. ... Someone has to be courageous and step up and address the issue of race in the city, starting in the education system and moving through the criminal justice system."

Delores Jones-Brown, a former prosecutor who is interim director of the Center on Race, Crime and Justice at the City University of New York's John Jay College of Criminal Justice: "Typically when we see disproportionate arrest rates for African Americans or other minorities, it is because the police have focused their forces or hot-spot policing on areas with large minority populations. What is the harm of targeting? Innocent people who are unfortunate enough to live in economically depressed neighborhoods aren't given the same measure of constitutional rights as their more affluent counterparts: They are stopped and frisked, have their cars and persons searched even without permission -- simply by virtue of where they live. It's unacceptable."

William Whitfield, officer who joined the San Francisco Police Department in 1994: "If I had to put my finger on one thing, it's the homes. I look at the kids on the corners, and 9 times out of 10 there's no dad and maybe 7 times out of 10 there's no mom in their lives and they are being raised by an aunt or grandma. Kids aren't being raised as I was -- there's just not that accountability in the homes. If they had someone at home they knew they had to answer to, that would stop a whole lot of it."

Tim Nichols, ex-San Francisco police officer, on the high black arrest rate: "It comes from the fact the majority of officers who want to take on criminals are in the Bayview and the Fillmore, which are heavily black. I don't believe it's racism. ... Officers have to pick and choose the severity of the crime they want to spend their time on, and officers who make a lot of arrests generally go after hard-core criminals." He also said black drug dealers are particularly visible: "How often do you see a group of whites standing on the street corner selling narcotics? Generally whites don't sell on the corner."

Sharen Hewitt, director of the Community Leadership Academy and Emergency Response project, which helps connect low-income clients with services, said when she has watched what happens on a Friday night on Union Street where the crowds are predominantly white, she finds "kids tearing up, fighting, smoking marijuana, drinking in the streets, guys being abusive to women, young men publicly urinating, and I don't see a whole lot of them being arrested. Some of these behaviors are developmentally appropriate, but I don't think African American young men get the luxury of having errors."

Reaction Mixed On Federal Lawsuit Charging Anti-Hispanic Bias (LH)

By Bill Hughes

Lower Hudson Journal News, December 17, 2006

PORT CHESTER - Village residents had a wide range of reactions yesterday to the news that federal officials have filed a lawsuit aimed at forcing an election district system that would increase the likelihood a Hispanic candidate could win a seat on the Board of Trustees.

Out of dozens of residents interviewed yesterday, only a handful were aware that the U.S. Department of Justice has been pressuring the village to address concerns that a municipality where more than 46 percent of the population self-identified as Hispanic in the last census does not have a single Hispanic elected official on its six-member Board of Trustees.

That pressure culminated with Friday's announcement that the department is suing the village to force some course of action to change the situation.

Among those who knew about the situation, there was wide disagreement about whether there even is a problem and what, if anything, should be done by the federal government.

"It's kind of like turning the game to make something happen that should just happen on its own," said Gabriel Hernandez, a 22-year-old registered Democrat who volunteers as a poll worker and studies business at Westchester Community College.

"I think we do really need a little more Hispanic representation, but we also need people in there who know what they're doing," Hernandez said. "You can't just have people in there because they're Hispanic, or black or white, or whatever. It just makes no sense to say, 'Oh, there's nobody Hispanic in there, so let's put someone in just based on the fact that he's Spanish,' when that person might not be qualified.

"To me, being Hispanic, that's like an offense to say, 'Oh, if they're not going to do it on their own, we'll make it happen for them,' " Hernandez added.

Carole McDermott, a lifelong resident of the village who was buying stamps at the post office on Westchester Avenue, said she didn't understand the logic behind establishing voting districts to replace the at-large designation for all six trustee seats.

"Isn't that how democracy's supposed to work?" McDermott asked. "I've never voted for somebody based on their ethnicity. Why should I, or anybody else for that matter, start now? Because somebody in Washington says we should?"

Others welcomed the idea of districts, agreeing with the contention that the all at-large system dilutes the collective strength of the Hispanic community to get behind a single candidate.

Alberto Rodriguez, a registered member of the Conservative Party, said that while he would not personally vote for a candidate based on ethnicity, he would support the creation of voting districts because he believes it would inspire more diversity on future ballots.

"There's always been like a status quo here - you accept whatever you get," Rodriguez said. "Dividing the locations based upon geography would probably enhance things and probably motivate a qualified Hispanic individual to seek nomination as a trustee."

DOJ_NMG_0107298

In an interview Friday, Mayor Gerald Logan denounced the lawsuit, saying that voter apathy, not discrimination, was the primary problem in Port Chester. With roughly 21,600 residents 18 years and over, more than 3,000 of whom are believed to be Hispanic, a total of only 2,600 residents voted in the last election, Logan said.

Feds Intervene In Indian Voting Case (AP)

AP, December 17, 2006

CHEYENNE -- The U.S. Department of Justice is intervening in a federal lawsuit in which five American Indians are challenging Fremont County's system of holding at-large elections.

The department filed notice Thursday that it is intervening in the case for the limited purpose of defending the constitutionality of the federal Voting Rights Act.

Five members of the Eastern Shoshone and Northern Arapaho tribes, represented by the American Civil Liberties Union, sued Fremont County last year. They claim the county's system of holding at-large elections violates Voting Rights Act by impermissibly diluting the American Indian vote.

The Mountain States Legal Foundation, based in Lakewood, Colo., is defending Fremont County. In its answer to the lawsuit filed late last year, the foundation argued that it would be unconstitutional to hold Fremont County to the section of the Voting Rights Act which prohibits practices that dilute minority voting.

Fremont County Attorney Ed Newell on Friday referred questions to the Mountain States Legal Foundation, but efforts to reach lawyers there were unsuccessful.

In its notice of intervention filed in the lawsuit this week, the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice stated that the United States has a right to intervene in any lawsuit in which the constitutionality of federal laws is questioned.

Laughlin McDonald, director of the ACLU's Voting Rights Project in Atlanta, said Friday that he believes abolishing at-large elections would help everyone in Fremont County.

"I think if we succeed in this suit, nobody loses," McDonald said. "If we succeed, and if we get a system that allows all the groups in that county to participate in that process, that really fulfills the premise of democracy."

McDonald said the lawsuit is set for trial in February before U.S. District Judge Alan Johnson in Lander.

Federal appeals courts have already rejected Mountain States Legal Foundation's argument that the Voting Rights Act is unconstitutional in a Montana case. The U.S. Supreme Court ultimately declined to review that case.

In last month's general election, Fremont County voters elected Keja Whiteman, a member of the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa, to one of three open seats on the county commission in an at-large election. The ACLU announced that it would continue with its lawsuit nonetheless.

"It frequently happens that minorities won't get elected until a lawsuit is filed; it's happened in a number of cases," McDonald said, adding that the fact that a minority person was elected didn't resolve the issue.

Fremont County Attorney Newell last month called Whiteman's election "a great thing for Fremont County."

Newell said Whiteman's election was proof that the county "isn't full of racists who vote along racial lines." And he said he believes Whiteman's success has weakened the ACLU's case.

"The entire premise of that lawsuit was an American Indian couldn't get elected, and this is clear proof that premise is false," Newell said. "She clearly got support from many Republicans and non-Indians to win like she did. She deserved to get elected, and she did."

In a field of six candidates, Whiteman received 6,422 votes -- more than 18 percent of all votes cast. She won four of the six precincts in Lander, where most of the voters are not American Indians.

ANTITRUST:

Airline Deals Can Bog Down In The Details (HC)

By Bill Hensel Jr. And Brad Hem

Houston Chronicle, December 17, 2006

It's one thing to talk about merging two big airlines. Making it happen is another.

Since preliminary merger talks between Continental and United airlines became public last week, the talk of industry consolidation has grown louder and the market value of both airlines has increased.

No matter the buzz, there are obstacles, though surmountable, to such a deal getting struck, and pitfalls to it ultimately succeeding.

DOJ_NMG_0107299

Before the airlines could reach a deal, many issues beg to be decided: Who runs the merged carrier? What is the name? Where is the headquarters?

Executives also look at fleet and route network compatibility and decide if potential labor kinks can be smoothed.

After any deal is struck, the parties wait to find out: Are there legal challenges or regulatory bombs? Is there problematic political fallout if the merged airline decides to shut down a hub or hubs?

"Big hurdles remain," Goldman Sachs airline analyst Robert Barry said in a recent report. "Airline mergers are never easy."

Continental Airlines Chairman and Chief Executive Officer Larry Kellner has not been enthusiastic about a merger but might decide he has no real choice. Experts say the carrier's board may feel pressure by shareholders to make a deal.

Kellner said again in a message to employees Friday he prefers that the Houston-based airline stay independent. But he also said the airline will do what it must to be competitive if the industry landscape changes.

Glenn Tilton, chairman, CEO and president of United, also weighed in to his employees in a taped message Friday.

"We continue to believe the industry would benefit from consolidation and that change of that kind is overdue," Tilton said. "We're in control of our decisions, and no one will be making them for us."

With US Airways making a hostile bid for Delta Air Lines and AirTran Airways doing the same for Midwest Airlines, the industry could indeed be shifting around Continental.

CEO egosIf there is a Continental-United merger, most industry watchers believe it makes sense for Kellner to be the CEO. But that doesn't address the issue of whether Tilton would take a payout and retire or stick around as chairman or in some other capacity.

A big issue in mergers is always who is to be in control, said antitrust lawyer Jim Eiszner of Shook, Hardy & Bacon in Kansas City, Mo.

That was a concern when Continental and United talked previously, according to former Continental Chairman and CEO Gordon Bethune, who said executives from the two airlines met about four years ago to talk about a merger.

"That was an issue long before I retired," said Bethune, who stepped down at the end of 2004.

After spending years working to build the company into one of the industry's best, Continental leaders aren't going to simply hand the reins over, he said, to an airline that has had "mediocre management."

"The leadership of Continental is not going to ditch the employees," Bethune said. "It is not about getting a payday and moving on. Being leader of the company, you have a huge obligation."

The ability to complete a merger and the details that would follow come down to CEO egos, said Roger King, an analyst with research firm CreditSights.

The question is whether Kellner or Tilton would be willing to step aside and let the other team take over.

"If they can't make that work, the whole thing will fall apart," King said.

There shouldn't be much debate, King said. Kellner runs a successful airline, he added.

Even though King favors Kellner's team running any combination, he believes the name would be United because it's better known worldwide. Others experts agree it has superior brand recognition.

United, the second-largest airline in the U.S. after American Airlines, is based just outside Chicago, while Continental, No. 4, has its headquarters in Houston.

A vote for HoustonTerry Trippler, an airline expert with myvacationpassort.com, said he thought the headquarters of a merged company should be in Houston because it would be cheaper to operate than in Chicago. But CEOs can feel strongly about ties to a headquarters city.

The two airlines' route networks complement each other, and their fleets, while different, could probably mesh without too much difficulty.

Goldman Sachs said the merger would be a powerful combination.

"Continental's strengths in secondary Europe markets, the northeastern U.S. and Latin America are a great fit with United's Pacific, primary European market and West Coast strength," Barry wrote.

Continental and United have minimal competitive overlap, Eiszner noted.

Anthony Sabino, professor of law and business at St. John's University in New York, called the possible merger of United and Continental "the watershed event the industry has been waiting for."

A marriage of the two would create a megacarrier, he said, with the heft and solvency to stave off domestic and foreign competition.

Sabino said a merger of United's transcontinental and Pacific routes with Continental's flights to Europe, Latin America and the eastern half of the nation would be a "snug fit."

A load of other factorsIf a deal does get announced, there are still potential obstacles to overcome.

DOJ_NMG_0107300

One could be what Northwest Airlines does. It has a so-called "golden share" of Continental that would allow it to block a takeover of Continental by United. It's generally believed, however, that the golden share wouldn't preclude Continental from being an acquirer.

Regulators and politicians could also intercede. The Justice Department could try to block any deal on antitrust grounds, Standard & Poor's airline analyst Philip Baggaley noted.

The Justice Department might also take a stern look at the so-called failing company defense, Eiszner said. Regulators might look more favorably on any type of big merger if one party is failing or at risk of failing.

In this case, Continental is healthy and United has just successfully emerged from bankruptcy.

Politicians might consider fears over rising ticket prices or potential hub shutdowns. Some are already sounding alarms.

The Business Travel Coalition called the potential United-Continental deal the ultimate warning of a "tsunami" of airline mergers most worrisome to business travel advocates.

"The market power of resultant, reconfigured global alliances with antitrust immunity could be stunning," said Kevin Mitchell, the coalition's chairman. "The coalition believes that corporations that fund business travel activities would pay higher ticket prices as capacity would be removed as a consequence of these proposed mergers."

When it comes to hubs, industry experts say Continental's Houston and New York-area hubs are strong and are likely to remain in operation if a merger happens. The fate of its Cleveland hub is less clear.

Speed of deal an unknownHow quickly any deal might happen remains a question mark. That could depend, in part, on what happens with other carriers, including US Airways and its bid for Delta.

"If it appears that the bid could be successful, that could trigger other moves, such as a competing bid from United or Northwest for Delta," S&P's Baggaley wrote.

Continental and United were in their preliminary talks even before US Airways announced its move for Delta.

"It has been clear that consolidation was on its way," aviation consultant Alan Sbarra said. "What happens is even an airline that wants to go it alone needs to be proactive so they can control their own fate."

Lawmakers Alarmed By Airline Deals Concerns Include Loss Of Service And Jobs, As Well As Higher Ticket Prices. (AJC)

By Marilyn Geewax

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 17, 2006

Washington —- Even though the new Congress won't convene until January, key lawmakers already are preparing for hearings to examine the economic impact of possible airline mergers.

Many members of Congress are condemning the potential deals, while few, if any, support the idea of industry consolidation. Congress has no direct role in approving mergers, but it could help sway public perceptions and increase political pressure on the Justice Department to reject the airline transactions on antitrust grounds.

Perhaps the most controversial of the potential acquisitions involves US Airways Group Inc.'s unsolicited $8.7 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. The two carriers have routes that overlap significantly along the East Coast, as well as hubs relatively near each other in the West. Congressmen representing Atlanta, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Salt Lake City, Phoenix, Charlotte and other cities where the two airlines have major operations fear that a merger would wipe out jobs, diminish air service and drive up ticket prices, Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.) said.

Concerns about a loss of competition grew dramatically last week when word surfaced that UAL Corp., parent of United Airlines, and Continental Airlines are considering a merger. In addition, AirTran Holdings Inc. offered to buy Midwest Air Group for about $290 million. With so many carriers now in play, the number of concerned congressmen is growing.

"We can voice our opinion," Lewis said. "And because we all represent different parts of the country, speaking out could have a tremendous impact on what happens."

Last week, incoming House Transportation Committee Chairman James Oberstar (D-Minn.) said that if it appears that the US Airways takeover of Delta would be going forward in the new year, he would hold a hearing on the matter. Teri Rucker, a spokeswoman for incoming Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii), said that panel also is planning a hearing.

Oberstar said that by publicly exposing the potential dangers of airline consolidation, his committee may be able to "throw cold water" on merger mania. "We can nudge the Justice Department to take the action they must" to prevent a loss in competition, he said.

Oberstar also said opposition to consolidation is bipartisan.

"I've heard from members on both sides of the aisle" as worries have grown about the impact on jobs and service, he said. "I haven't heard anyone come forward and say this is a really good deal."

Michael Boyd, president of Boyd Group Inc., an aviation consulting firm, agreed that Congress would become involved because so many lawmakers represent cities with huge stakes in the outcome. "There are a lot of dogs in this fight," he said.

Delta management opposes the transaction with US Airways, but if the deal were to go forward, the carriers would have to drop routes to avoid expensive redundancies and overcome antitrust concerns. That could eliminate jobs and flights, especially in smaller cities such as Savannah and West Palm Beach, Fla.

"Any Georgia legislator who doesn't stand up against this merger isn't doing his constituents any good," Boyd said.

Indeed, many already have jumped into the battle, making floor statements and working behind the scenes in Washington. For example, Rep. David Scott (D-Ga.) made a House floor speech shortly before the 109th Congress adjourned, saying that members of Congress should "do everything we can to stop this merger from going through on the grounds that it is anti-competitive, it is anti-consumer and it is anti-American."

In recent weeks, Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) talked to White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and in a Senate floor speech, said a Delta-US Airways combination "would lead us to singular service in many cities, an absence of competition, an inevitable increase in rates and, unfortunately, less than the healthiest aviation industry."

Earlier this month, the two chief executives, Delta's Gerald Grinstein and US Airways' Doug Parker, each met with Oberstar to discuss their views.

Darryl Jenkins, an industry consultant based in Northern Virginia, said that whether Congress gets deeply engaged on the issue of airline competition may depend upon the views of creditors owed money by Delta, which is under the protection of a bankruptcy court. If by next month those creditors are in favor of the deal, then the bankruptcy judge may in turn support it and the transaction could be completed, pending Justice Department approval. That would push the other deals forward, too.

"Everyone is interested in this [Delta deal] because if one merger goes through, then two or three other mergers will follow," Jenkins said.

Lawmakers who want to head off that scenario should focus on stopping the deal, he said.

"It's a way to rally the troops," he said.

Airline Mergers: Déjà Vu All Over Again? (USAT)

USA Today, December 17, 2006

At the beginning of 1985 there were around 20 major airlines in the USA. Two years later half of them had disappeared – the victims of a wave of mergers that rocked the travel industry. Well-known brands like AirCal, Ozark, Piedmont, PSA, Republic, and Western Airlines disappeared almost overnight and other brands like American, Delta, and Northwest suddenly became much larger players.

Now everyone's wondering if it's about to happen again with recent merger talk between Delta-US Airways, AirTran-Midwest Airlines, and Continental-United Airlines. By the time you read this, more airlines may have joined the list of those reported to be in merger talks.

A number of airline chief executives have been predicting, warning, and perhaps secretly wishing for a round of consolidation. Those who foster the idea of remaking the big six into the big three see a world of decreased competition, fewer flights, and decreased seating capacity. This would help the surviving three airlines better cut costs and boost revenues … at the expense of business and leisure travelers alike.

Pulling it off

Some airlines have been shopping around, looking for an opportunity to merge. But pulling off an airline merger is no simple task. Managements of both companies must be amenable to the idea. Successfully integrating two disparate companies often with incompatible assets (like airplanes and routes) and contentious labor forces has foiled many an airline merger. And even if both managements can achieve harmonious union, many airline mergers are subsequently struck down as anti-competitive by the Department of Justice (DOJ).

A merger between smaller players like AirTran and Frontier might be easier to implement. But merger talks between large airlines, like Delta and US Airways or Continental and United, are much more likely to hit a dead end. Therefore, even though there are some big names out there pushing for mergers, like United's chief executive, Glenn Tilton, and US Airways chief executive, Doug Parker, I think it's still unlikely that any big six, network airlines will combine in 2007. But if history is our guide, I will say that if just one successful merger occurs among the big six it would likely unleash a new round of consolidation like the one we experienced in 1986-7.

Potential pairings

So if consolidation occurs, what will it look like? Who is likely to combine with whom? Airlines are busy talking to airlines. But in the end, if the Justice Department won't approve it, it's not going to happen. So I think it makes sense to sort out the potential pairings according to those that are likely to pass DOJ scrutiny and those that probably won't, or at least they probably "shouldn't" pass due to their adverse impact on competition.

I have divided the possible airline mergers into two categories: pairings with complimentary route structures, and those with overlapping routes. Although all airline mergers will probably result in reduced capacity and less competition, it is my contention that those airlines with overlapping route structures are the greatest threat to competition while those with complimentary route structures that don't overlap are less threatening and therefore more likely to pass scrutiny by the regulators.

As I reported in a recent column, the biggest problem with Delta-US Airways is the huge number of overlapping routes. If US Airways wants to grow, they would be better off pursuing American, Northwest, or United since they have primarily complimentary route structures. A combination with Continental and Delta, which also fly primarily up and down the east coast, would be very bad for competition.

Continental-United

Continental and United are already talking and they have a complimentary route structure. This would be a good merger if they can pull it off. Continental's Houston hub would give United at long last a solid foothold in the South and an alternative to Chicago and Denver when inclement weather strikes the Midwest. Continental's Newark hub would give United lots of feed for east-west routes. The combined Pacific, Latin America, and Europe routes could benefit both airlines.

But Northwest may be the spoiler

The biggest problem with Continental-United or Continental and anyone is the fact that Northwest has a financial investment in Continental that gives the carrier veto power over any other combination. This effectively takes Continental out of the merger market unless Northwest is willing to allow Continental to merge, a very unlikely scenario given that any Continental merger would likely generate increased competition for Northwest.

United's other options

If Continental is prevented from pairing with United, I believe United's other two merger options are Delta and US Airways. Both have positives and negatives. US Airways is small; Delta is very large. Both are heavily concentrated on the east coast where United is not that strong. Both airlines have a north-south route network and a Northeast shuttle that United would want. Although Delta and United have complimentary route networks, the resulting combined airline would be so large that a Delta-United merger may not pass DOJ scrutiny anyway.

The pursuit of Northwest

Northwest operates in the north central part of the country and in the Pacific where competition is limited. Therefore, Northwest is actually is a good merger partner for just about anyone in the big six except United due to United's extensive Pacific route overlap.

Other alternatives

Although I would expect to continue to hear a lot about potential mergers in the airline industry, hopefully none of them will come to fruition this year. Perhaps instead more airlines will operate marketing agreements like the recent one announced by AirTran and Frontier Airlines which should not result in higher airfares or service reductions. And hopefully DOJ will intervene if any mergers show the potential for curtailing competition and consumer options. But there really isn't much a frequent flier – or airline employee — can do but hope that it's not 1986-7 déjà vu all over again.

Credit Bureau Changes Will Cost Buyers Who Must Shop Loans (LAT)

By Kenneth R. Harney

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

WASHINGTON — Home buyers and refinancers face higher fees for credit reports beginning Jan. 1 — a price boost that has mortgage, credit-industry and consumer groups fuming.

Some believe that the higher fees will have an inordinately heavy effect on moderate-income and minority first-time mortgage applicants who have nontraditional credit patterns, marginal credit scores or "thin" credit files.

They also predict that as a result of the increased costs, mortgage loan officers may not shop as aggressively for such clients — leaving those applicants with worse mortgage choices than they would have otherwise.

At the core of the controversy is a policy change by national credit bureaus Equifax and Experian that neither company announced publicly: Beginning next month, they expect to be paid every time a lender or a mortgage investor obtains an applicant's credit file as part of the funding process.

To understand the significance of the change, consider how mortgage brokers — who originate an estimated two of every three new home loans — go about their business. Brokers do not loan their own money; they connect borrowers with lenders. To do so, they must shop applications to competing "wholesale" lenders who generally have different interest rates, loan terms and specializations.

The shopping process involves sharing borrowers' key financial information, property details, credit reports and scores with potential lenders. For home buyers with straightforward credit backgrounds, high scores and substantial assets, a broker might need to send an applicant's file to only one or two lenders.

However, for applicants with more complicated credit histories and marginal scores, brokers often need to shop loan files more widely. Under the policy changes ordered by Equifax and Experian, each time a broker shops an application package to a potential lender, "reissue" fees would have to be paid to the credit bureaus. Under current practices, no additional fees are due.

Spokesmen for the two bureaus confirmed the policy change but would not discuss the higher fees to be charged. They said the change was designed to allow the bureaus to better comply with the federal Fair Credit Reporting Act, which requires them to track each exposure of a consumer's credit data. TransUnion, the third national credit bureau, has not said whether it intends to change its policy and did not respond to a request for comment.

"The whole goal," said David Rubinger of Equifax, "is strict compliance with [the law] and the security of credit information." Donald Girard of Experian said: "We believe we should be fairly compensated" each time the company's data are accessed. Harry Dinham, president of the National Assn. of Mortgage Brokers, a McLean, Va.-based trade group with about 30,000 members, estimated that for some loan applicants with marginal or incomplete credit profiles, brokers' add-on credit fees resulting from the new policy could raise total costs to the borrower by $100 to $200. For others, it would likely be less.

John Taylor, chief executive of the National Community Reinvestment Coalition, which represents a network of local groups that work with minority and moderate-income consumers, denounced the forthcoming fee increases as a "revenue grab" that "will be paid disproportionately by people of color."

An extra charge of $100 or $200 "may not sound like a lot," Taylor said, "but it moves the line on who is going to be able to afford to buy a house."

A potentially much more costly effect on minorities, recent immigrants and sub-prime applicants, said Terry Clemans, executive director of the National Credit Reporting Assn., is that some brokers, to avoid the new, higher charges, "will simply not send files to as many" wholesale lenders for competing offers. That, in turn, could mean that borrowers with complicated credit profiles requiring more extensive shopping "could end up with worse terms than they otherwise might have received" — higher rates, higher fees, less generous underwriting terms, Clemans said.

Brokers association President Dinham said, "We intend to fight this …. We think it is unfair that consumers are being forced to pay more but are getting no additional benefit." One independent credit reporting agency, Columbus, Ohio-based CBC Cos. Inc., has filed suit against Equifax over the issue, charging antitrust violations. Equifax has asked the U.S. District Court in Columbus to dismiss the suit, but no decision is expected before the end of the year.

Bottom line: Unlike other segments of the economy, there's no price competition for credit in the mortgage arena. When the bureaus say they want more, you pay more.

IMMIGRATION:

Employers' Immigration Pains (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, December 17, 2006

DENVER — The raid of six Swift & Co. meat packing plants last week spotlighted the fine line employers face because of increased government scrutiny: Make sure your employees are in the U.S. legally, but don't push too hard to find out.

This time, federal inspectors detained 1,300 Swift workers suspected of providing stolen Social Security numbers to the company. But four years ago, the company's requirement that Latino job applicants provide proof of their legal status led to a $200,000 fine for discrimination.

"Employers are very much hamstrung — if they go too far, they run the risk of a discrimination lawsuit," said David J. Ceccanecchio, an attorney for Wolf Block in Philadelphia who advises businesses that hire immigrants. "If they accept documents at face value, they run the risk" of becoming targets of stepped-up federal enforcement of immigration laws.

In the last year, the federal government has arrested 716 individuals for employing illegal immigrants, compared with 25 in 2002. In addition to the Swift raids last week, a Southern California fence-building company was fined $5 million for employing illegal immigrants, and two Florida men were each sentenced to more than four years in prison for "leasing" illegal workers to various companies.

At a news conference in Washington on Wednesday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff emphasized the importance of focusing on workplaces.

"We all know the primary economic engine that draws in illegal migration is work," Chertoff said a day after the Swift raids. "And when businesses are built upon systemic violations of the law … that is a problem we have to attack."

Some observers say that attack has changed the dynamic at workplaces nationwide, leading employers to worry more about becoming targets of immigration raids than of anti-discrimination suits.

"There was more of a balance before," said immigration attorney Elena Park of the firm Cozen O'Connor. Federal law requires businesses to have job applicants fill out an I-9 form and to verify that the person can legally work in the United States by checking documents — usually a Social Security card and photo identification. But employers are prohibited from asking for additional documentation to prove legal residency.

"All the I-9s say in big, bold letters that the employee chooses what ID to show you, and if you ask for more, you can be sued for discrimination," said Angelo Amador, director of immigration policy for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Unless the documents appear to be forged, employers must accept them and verify Social Security numbers with the Social Security Administration — a process that can take months.

Even if employers receive a "no-match" warning that workers' identities don't correspond to their Social Security numbers, their next move is a matter of dispute.

In June, the Department of Homeland Security issued a proposed rule that companies give workers 60 days to resolve discrepancies in their Social Security records. But the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission warned that the proposal could lead businesses to violate nondiscrimination laws, and the rule has not been adopted.

The Cincinnati clothing manufacturer Cintas Corp., which employs 32,000 people nationwide, this fall began to require its workers to resolve discrepancies within 63 days or be placed on unpaid leave. Religious leaders and unions trying to organize Cintas workers protested, and Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), incoming chair of the House Committee on Homeland Security, warned the company in a letter last month that it may be violating anti-discrimination laws.

Cintas said its new policy was unrelated to the proposed Homeland Security rule. "It got changed this year to ensure that we're in compliance with the law and that our employees are eligible to work in the United States," said spokesman Mike Wallner. Employees can resume work after they resolve the matter with the Social Security Administration, he said.

Cintas is not the only company to take such a step. Last month, Smithfield Foods Inc. fired a few dozen workers at a Tar Heel, N.C., slaughtering plant who had received "no-match" letters. A thousand workers walked off the job in protest, and Smithfield rehired the dismissed laborers, giving them time to resolve the problem.

Labor groups contended that Smithfield, which a federal court ruled in May had harassed union backers, was trying to stifle organizing drives. But Smithfield officials said they were simply trying to do the right thing.

"We're getting battered from both sides," spokesman Dennis Pittman said. "We're just trying to figure out the law and follow it."

Legal experts say the anti-discrimination clauses exist to protect would-be employees often subject to the most scrutiny: low-income people with few documents.

"If an employer asks you to prove you're here legally, what would you bring to the employer" other than a Social Security card? asked Keith Cunningham-Parmeter, a law professor at Willamette University in Salem, Ore. "A passport? Those are the sort of things that low-wage workers don't necessarily have in their desk drawer."

Immigrant rights groups that warn of the dangers of employers aggressively questioning their workers have long pointed to the employment discrimination case the Department of Justice filed against Swift in 2002.

The complaint says that, since 1990, Swift's Worthington, Minn., plant requested extra proof of legal residence from job applicants "perceived to be non-U.S. citizens or foreign-born."

Arcenio Martinez applied for a job at the plant in 2000. A legal U.S. resident, he was asked to show a Social Security card and a work permit — more than was requested from non-Latinoappearing applicants, the complaint says. Even though he produced both documents, Martinez was not hired. Another applicant, a U.S. citizen who did not speak English, was asked for a birth certificate, driver's license and Social Security card before he was hired.

DOJ_NMG_0107305

The federal government sought $2.5 million from Swift but settled for $200,000. Nonetheless, in a release, the Justice Department called it the largest employment discrimination case based on immigration status in history.

"Anyone who is entitled to work should be treated equally and without discrimination in the employment market," Assistant Atty. Gen. for Civil Rights Ralph F. Boyd Jr. said in a statement.

In testimony before the House Small Business Committee in June, Jack Shandey, Swift senior vice president for human resources, cited the case to highlight what he called contradictory government expectations of business. "To repeat, our company found itself in hot water for allegedly pushing too hard to ensure employees possessed the status they claimed," he said.

Now Swift is feeling pressure from another source.

The company since 1999 has used a federal online system, called Basic Pilot, for speedy verification of its workers' Social Security numbers. But Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents found that many Swift plant employees were using stolen Social Security numbers that were not flagged by that system.

Chertoff said investigators advised Swift about the case and about the pending raid of the company's plants. The company interviewed suspected workers, and about 400 were dismissed, quit or did not show up for work. It also asked a federal judge in Texas to bar Immigration and Customs from raiding its plants. The judge refused, and the raids went ahead Tuesday.

Swift did not return repeated calls but has argued that it has been obeying the law.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Challenges Democrats To Cut Spending Earmarks (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 17, 2006

President Bush yesterday challenged Democrats to live up to their pledge to cut pork-barrel spending, using his weekly radio address to suggest they join forces to crack down on earmarks in spending bills.

Mr. Bush called it a "top priority" for Congress when lawmakers return next year.

The administration has been trying to find an issue where it has common ground with Democrats, and spending is an obvious area, particularly given Democrats' campaign and post-campaign pledges to cut waste.

"That was one of the clear messages American voters sent in the midterm elections," Mr. Bush said. "And one of the best ways we can impose more discipline on federal spending is by addressing the problem of earmarks."

Mr. Bush's own party was unable to rein in earmarks during its time in control of Congress, and many Republican leaders in Congress staunchly defend the current system.

Earmarks are line-items written into bills or congressional reports that direct money to specific projects, often at the whim of a single member of Congress and without any formal review or chance for a vote on the House or Senate floor.

Opponents refer to them as pork-barrel spending, and the Congressional Research Service says they ballooned after Republicans took control of Congress in 1995.

For example, earmarks in the spending bill for the Commerce, Justice and State departments grew from 253 in fiscal 1994 to 1,722 in fiscal 2005. The dollar value nearly doubled, as did the percentage of the total bill dedicated to earmarks: from 11.5 percent in 1994 to 21.8 percent in 2005.

Sensing the potency of the issue, Democrats have pledged to keep earmarks out of spending when they complete the fiscal 2007 appropriations process and to prevent earmarks in future spending bills until they pass a reform package that makes earmarks more transparent.

It would be a major step if Mr. Bush and Democrats in Congress could come to an agreement.

While applauding the president's challenge, Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, said Mr. Bush could do more to cut down on earmarks by refusing to follow through on those included in reports, which do not have the force of law.

"By rejecting this secret spending for politicians' pet projects, federal agencies could focus these funds on their core missions and serve true national priorities," Mr. DeMint said.

Among the options being floated on Capitol Hill are requiring every earmark to be listed along with its sponsor and some specific information about the provision, preventing earmarks that would benefit a lawmaker or those tied to him or her and allowing an up-or-down vote to strip individual earmarks from bills.

Mr. Bush said earmarks create the chance for wasteful spending "such as a swimming pool or a teapot museum." According to Citizens Against Government Waste, the Teapot Museum in Sparta, N.C., received $500,000 in federal spending during the last fiscal year.

DOJ_NMG_0107306

But some members of Congress, including top Republicans on the House and Senate appropriations committees, argue members of Congress know their districts better than federal bureaucrats, so they are better at directing spending.

And while Mr. Bush points to questionable spending, defenders point to the Iraq Study Group, which was the result of a $1 million earmark.

The House passed an earmark-reform proposal this year, but the Senate did not.

Panetta Urges Bush, Congress To Just Get Along (HC)

By Anne Marie Kilday

Houston Chronicle, December 17, 2006

Former White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta, who served on the Iraq Study Group, said President Bush and the newly elected Democratic Congress must work together to confront the nation's problems.

"There's a fundamental decision that both the president and the Democratic Congress have to make. And that is whether they are going to work together to govern the country, or whether they are going to be in confrontation or gridlock for the next two years," Panetta said. "It's not going to be easy for either side to do that."

Panetta was in Houston on Friday to speak to a group of Houston business leaders about the new Congress. He said there may be opportunities for the president and congressional Democrats to reach agreement on key issues, such as immigration and education.

The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by Houston lawyer and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former U.S. Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., released its final report about 10 days ago. Bush has said he will study the report before making a formal response in January.

"These are not easy issues," Panetta said. "I think the president needs to take the time to look at these issues and hopefully make the right decision."

Possible opportunities Panetta said Baker did a good job chairing the group, forging a unanimous report by the 10-member panel.

"We had some tough debates, but they were always civil. Nobody ever pounded the table and threatened to walk out. Everybody basically said, 'OK, we have some differences, let's work our way through it.' And, frankly, that's the way things are supposed to work in Washington," the former California congressman said.

Addressing future U.S. policy and strategy in Iraq is very important because of the lives at stake and the strong divisions in the country over the war, Panetta said.

An Army veteran of the Vietnam War, Panetta said our troops today have strong support from the American people.

"I think that the one thing I really see is the American people, despite divisions over the war, don't blame the troops. They really are supportive of the men and women in Iraq. And I think the troops over there understand that," he said.

'A very violent place' The visit to Iraq by the study group brought home the reality of the dangers soldiers stationed there face, Panetta said.

"Going into Baghdad, you have to wear a helmet and a flak jacket on the airplane, and we had to drop in a spiral descent from 10,000 feet, just to avoid missiles," Panetta said. "Then they put us onto helicopters to take us into the Green Zone, and we were still wearing our helmets and flak jackets, and there were attack helicopters firing flares in order to divert any heat-seeking missiles. So, that whole thing ... well, we suddenly realized that it really was a battle zone.

"And at night, you could hear the helicopters coming in. And I asked what that was about, and they said they were delivering the wounded. So, you realize that Iraq is a very violent place," Panetta said.

"Even if you get them 50,000 to 100,000 additional troops, the military commanders say it would only produce a temporary change," Panetta said.

"There really is no military victory in Iraq. The only way you can win is if the Iraqis govern themselves and control the violence," Panetta said.

"The goal is a stable Iraq. And that stability may not necessarily be achieved through the democratic process."

Panetta said Washington policymakers "always underestimate the intelligence of the American people."

Congress's Inaction Threatens Funding (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

The Republican-controlled Congress's decision to adjourn a week ago before completing many of the spending bills that finance the federal government will reverberate in ways large and small, such as understaffed U.S. attorney's offices, delayed renovations at the University of Bridgeport in Connecticut and a scuttled global nuclear energy exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0107307

Republican leaders left behind just enough spending authority to keep the government operating through mid-February, less than halfway through the 2007 fiscal year that began Oct. 1. Democrats have signaled that when they take control of Congress in January they will extend that funding authority for the remainder of the year based largely on the previous year's spending levels, which will result in many cuts in programs.

The Democrats also will do something that is certain to anger many lawmakers but cheer critics of excessive government spending: They will wipe out thousands of lawmakers' pet projects, or earmarks, that have been a source of great controversy on Capitol Hill. In the past, lawmakers have peppered individual spending bills with earmarks benefiting special interests. But the funding resolution the Democrats intend to pass in lieu of spending bills will be devoid of earmarks.

Among the casualties will be $3 million for AIDS and homelessness programs in San Francisco pushed by House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and $3 million to establish the Charles B. Rangel Center for Public Service at City College of New York, pushed by the center's namesake, the Democrats' incoming House Ways and Means Committee chairman.

Efforts championed by President Bush, such as "clean coal" technology, will take a big hit, but so will programs favored by Democrats. The federal judiciary would run out of money to pay lawyers for poor defendants by July, effectively locking up the wheels of justice because trials could not proceed without legal representation for defendants.

Democrats say they had little choice but to take this tightfisted approach after Republicans dumped so many unfinished spending bills in their lap. "We did not call the shots here," maintained incoming House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.), who said that with the fiscal year well underway and Democrats assuming power with a full slate of priorities, he will have little choice but to put the government on autopilot. "We will try to provide modest adjustments where we can, but a lot of people will be left short."

But some Republicans suspect that's not the full story.

"What the Democrats didn't say is that they probably intend to take the earmark savings and spend it elsewhere," said Rep. Dave Weldon (R-Fla.), who was hoping to get $3 million for a new autism research center at the Florida Institute of Technology.

The collapse of the budget process was a long time coming, with roots stretching back to the Republican revolution of 1994. But this year, the system finally buckled under the weight of the president's austere spending recommendations, a difficult election year and the Republican leadership's efforts to placate both its most ardent conservatives and its endangered moderates.

Congress was able to pass only two of its 11 annual spending bills, those that fund defense and homeland security. Republicans punted spending measures for virtually every one of the government's domestic programs to the Democrats who assume control Jan. 4. Then last week, Democrats announced they would punt, too. A joint House-Senate resolution -- rather than carefully tailored spending bills -- will keep the government open through the end of the fiscal year, Sept. 30, largely at last year's levels.

The consequences will be substantial. At the Justice Department, officials said a resolution financing the government largely at 2006 levels would only worsen a severe staffing shortage at offices of U.S. attorneys around the country. The vacancy rate for federal prosecutors stands at about 10 percent on average, and House Democrats reported earlier this year that some larger offices have rates surpassing 20 percent.

The federal court system would not be spared, either. Operating at current funding levels would leave the judiciary with a $270 million shortfall for salaries and expenses, said Dick Carelli, spokesman for the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. Furloughs, layoffs or attrition would be needed to trim the payroll by 7 percent -- or almost 3,000 probation officers, court clerk workers and pretrial service staff members -- by the close of the fiscal year, Carelli said.

The Department of Energy is looking at a 20 percent cut in its administrative budget and could be forced to lay off many of the 960 people who help manage the department -- secretarial aides, lawyers and human resources staffers, said Craig Stevens, a department spokesman.

New presidential initiatives for 2007, such as the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, FutureGen, a clean coal initiative, and a health-care information technology program, are not likely to be funded, agency officials say.

Democrats will make some adjustments in the joint resolution to address the most pressing needs, especially in the Department of Veterans Affairs health-care system, which needs $3 billion more just to keep covering all the veterans it covers now, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which could lose 500 agents under current funding levels, said Tom Gavin, spokesman for incoming Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.).

What is certain is that thousands of earmarks will get nothing, at least until October, when fiscal 2008 begins. About $400,000 in hospital equipment for Perris, Calif., $1.5 million in biotechnology grants for the Illinois Institute of Technology, and another $1.5 million for bridge and street repairs in Columbus, Ohio, will be wiped out.

Budget hawks who have been crusading against such home-district projects hailed the Democrats' decision as an unexpected stroke of political bravery. Bush praised the move yesterday in his weekly radio address.

But the lawmakers who worked to get those projects into the now-dashed spending bills were left quietly fuming. Obey said Friday that he has fielded "a steady stream of calls from people in high dudgeon."

"I will work to reverse this decision," promised Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), who lost a transit center for Bridgeport, a waste-to-energy program for Stamford and a train station for South Norwalk.

It has been nearly 20 years since congressional failures left the government to be financed under spending guidelines and formulas rather than line-by-line policymaking. But to federal budget experts, this year's breakdown was hardly surprising. Not since 1994, the last year of Democratic control, has Congress actually passed all of its spending bills. Republican leaders almost ensured logjams by populating the House Budget Committee with conservative spending hawks whose views on the size of government were fundamentally different from many of the appropriators who would have to flesh out the committee's budget blueprints. Ultimately, compromises in those conservative principles have been laid at the feet of the Clinton White House, the demands of the post-Sept. 11 government, or a Democratic-controlled Senate, said Scott Lilly, a former Democratic staff director of the House Appropriations Committee.

But this year, conservatives dug in, backed by the White House and GOP leaders. Bush's domestic spending request for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1 actually sliced $2.2 billion from the 2006 level.

Rather than face a public fight over the cuts necessary to meet that goal, House Republican leaders decided not to bring the largest domestic spending bill, funding labor, health and education programs, to a vote before the election. The Senate did even less. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) simply decided none of the domestic spending bills would get time on the Senate floor before the election.

"The breakdown of regular order this cycle -- indeed the failure to get our bills done -- should be squarely placed at the feet of the departing Senate majority leader," said outgoing House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.).

Pelosi's House Diplomacy (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

One day last week, Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi picked up the phone and asked John Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader of the House, if he would like to suggest some ways they could ensure better supervision of the page program, the subject of so much controversy in the scandal that led to the resignation of Florida Rep. Mark Foley.

Another day, when the San Francisco Democrat learned that her predecessor as speaker, Illinois Republican Dennis Hastert, was unhappy about losing his spacious office suite, she quietly found two rooms for him near the prime space allocated to the Ways and Means Committee.

Both moves were insignificant in themselves, and neither drew any notice. But they signal that the management of the House of Representatives is going to change substantively -- and not just symbolically -- when Pelosi is sworn in on Jan. 4 as the first woman to hold the third-highest office in the land.

No one -- including Pelosi herself -- can tell you all the ways the House will change. When I interviewed her last week, it became apparent that she was just getting into the details of her new position. That may seem odd, but I find it believable that during her campaigning and fundraising these past two years, her focus was not on becoming speaker but, as she said, on "getting the Democrats back in the majority" after 12 years out of power.

"It was not until I was nominated in the Democratic caucus [for speaker] that it hit me," she said.

But Pelosi has been thinking for a long time about how she would manage the House, if she ever got the chance. Two years ago, she and others in the Democratic leadership sent Hastert a letter outlining changes in House rules and procedures that would end some of the flagrant abuses of the legislative process that have taken place. The letter said that Democrats would live by the same new rules if and when they were the majority.

That was repeated a year ago, and Pelosi says it stands today.

It means, among other things, an end to congressional rides on corporate planes, a block on the revolving door between congressional staff jobs and lobbying shops, and a process that will make it harder to slip in special-interest earmarks.

It also means a radical overhaul of House rules -- a strict time limit on roll calls to prevent prolonged arm-twisting of reluctant members, and a requirement that conference committees work in the open and include minority party members.

After a decade of bitter partisanship that has all but crippled efforts to deal with major national problems, Pelosi is determined to try to return the House to what it was in an earlier era -- "where you debated ideas and listened to each other's arguments."

That does not mean she is abandoning the Democratic agenda. Far from it. But it does mean that she has grasped the key to doing her job: "I am the speaker of the House," not the leader of the Democratic Caucus. She expects few interventions in floor debate, and she is picking her spots carefully from a flood of television interview requests.

DOJ_NMG_0107309

The transition from partisan combatant to speaker is not easy. In the view of many in her caucus, she erred when she intervened on behalf of Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania against Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland for majority leader. Hoyer's victory was a black eye for her, but it may not have long-term effects. Hoyer is an able floor leader, and Pelosi has named an ally of hers, Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, as caucus chairman and has transferred many of the public relations responsibilities to him.

The small gestures she has made to the Republicans suggest a willingness to accommodate, rather than a vindictive reaction to the Democratic victory.

That bodes well for the future.

Intelligence Ignorance (WP)

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

HOUSE SPEAKER-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has come up with a deft solution to a problem identified by the Sept. 11 commission: the disjointed and inadequate congressional oversight of intelligence. It's not the solution that the commission endorsed, so Ms. Pelosi and the Democrats will take some hits for failing to live up to the letter of their pledge to enact all the commission's recommendations. But her proposal could go a long way toward fixing the dysfunctional organization the panel addressed.

The fundamental problem, for intelligence and other matters, is the separation between committees with substantive authority over particular departments or agencies (authorizers) and those who wield the power of the purse (appropriators). You can guess which executive officials are more responsive to. This problem is exacerbated when it comes to intelligence because its spending has been considered by the appropriations subcommittee responsible for all military spending. That means that intelligence issues don't get enough attention and that intelligence spending priorities may be skewed in the direction of military hardware.

To fix this disconnect, the Sept. 11 commission recommended that the House and Senate intelligence committees, either as separate panels or fused into one, be given both substantive and budgetary authority. Not surprisingly, that didn't sit too well with appropriators jealous of ceding any power. The Pelosi compromise would create an intelligence oversight panel within the appropriations committee, responsible for reviewing spending and recommending spending levels. In a key departure, this committee would include not only appropriators but members of the intelligence committee. This is a clever approach that merits serious consideration by the incoming Senate majority leader, Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.).

We wish we could be as enthusiastic about Ms. Pelosi's choice to head the intelligence committee. In an interview with Congressional Quarterly's http://CQ.com, the incoming chairman, Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.), exhibited a troubling lack of familiarity with basic knowledge that ought to be expected of someone in that important position. Asked whether al-Qaeda was Sunni or Shiite, Mr. Reyes replied, "Al-Qaeda, they have both . . . Predominantly -- probably Shiite." In fact, al-Qaeda's members are adherents of the Sunni branch of Islam and their viciousness toward Shiites is a key fact of recent Iraqi history. Mr. Reyes also flubbed a question about Hezbollah.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Reyes said he had misunderstood some of the questions but added, "My position is I screwed it up and will admit it and move on from there." As to doubts about his capabilities, he said, "It's my expectation that people, once they get an opportunity to see my work, won't have that doubt."

We hope he's right. In our interview, Mr. Reyes said he was not enthusiastic about some of the recommendations by the Iraq Study Group but couldn't name them. "I can't speak to the specifics, some I was not enthused about in there," he said. "Let me defer until I get my book. I know I tabbed and highlighted it." Mr. Reyes has a steep learning curve ahead.

Obama Says He Regrets Land Deal With Fundraiser (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

CHICAGO. Dec. 16 -- Antoin "Tony" Rezko is a political insider, an energetic Chicago dealmaker and campaign fundraiser often in the headlines for being on the wrong side of good government. Indicted in October on influence-peddling charges, he also has a habit of befriending prospective political stars.

One of them was Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who was offered a job by Rezko in the early 1990s while a top student at Harvard Law School. Obama did not take it, but over the years, the two men stayed in touch, and Rezko backed Obama's successful 2004 U.S. Senate campaign, raising money and contributing his own.

DOJ_NMG_0107310

In June 2005, in what Obama now describes as a "boneheaded" mistake, Obama and Rezko's wife bought adjacent properties on Chicago's South Side, closing the deals on the same day. Seven months later, wanting a bigger yard for his $1.65 million house, Obama bought a slice of the Rezko property for $104,500.

After news of the deal broke last month in the Chicago Tribune, Obama said he had erred by creating the appearance that Rezko had done him a favor by selling him a portion of the lot. For the first time since he entered the national spotlight, the 45-year-old freshman senator found himself on the defensive, discussing a personal decision he had come to regret.

"There's no doubt that this was a mistake on my part. 'Boneheaded' would be accurate," Obama said in a telephone interview Friday. "There's no doubt I should have seen some red flags in terms of me purchasing a piece of property from him."

Obama recently donated to charity $11,500 that Rezko had contributed to his federal campaign account.

There have been no allegations that Obama, whose political fortunes are soaring as he mulls a run for president, broke the law or committed any ethics violations. He said he has done no government business with Rezko, who is facing charges in two unrelated criminal cases.

But leaders of Chicago watchdog organizations describe Obama's behavior as a surprising error in judgment, particularly for a politician noted for his tactical skills, his ambition and his support of state and federal ethics legislation.

"It's disappointing because there has been speculation about Tony Rezko, and whether he was crossing ethical lines, for a number of years," said Cynthia Canary, director of the Illinois Campaign for Political Reform.

Jay Stewart, executive director of Chicago's Better Government Association, said, "Being a lawyer, he did everything by the book, but there's a higher expectation of him."

To Chicago political observers, it made sense that Rezko tried to get close to Obama. A Syrian-born businessman whose fortunes seemed to rise and fall with his latest deal, Rezko was known for cultivating politicians, including Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D) and Rep. Luis V. Gutierrez (D-Ill.).

Rezko created a real estate development company and operated dozens of Chinese eateries and pizza restaurants. After Blagojevich rode into office in 2002, Rezko emerged as a friend and close adviser. He recommended people for significant state jobs and, a federal grand jury charged, soon tried to shake down investment firms that wanted to do business with Illinois.

In one instance, Rezko and Stuart Levine, a member of two state boards, allegedly demanded that a firm seeking investment business pay a $2 million fee to a middleman or give $1.5 million to the campaign of "a certain public official," later identified as Blagojevich.

The company refused. Levine pleaded guilty this fall to federal charges and is cooperating with authorities. Blagojevich, who has not been charged, denied wrongdoing and accused Rezko of betrayal.

Chicago authorities alleged last year that Rezko set up a front minority company to win permission to open three Panda Express outlets at O'Hare International Airport. His nominal partner was Jabir Herbert Muhammad, son of the late Nation of Islam founder Elijah Muhammad.

Rezko and Muhammad settled the matter, which became public in 2005, months before Obama's house purchase. Without admitting wrongdoing, they agreed to end their O'Hare operations and were disqualified from the city's minority business program.

When Obama and his wife, Michelle, a hospital executive, decided to move with their two young girls from their Hyde Park condominium, they chose a spacious three-story Georgian revival home on a tree-lined street in the Kenwood neighborhood, not far from the University of Chicago. The owner had listed the house -- nearly 100 years old, with four fireplaces and a wine cellar -- and an adjacent lot as separate parcels.

The Obamas purchased the house, which had been on the market for several months, for $300,000 below the list price. On the day they closed, Rezko's wife, Rita, closed on the 9,000-square-foot lot next door for the asking price of $625,000.

Obama said Rezko, who knows the neighborhood, was one of several people he called for advice on the real estate market. Rezko told him he knew the developer who renovated the house. In a later conversation, Rezko said he intended to buy the empty lot and build on it.

Later, the Obamas bought a 10-foot-by-150-foot piece of the lot for $104,500. An appraisal put the value of the strip at $40,500, a spokesman said, but Obama considered it fair to pay one-sixth of the original price for one-sixth of the lot.

"It wasn't something we needed to have," Obama said. "It was something I thought would be nice, if it worked economically for him."

Rezko and Obama collaborated to build a fence separating the properties, and Obama has paid his landscapers to mow the lawn on the Rezko lot. Obama, who said city code required Rezko to fence the lot, paid for legal and design work to ensure it was done properly, while Rezko paid for the fence.

DOJ_NMG_0107311

Obama said that he was unaware of Rezko's brewing troubles in 2005 and that Rezko sought no favors. He described himself, after eight years in the Illinois Senate and two on Capitol Hill, as careful to live within strict ethical boundaries -- refusing to allow lobbyists to pay for meals, for example, and reimbursing people for golf outings.

"I'm very proud of how I've conducted myself during the entire time I've been in public service," Obama said. "My hope would be that people come away saying, 'He's not perfect, but he owns up to his mistakes and tries to correct them as quickly as possible.' I hope they look at the entire body of my public service and would note that this is the first time anything has ever come up."

Stewart, of the Better Government Association, said Obama took responsibility and did not shy away from questions. If there are no further revelations, he said, "it's going to wind up being a footnote," but "if anything further comes out, it's a different story."

To Those Who Surf: Time Salutes You (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 17, 2006

NEW YORK -- Congratulations! You are the Time magazine "Person of the Year."

The annual honor for 2006 went to each and every one of us, as Time cited the shift from institutions to individuals -- citizens of the new digital democracy, as the magazine put it. The winners this year were anyone using or creating content online.

"If you choose an individual, you have to justify how that person affected millions of people," said Richard Stengel, who took over as Time's managing editor earlier this year. "But if you choose millions of people, you don't have to justify it to anyone."

Time did cite 26 "People Who Mattered," including North Korea's Kim Jong Il, Pope Benedict XVI, President Bush, Vice President Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Stengel said that if it came down to one individual, it probably would have been Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. "It just felt to me a little off selecting him," Stengel said.

The 2006 "Person of the Year" package hits newsstands Monday. The cover shows a white keyboard with a mirror for a computer screen -- showing readers their reflection.

Person Of The Year: You (TIME)

Time.com, December 17, 2006

From the December 25, 2006 issue of TIME magazine

[TIME.com] -- The "Great Man" theory of history is usually attributed to the Scottish philosopher Thomas Carlyle, who wrote that "the history of the world is but the biography of great men." He believed that it is the few, the powerful and the famous who shape our collective destiny as a species. That theory took a serious beating this year.

To be sure, there are individuals we could blame for the many painful and disturbing things that happened in 2006. The conflict in Iraq only got bloodier and more entrenched. A vicious skirmish erupted between Israel and Lebanon. A war dragged on in Sudan. A tin-pot dictator in North Korea got the Bomb, and the President of Iran wants to go nuclear too. Meanwhile nobody fixed global warming, and Sony didn't make enough PlayStation3s.

But look at 2006 through a different lens and you'll see another story, one that isn't about conflict or great men. It's a story about community and collaboration on a scale never seen before. It's about the cosmic compendium of knowledge Wikipedia and the million-channel people's network YouTube and the online metropolis MySpace. It's about the many wresting power from the few and helping one another for nothing and how that will not only change the world, but also change the way the world changes.

The tool that makes this possible is the World Wide Web. Not the Web that Tim Berners-Lee hacked together (15 years ago, according to Wikipedia) as a way for scientists to share research. It's not even the overhyped dotcom Web of the late 1990s. The new Web is a very different thing. It's a tool for bringing together the small contributions of millions of people and making them matter. Silicon Valley consultants call it Web 2.0, as if it were a new version of some old software. But it's really a revolution.

And we are so ready for it. We're ready to balance our diet of predigested news with raw feeds from Baghdad and Boston and Beijing. You can learn more about how Americans live just by looking at the backgrounds of YouTube videos those rumpled bedrooms and toy-strewn basement rec rooms than you could from 1,000 hours of network television.

And we didn't just watch, we also worked. Like crazy. We made Facebook profiles and Second Life avatars and reviewed books at Amazon and recorded podcasts. We blogged about our candidates losing and wrote songs about getting dumped. We camcordered bombing runs and built open-source software.

DOJ_NMG_0107312

America loves its solitary geniuses its Einsteins, its Edisons, its Jobses but those lonely dreamers may have to learn to play with others. Car companies are running open design contests. Microsoft is working overtime to fend off user-created Linux. We're looking at an explosion of productivity and innovation, and it's just getting started, as millions of minds that would otherwise have drowned in obscurity get backhauled into the global intellectual economy.

Who are these people? Seriously, who actually sits down after a long day at work and says, I'm not going to watch Lost tonight. I'm going to turn on my computer and make a movie starring my pet iguana? I'm going to mash up 50 Cent's vocals with Queen's instrumentals? I'm going to blog about my state of mind or the state of the nation or the steak-frites at the new bistro down the street? Who has that time and that energy and that passion?

The answer is, you do. And for seizing the reins of the global media, for founding and framing the new digital democracy, for working for nothing and beating the pros at their own game, TIME's Person of the Year for 2006 is you.

Sure, it's a mistake to romanticize all this any more than is strictly necessary. Web 2.0 harnesses the stupidity of crowds as well as its wisdom. Some of the comments on YouTube make you weep for the future of humanity just for the spelling alone, never mind the obscenity and the naked hatred.

But that's what makes all this interesting. Web 2.0 is a massive social experiment, and like any experiment worth trying, it could fail. There's no road map for how an organism that's not a bacterium lives and works together on this planet in numbers in excess of 6 billion. But 2006 gave us some ideas. This is an opportunity to build a new kind of international understanding, not politician to politician, great man to great man, but citizen to citizen, person to person. It's a chance for people to look at a computer screen and really, genuinely wonder who's out there looking back at them. Go on. Tell us you're not just a little bit curious.

Web Users Of Content Sites Time's "Person Of Year" (BLOOM)

By Dan Hart And Courtney Dentch

Bloomberg, December 17, 2006

Dec. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Time Warner Inc.'s Time magazine named Internet users behind the self-made content on sites such as YouTube Inc. and MySpace.com as its ``Person of the Year," reflecting the Web's ``digital democracy."

``For seizing the reins of the global media, for founding and framing the new digital democracy, for working for nothing and beating the pros at their own game, Time's Person of the Year for 2006 is you," staff writer Lev Grossman wrote in the cover story.

Time's selection of ``you," published in the magazine's Dec. 25 issue, was made from a list of nominees including Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, China's President Hu Jintao, former Secretary of State James Baker and North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

The issue will be on newsstands Dec. 18 and features a reflective mylar cover that allows readers to see themselves mirrored in a computer screen above the word ``you."

``A mother in Baghdad with a videophone can let you see a roadside bombing, or a patron in a nightclub can show you a racist rant by a famous comedian," Time Editor Richard Stengel wrote. ``These blogs and videos bring events to the rest of us in ways that are often more immediate and authentic than traditional media."

100 Million Videos

YouTube, founded in 2005, draws users that watch 100 million videos a day. That traffic drew a $1.65 billion offer in October from Google Inc., the Internet's most visited search engine, to buy the video-sharing site.

News Corp. bought MySpace.com, a social-network site where users create their own profiles, for $650 million last year, while Yahoo! Inc. has offered $1 billion to buy Facebook.com, a site that started with college students and expanded to allow anyone to use it.

Other Web sites have sprung up to compete with MySpace and Facebook such as Piczo and XuQa.com.

The magazine also recognized ``newsmakers," those whose actions in the past year have affected people's lives, for better or worse.

Chavez to Colbert

The list includes Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, Pope Benedict XVI and Cuba's Raul Castro. U.S. newsmakers included President George W. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, former Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Ford Motor Co.'s Bill Ford, comedian Stephen Colbert and the Iraq Study Group.

Last year, Microsoft Corp. Chairman Bill Gates, his wife Melinda Gates and rock star Bono were named by Time as its ``Persons of the Year" for 2005 for their philanthropic efforts. President Bush was named ``Person of the Year" for 2004, and the American soldier was chosen in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0107313

``Person of the Year'' doesn't necessarily honor its recipient, and controversial cover choices for issue have included Adolf Hitler in 1983 and Josef Stalin in 1939 and 1942.

Time magazine started the annual cover story in 1927 with Charles Lindbergh, the aviator who made the first solo trans-Atlantic flight. The first woman selected was Wallace Warfield Simpson, whom Britain's Edward VIII abdicated the throne for, in 1936. The magazine also has awarded the cover to phenomena, such as the computer in 1982.

Other recent winners include New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani in 2001; Bush in 2000; and, in 1999, Jeffrey Bezos, founder and chief executive officer of Amazon.com Inc.

The only three-time ``Man of the Year'' was former President Franklin Roosevelt in 1932, 1934 and 1941.

"You" Named Time's Person Of 2006 (BBC)

BBC.com, December 17, 2006

"You" have been named as Time magazine's Person of the Year for the growth and influence of user-generated content on the internet.

The US magazine praised the public for "seizing the reins of the global media" and filling the web's virtual world.

Time has been giving out its somewhat controversial awards since 1927, aiming to identify who most affected the news.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Chinese leader Hu Jintao and North Korea's Jong-il were 2006 contenders.

Microsoft founder Bill Gates, his wife Melinda and rock star Bono won the accolade last year and recent winners also include President George W Bush, in 2004, and "The American Soldier" in 2003.

'Wresting power'

The magazine said naming a collectivity rather than an individual reflected the way the internet was shifting the balance of power within the media through blogs, videos and social networks.

Time cited websites such as YouTube, Facebook, MySpace and Wikipedia, which allow users to interact with the web, by uploading and publishing their own comments, videos, pictures and links.

"It's about the many wresting power from the few and helping one another for nothing and how that will not only change the world, but also change the way the world changes," Time magazine's Lev Grossman writes.

Time praised the tool that made such broad collaboration possible - the web.

"It's a tool for bringing together the small contributions of millions of people and making them matter," Mr Grossman said.

Time aims to pick "the person or persons who most affected the news and our lives, for good or for ill".

Previous winners have often sparked controversy - including Adolf Hitler in 1938 and, in 1979, Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini.

Fighting The "Prep School" Scandal (NYT)

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

Insiders have long whispered among themselves about bogus “prep schools” where barely literate high school athletes launder their transcripts by taking pablum courses and sometimes by taking no courses at all. The athletes then go on to big-time sports universities, where they fail or exhaust their playing years before landing back on the streets without job prospects or college degrees.

The prep school scheme was meant to circumvent academic qualification rules for college athletes laid out years ago by the National Collegiate Athletic Association. The N.C.A.A., which was slow to recognize the seriousness of the problem, has finally adopted policies to root it out. But those policies will not do the job unless the organization takes a hard-line approach with everyone involved, including powerhouse prep schools with friends in high places and college athletics departments that knowingly recruit students who do not meet academic guidelines.

The prep school scheme sends a dangerous message to poor neighborhoods, where young people too often ignore their studies, believing that they will magically become millionaires once the world sees their athletic talents. Even worse, it encourages students to drop out of legitimate schools before graduation — at which point their grade-point averages would be written in stone — to sign up with fake schools that can help them rewrite their academic records.

The N.C.A.A. has begun to scrutinize nontraditional schools for their academic programs and has actually decertified some. The organization has also stepped up its review of athletes’ transcripts and will pay special attention to athletes who attended several schools, showed sudden and implausible jumps in grade-point average, transferred to another school late in the senior year or took an implausible number of courses in one semester.

These measures are encouraging as far as they go. But the N.C.A.A. will need to wade much deeper into the problem if it hopes to break this scheme. For starters, it needs to make clear not just what courses high school athletes need to take to become eligible for college sports, but when they should take them. Until that happens, those who exploit young athletes will always be tempted to counterfeit the academic record at the last possible moment.

This Age Of Anxiety (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

The Sidney Awards, named for Sidney Hook, are a nice way to honor the best magazine essays of the year and to pass along a few nutritious holiday reading recommendations. But if you spend a few weeks poring over the highlights from a year's worth of magazines, you also get a window on the spirit of the times.

And 2006, let it be said, felt to many like the year of losing ground. There was a general sense that the forces of moderation in the Middle East were losing ground to the forces of radical Shiism. (The folks at Time are crazy if they don't name Nasrallah, Ahmadinejad and Sadr People of the Year.)

There was also a sense that we were losing ground in Iraq. One of the best magazine writers on that story, George Packer of The New Yorker, tended to profile American dissidents who were trying to change the way we fight that war.

In an April essay, "The Lesson of Tal Afar," Packer followed Col. H. R. McMaster, who argued that the Iraq war was as much a psychological and anthropological problem as a military and political one. Then, in December, his "Knowing the Enemy" appeared, about freethinkers in the Pentagon and elsewhere who were studying how Hezbollah and the Iraqi insurgents create narratives that demoralize their enemies, energize believers and create a sense of historical momentum.

One gets the feeling from his articles that America's enemies are playing a different game. They're waging an open-source campaign for cultural symbols, while we're oblivious to anything we can't drive over or kill.

The next great source of anxiety in 2006 was economic. The most influential article on this subject was Alan Blinder's essay "Offshoring: The Next Industrial Revolution" in Foreign Affairs. Blinder undermined many moderate Democrats' faith in free trade by arguing the negative effects of globalization will be much broader than previously thought. It's not just the unskilled who will lose jobs, but also people who provide "impersonal services" that can be delivered over the Internet: radiologists, accountants, even college professors.

Two or three times more Americans work at these sorts of jobs, Blinder observed, than work at manufacturing jobs.

Then there was a series of articles propelled by parental anxiety. In The Atlantic, Caitlin Flanagan wrote "Are You There God? It's Me, Monica," a sharp look at the way fellatio is supposedly becoming a casual element in teenage friendships.

"I'm not, however, terrified by the oral-sex craze," Flanagan wrote. "If I were to learn that my children had engaged in oral sex — outside a romantic relationship, and as young adolescents — I would be sad. But I wouldn't think that they had been damaged by the experience; I wouldn't think I had failed catastrophically as a mother, or that they would need therapy. Because I don't have daughters, I have sons."

Political writers offered policy prescriptions to parents who were falling behind. Karen Kornbluh wrote "Families Valued," in Democracy: A Journal of Ideas, on ways Democrats could make life easier for busy "juggler families." Yuval Levin had a parallel essay called "Putting Parents First" in The Weekly Standard, urging Republicans to face up to the tensions between free market dynamism and healthy family stability.

Finally, there was the sense the forces of decency were losing ground to primordial ugliness, especially anti-Semitism. John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt wrote a fevered essay on the power of the Israel Lobby, which cleared ground for a million anti-Semitic rants. Jimmy Carter has just published a book intended to make Israelis look like racists.

I'm not sure the classic essay on this latest recrudescence has been written, but Anne Applebaum had a useful piece in Slate called "Holocaust Denial Is No Joke," and Adam Garfinkle has a comprehensive look at "The Madness of Jewcentricity" in The American Interest.

It all adds up to quite a gloomy — though well-crafted — collection of essays, culminating in a National Journal piece by Paul Starobin called "Beyond Hegemony" on life in an age of declining American power.

I have to say, I'm as pessimistic about the Middle East as the next guy, but most of this broader existential gloom about America is absurd. The U.S. is in extraordinarily strong shape economically and socially. And whatever their short-term strengths, the Sadrs of the world simply do not have a social model that large numbers of people will want to live under.

Buck up, but stay informed.

Moderate Ex-President Takes Early Lead In Iran Vote (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 17, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec.16 — Early electoral returns on Saturday suggested that a moderate former president, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, had a strong a lead over a conservative opponent in at least one of the elections held Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0107315

The semi-official Fars news agency reported that most candidates on the slate led by Mr. Rafsanjani were headed for a victory in the elections for the 86-member Assembly of Experts. Muhammad Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi, the hard-line cleric, had also received enough votes to get elected. Other Web sites reported that Mr. Rafsanjani received far more votes personally than Mr. Mesbah-Yazdi.

Officials close to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad backed Mr. Mesbah-Yazdi, who has often declared his opposition to democracy. “The vote for Mr. Rafsanjani was a clear message showing that the average middle class who came out to vote for him against Mr. Ahmadinejad last year has become stronger,” said Saeed Leylaz, a political analyst. “This is because of Mr. Ahmadinejad’s radical and wrong policies.”

Mr. Rafsanjani lost the election for president last year to Mr. Ahmadinejad in a runoff.

The Interior Ministry said Sunday that the turnout for the double elections held Friday, the local council elections and the Assembly of Experts, was around 60 percent.

That is above the previous figure of 12 percent in 2003 for the local city council elections and 46 percent in 1998 for the Assembly of Experts.

The turnout carries political significance, and the results could suggest whether Mr. Ahmadinejad still enjoys strong popularity or people were casting their votes to protest his policies.

Reformers said they had won a majority in the local councils in at least four cities — Arak, Golestan, Ilam and Bushehr — where the counting had been completed, their Web site emruz.info reported.

Most analysts are expecting the 15-member council in Tehran to be divided among the reformers, the supporters of Mr. Ahmadinejad and supporters of the current mayor, Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, also a hard-liner.

But reformers said they feared that the votes could be tampered with by supporters of Mr. Ahmadinejad, who were responsible for supervising the elections. In a statement on their Web site, they warned that if votes were tampered with, “There will be huge costs.”

Early Results: Iran's Conservatives Lead (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 17, 2006

Early returns on Saturday showed hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's conservative opponents leading in elections for local councils and a powerful clerical body, widely considered a test of popular approval for the hardline leader.

Ahmadinejad's anti-Israel rhetoric and staunch stand on Iran's nuclear program are believed to have divided the conservatives who voted him into power. Some conservatives feel Ahmadinejad has spent too much time confronting the West and failed to deal with Iran's struggling economy.

Tehran newspapers and semiofficial news agencies reported unofficial results Saturday showing that no single party would be able to claim outright victory in Friday's elections, partly because of divisions within the conservative faction.

Iran's political scene is broadly split between conservative and pro-reform camps.

Officials have said preliminary results are expected Sunday, with final results coming Monday or later.

The semiofficial Mehr news agency said unofficial results showed candidates who support Ahmadinejad trailing in Tehran's municipal elections behind supporters of Mayor Mohammed Bagher Qalibaf, a moderate conservative.

Former President Hashemi Rafsanjani, considered an Ahmadinejad opponent, was leading in the Assembly of Experts election in Tehran, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported. The assembly is a body of 86 senior clerics that monitors Iran's supreme leader and chooses his successor.

The race for the assembly is dominated by two main rivals: Rafsanjani and Ayatollah Mohammad Taqi Mesbah Yazdi, widely seen as Ahmadinejad's spiritual mentor.

Reformists are hoping the local elections would show there is still public support for their policies. They held the presidency and dominated parliament and local councils in the late 1990s and early 2000s, but hard-liners have dominated in recent years.

Government officials touted Friday's high voter turnout as a "message" to the West.

"Through their impressive turnout under the current sensitive circumstances, the Iranian people sent a clear message to enemies of Iran's development," IRNA quoted Interior Minister Mostafa Pourmohammadi as saying.

The minister was apparently referring to Western critics of Iran's nuclear program. Iran says its program is intended only for generating fuel, but the U.S. and its European allies believe it aims to produce nuclear weapons.

Iran started having council elections after a reform introduced in 1999 by President Mohammed Khatami.

More than 233,000 candidates ran for more than 113,000 council seats in cities, towns and villages across the vast nation on Friday. Local councils elect the mayor and approve community budgets and planning projects.

DOJ_NMG_0107316

All municipal council candidates, including some 5,000 women, were vetted by parliamentary committees dominated by hard-liners. The committees disqualified about 10,000 nominees, reports said.

TERRORISM NEWS:

CIA's Alleged Involvement In European Disappearances Fuels "Deep Public Anger."

The Washington Post (12/16, A1, Whitlock, 690K) reports in a front-page story on reactions in Europe to alleged CIA efforts to identify and remove "dangerous people" from Europe in the wake of the September 11, 2001, attacks on the U.S. It mentions one case where "the CIA station chief in Rome paid a visit to the head of Italy's military intelligence agency, Adm. Gianfranco Battelli" to ask whether "the Italian secret services" would "help the CIA kidnap terrorism suspects and fly them out of the country?" The CIA is supposed to have provided "a list of more than 10 'dangerous people' the agency was tracking in Italy, Belgium, Austria and the Netherlands." And, "according to documents unearthed in criminal investigations, lawsuits and parliamentary inquiries," the CIA "took part in the seizure of at least 10 European citizens or legal immigrants." Those captured were "secretly handed over to intelligence services in the Middle East or Africa with histories of human rights abuses." Such reports "have fueled deep public anger in Europe, where many people regard renditions as a blatant violation of national sovereignty and international law."

Military Takes Tougher Line With Guantanamo Detainees. The New York Times (12/16, A1, Golden, 1.16M) reports, "After two years in which the military sought to manage terrorism suspects at Guantánamo with incentives for good behavior, steady improvements in their living conditions and even dialogue with prison leaders, the authorities here have clamped down decisively in recent months. Security procedures have been tightened. Group activities have been scaled back. ... Officials said the shift reflected the military's analysis — after a series of hunger strikes, a riot last May and three suicides by detainees in June — that earlier efforts to ease restrictions on the detainees had gone too far." The Times quotes the Gitmo commandant and a lawyer for one detainee.

Questions Emerge About Previous Detainees. NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 3, 0:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are new questions tonight about one of the symbols of the Bush Administration's war on terrorism. The maximum security prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba ... where the Pentagon says it has imprisoned some of the most dangerous people on the planet. But the Associated Press found that hundreds of men transferred from Guantanamo Bay to other countries were then later freed or cleared of all charges, raising questions, the Associated Press says, about whether they were really as dangerous as the US had claimed, or whether some of our allies have set terrorists and militants free."

Arar Still On US Watch List. The Washington Post (12/16, A16, Struck, 690K) reports, "Maher Arar, the Canadian Muslim who was whisked by U.S. agents from a New York airport to imprisonment and torture in Syria, remains on the U.S. 'watch list' despite an exhaustive Canadian inquiry that found he is an innocent man, the U.S. ambassador to Canada said Friday." The Post adds, "The Canadian Parliament has apologized to Arar, now 36, ... But the United States has never acknowledged any mistake in the matter, and [US ambassador] Wilkins's disclosure Friday indicates Arar might again be detained by the United States if he were to enter the country."

Chertoff Announces Rules For Rail Shipments Of Hazardous Materials. The Washington Post (12/16, A8, Wilber, 690K) reports, "Federal officials unveiled a plan yesterday to tighten security for railroad shipments of hazardous materials, saying the rules would reduce the risk of terrorists using dangerous chemicals to kill thousands of people. The proposals -- which drew criticism from Democrats, who said they did not go far enough -- would require freight and passenger systems to keep closer tabs on rail cars containing dangerous chemicals." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the rules would "reduce the risk that chemicals can be turned into deadly weapons when they are in transit." New Jersey Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D) said that "the plans would not do enough to secure rail stations, bridges and tunnels, which are also vulnerable to attack."

DHS To Abandon Exit Tracking System. The Washington Post (12/16, A9, Hsu, 690K) reports, "Supporters of the troubled US-VISIT program warned yesterday that the decision to suspend a crucial part of the national security program launched after the 2001 attacks will leave the nation vulnerable to terrorism." California Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D) said that "the government will be left with no way of knowing whether all visitors leave the country after the administration decided to drop a plan to track departures at land borders because of technical and cost problems." DHS officials said that "an exit tracking system" would cost "tens of billions" and "an additional five to 10 years developing the technology." Feinstein said the program "is central to protecting our national security." But, "others expressed relief that the department was acknowledging what critics have insisted for years: that billions of dollars might be wasted on contracts that could not deliver results."

Israel Warns Of Planned Al Qaeda Attacks On Israelis In India's Goa Over New Year. The New York Times (12/16, A8, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports, "The tourist haven of Goa got a rude reminder of reality this week" when "the Israeli government issued a rare terrorism alert on Thursday warning of a planned attack by Al Qaeda on tourists during the New Year's holiday season." The Israeli embassy in New Delhi "estimated that around 35,000 Israelis come to Goa each year."

WAR NEWS:

Women Lose Ground In New Iraq. The Washington Post (12/16, A12, Trejos, 690K) reports in a pessimistic 1,876-word article, "Life has become more difficult for most Iraqis since the February bombing of a Shiite Muslim mosque in Samarra sparked a rise in sectarian killings and overall lawlessness. For many women, though, it has become unbearable. As Islamic fundamentalism seeps into society and sectarian warfare escalates, more and more women live in fear of being kidnapped or raped. They receive death threats because of their religious sects and careers. ... For much of the 20th century, and under various leaders, Iraq was one of the most progressive Middle Eastern countries in its treatment of women ... But years of war changed that." Several women are quoted.

New Military Counterinsurgency Manual Differs With Current Practice. The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Barnes, 850K) reports, "The U.S. military's new counterinsurgency doctrine takes issue with some key strategies that American commanders in Iraq continue to use, most notably the practice of concentrating combat forces in massive bases rather than dispersing them among the population." It "also lists tactics that have tripped up American forces, such as trying to make local security forces act like the U.S. military and overemphasizing killing or capturing enemies rather than providing for the safety of the population. Although the military has moved away from some of these tactics, others are widely used in Iraq," such as special forces "trying to kill or capture" Al Qaeda and insurgents. The Times adds, "Perhaps the most controversial section may be the manual's warning about large, sprawling bases, the very kind the Army has erected in Baghdad. The manual warns that such military bases could suggest 'a long-term foreign occupation.'" In addition, "at some points the introduction and first chapter of the new manual read like a plea for more time for the military to succeed in Iraq." For example, it "cautions that campaigns against insurgents are 'often long and difficult' and that progress is hard to measure."

US Weighs Options For GI Surge In Iraq. The New York Times (12/16, A1, Sanger, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "Military planners and White House budget analysts have been asked to provide President Bush with options for increasing American forces in Iraq by 20,000 or more. The request indicates that the option of a major "surge" in troop strength is gaining ground as part of a White House strategy review, senior administration officials said Friday. ... the decision to ask the Joint Chiefs of Staff to specify where the additional forces could be found among overstretched Army, Marine and National Guard units, and to seek a cost estimate from the White House Office of Management and Budget, signifies a turn in the debate." Officials said an increase in troops exceeding 20,000 to 30,000 would have "prohibitive" obstacles. AFP (12/16) summarizes the New York Times story.

BBC.com (12/16) reports, "Up to 25,000 more troops could be deployed to try to help end the violence, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. ... Military commanders, however, ... say that stability in Iraq can now only be had by political means."

Pentagon Will Move Troops To Kuwait. The AP (12/16, Baldor) reports, "The U.S. military is planning to move a brigade of troops into Kuwait in what could be the first step of a short-term surge of American forces into Iraq to stabilize the violence. The 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division is expected in Kuwait shortly after the new year, a senior Defense Department official told The Associated Press on Friday. The official requested anonymity because the plans had not yet been announced."

Three More GIs Killed This Week. The AP (12/15, Gamel) reports, "Three more U.S. troops died in fighting this week, the military said Friday, raising to 54 the number of Americans killed in Iraq in December — nearly half of them in Anbar." December "is shaping up to be one of the deadliest for Americans since the war started ... At least 25 of the U.S. troops killed this month — most Marines — died in the vast stretch of desert that extends from the capital to the borders with Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia." The casualties reflect "the strength of Sunni insurgents, including al-Qaida in Iraq, in the region, even as violence in Baghdad shifts to a fight between Sunni and Shiite extremists."

Sadr City Raid Nets Six. The AP (12/15) reports, "Iraqi and U.S. forces detained six suspects in a raid and an airstrike Saturday on the Shiite slum of Sadr City that left one fighter dead and another wounded, the U.S. military said." The attack "was aimed at capturing the leader of an illegally armed group of more than 100 people suspected in kidnappings, killings, illegal checkpoints, rocket attacks and bombings against security forces and civilians in northeastern Baghdad," but the military did not name the suspect or state whether he had been caught. Special Iraqi forces "with coalition advisors" carried out the raid.

Rumsfeld Departs DOD With Sendoff From Bush, Cheney. There was considerable coverage of Donald Rumsfeld's final day at the Pentagon, and his sendoff from President Bush, Vice President Cheney, and others. Reporting emphasized the controversial nature of his tenure and the uncompromising nature of his farewell remarks. ABC World News (12/15, story 4, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There has been controversy, of course, over the course of the war in Iraq. And much of the criticism has been directed" at Rumsfeld. "But today, for Rumsfeld, there was a ceremony fit for a hero."

The CBS Evening News (12/15, story 3, 2:00, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "Rumsfeld's final regret is that the wars in both Iraq and Afghanistan have dragged on much longer and more ferociously than he expected. Today, he stopped well short of predicting eventual victory."

NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 4, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A regal farewell today at the Pentagon for Donald Rumsfeld. The Secretary of Defense who has made the same departure before but this time it was against the backdrop of an increasingly unpopular war." NBC (Gregory): "The Rumsfeld tenure was rocky. Lauded after 9/11 for his wit, toughness and charm before the cameras, he came to be vilified by his critics over Abu Ghraib, interrogation techniques of prisoners and his handling of Iraq." Frederick Kagan, military historian: "History is going to judge Don Rumsfeld in the end based on the outcome of the Iraq war. If we lose the war, then I think it's very likely that he will be identified as the man who lost the war."

Fox News Special Report (12/15, lead story, 3:40, Angle) reported, "It was a bittersweet day for Donald Rumsfeld. The secretary was lauded for a long and distinguished career of public service, just three days after he leaves the Pentagon." But "the grand going-away celebration marks Rumsfeld's departure without the victory in Iraq he so fervently sought."

The Washington Post (12/16, A8, Tyson, 690K) reports Rumsfeld drew "effusive praise" but that Pentagon officials "were preparing for what some called a new era of opportunity -- even glasnost -- created by his departure," which "opens the door for a more candid assessment of the Pentagon's mistakes in Iraq and for alternative military strategies."

The New York Times (12/16, A6, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports that Rumsfeld gave a "combative" valedictory. The Times adds, "The ceremony brought to a close perhaps the most controversial tenure for a secretary of defense since that of Robert McNamara, whose record tenure in the job bested Mr. Rumsfeld's by a mere 10 days. Like Mr. McNamara, Mr. Rumsfeld leaves a war he helped conceive in the hands of others. And like Mr. McNamara, his record is likely to be dissected and debated for years after his resignation."

Slain Officer's Presentation On Winning In Iraq Is Noted. ABC World News (12/15, story 5, 5:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush brought in his new Defense Secretary, Robert Gates, to help craft a new way forward in Iraq. Tonight, we have the story of one idea, remarkable in its simplicity, that has gotten the attention of many military officers." ABC (Raddatz): "Al Anbar province is the toughest area in Iraq. The enemy so varied, the hatred so deep. But Army Captain Travis Patriquin had a very simple solution he called 'How to win in al Anbar,' a slide show now circulating unofficially through the military. ... the slide show is filled with practical ways to reach out to the local population." ABC producer Auzzie Dean: "Travis spoke fluent Arabic, one of the many languages he did speak. And he absolutely won people over." Raddatz: "What Auzzie didn't know when he sent [an] e-mail [to Patriquin] is that Travis Patriquin had been in the same Humvee with Major Megan McClung and that he died beside her."

Chief Saddam Judge Steps Down. The AP (12/16) reports, "The chief investigator on the 10-judge panel that sentenced Saddam Hussein to death said Saturday that he has relinquished that role, allowing another judge to take over the post for the Iraqi High Tribunal. Raid Juhi said he will remain as a judge and spokesman on the tribunal." He "has been a high-profile figure in the trials against Saddam ... Juhi said he was replaced during annual elections held by tribunal members because he did not run for re-election to his post as main investigator."

Amid Taliban Resurgence, Civilian Killings By NATO Criticized. In an analysis of recent events, the Financial Times (12/16, Morarjee) reports, "Rising anger at the growing number of civilians being caught in the crossfire between Nato troops and Taliban insurgents is creating concern that support for Nato in southern Afghanistan is being severely undermined." The Times says the "issue of civilian casualties topped the agenda at a" high-level meeting of US, NATO and Afghan leaders this week "convened" by President Hamid Karzai. The Times adds, "Stoking public anger further has been a recent surge of suicide bombings in southern Afghanistan, which has led Nato troops to react more quickly to defend themselves." A NATO spokesman "said the organisation was looking at ways to curb civilian casualties as a matter of urgency."

Two More Suicide Attacks Hit Afghanistan. The New York Times (12/16, A9, Wafa, 1.16M) reports in a three-sentence article, "A suicide attacker's car exploded close to a joint NATO-Afghan convoy in eastern Paktia Province, killing an Afghan soldier and a civilian and wounding a NATO soldier. In neighboring Paktika Province an hour later, a man dressed in a burqa blew himself up and wounded two Afghan soldiers and a civilian."

GWOT Veterans Cope With Disabilities. NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 5, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "And then there are the individual stories of our American vets who have served in Iraq and Afghanistan and what happens after they come home. Especially if they're among the more than 23,000 who have been wounded. Readjusting can often be tough, which is why a gathering tonight in Orlando is doing a lot to lift spirits for many of those coming home." NBC (Potter): "Wounded in war, thousands of Americans now face the rest of their lives with difficulties they could never imagine. ... But in a place where everyone is accepted, more than 100 injured war veterans are helping each other at a convention sponsored by the Coalition to Salute America's Heroes. ... the most important benefit here is inspirational."

DOJ:

DOJ Arrests 26 Bosnian Serbs For War Crimes. The Washington Post (12/16, A3, Smith, 690K) reports, "A Justice Department dragnet based on war crimes probes in Europe led to 26 arrests in the past week of Bosnian Serbs who had obtained refugee status in the United States by allegedly concealing their service in the Bosnian Serb military during the bitter Yugoslav conflict of the mid-1990s. The arrests occurred in at least eight cities, including Denver and Orlando" and "reflect an intensified effort by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) to root out unacknowledged members of the Bosnian Serb military using data supplied by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, located in The Hague." Some "have been criminally charged and face prison terms, while others have been put into administrative proceedings that could lead to deportation."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Gives Small Firms More Time On Sarbanes-Oxley Compliance. The Washington Post (12/16, D2, 690K) reported the SEC has given "the smallest public companies five more months to comply with financial-control rules under the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act. It was the fourth such delay granted by the SEC to companies with market value of less than $75 million."

SEC, DOJ Actions Ease Rules On Corporations. The AP (12/15, Gordon) reported, "At the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, separate actions this week both had the effect of easing landmark rules laid down in response to the 2002 crisis of corporate malfeasance. Culminating an intense monthslong lobbying campaign by an array of companies, the five SEC commissioners voted at a public meeting Wednesday to propose a plan giving corporate managers more flexibility in assessing the strength of internal financial controls. It would especially benefit smaller companies. … The Justice Department, meanwhile, restricted its prosecutors' ability to crack down on companies that withhold confidential information during criminal fraud investigations, in new guidelines issued Tuesday that clipped back the aggressive legal tactics authorized after the scandals. They bar the government from seeking harsher penalties for companies that won't cooperate with prosecutors -- either by denying the prosecutors corporate attorney-client communications or by helping their employees under investigation by covering their legal fees."

Starr Says Sarbanes-Oxley Costly, Unconstitutional. In a Wall Street Journal (12/16, A11, 2.04M) op-ed, Kenneth Starr wrote that Sarbanes-Oxley "powerfully illustrates the law of unintended consequences. Due to hasty drafting by Congress in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom scandals, Sarbox has cost the U.S. economy over $1 trillion, according to one study published by the AEI-Brookings Center. To add insult to grievous injury, it is unconstitutional. … Despite legitimate public outrage over corporate scandals, good intentions provide no immunity from an unconstitutional scheme. … Even the statute's co-author, Rep. Mike Oxley, has conceded that Sarbanes-Oxley was hastily written and enacted. In its rush to 'do something' about corporate scandals, Congress overstepped the bounds of its authority. It is time to call Congress back, both to help our economy and reaffirm that our constitutional system imposes clear limits on the government's urgent desire to 'do something.' Congress must be reminded that the 'solution' is at times worse than the problem."

New Rules Require Companies To Disclose Top Execs' Pay Packages. The AP (12/16, Gordon) reported, "Investors are getting access to clearer and more detailed information from public companies on their top executives' pay packages and perks under federal rules that took effect on Friday. Companies' 2006 annual reports issued early next year will reflect the changes, which were ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission in July in a major overhaul of disclosure rules for executive compensation. The new requirements include disclosure of the dating of stock option grants to executives. Companies must provide detailed information on how they determine when executives receive option grants and, if they do so, how and why they backdate options."

Judge's Criticism Led To McNulty Rules. The New York Times (12/16, Browning) reports, "Judge Lewis A. Kaplan of the Federal District Court in Manhattan in June issued a scathing criticism of the prosecution's tactics in a criminal case against former tax professionals of the accounting firm KPMG. The government, the judge said, 'let its zeal get in the way of its judgment.' … Months later, those private discussions have now produced new guidelines, known as the McNulty memorandum. Under them, a company's decision to pay legal fees will not be held against it, except in extreme circumstances, when prosecutors are weighing whether to indict the company. The new guidelines also raise new hurdles for prosecutors seeking access to confidential legal communications."

Democrats Not Expected To Pursue Dramatic Change In Consumer Protections. The Wall Street Journal (12/16, A4, Conkey, 2.04M) reports, "Incoming Democratic leaders say they intend to bolster privacy rights and a spate of consumer protections in the next Congress. But early signs suggest activists in this arena may want to temper their enthusiasm." While Democratic support for efforts to "raise the minimum wage and make health care and college more affordable" as well as "strengthen privacy protections, combat identity theft and curb abusive practices in mortgage lending and other financial services" may be "a big shift for consumer groups," yet "actually passing legislation…could be difficult." And "federal action wouldn't guarantee a big win for consumer groups…if a new nationwide law undercuts stronger protections at the state level." MA4 Rep. Barney Frank (D) "predicts there will be little difference between Democratic and Republican rule when it comes to regulation of the financial-services industry."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Florida, California Suspend Executions By Lethal Injection. The Washington Post (12/16, A1, Whoriskey, Geis, 690K) reports in a front-page story, "Executions by lethal injection were suspended in Florida and ordered revamped in California on Friday, as the chemical method once billed as a more humane way of killing the condemned came under mounting scrutiny over the pain it may cause." Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) "ordered the suspension…after a botched execution." Judge Jeremy D. Fogel of the U.S. District Court for Northern California, "ruled that the state must overhaul its lethal-injection procedures, calling its current protocol unconstitutional because it may inflict unacceptable levels of pain." Yet, "more than 30 states, including Virginia and Maryland, use the same three-drug sequence for lethal injections." The decisions are presented as part of a "rising debate" over lethal injection.

ABC World News (12/15, story 3, 0:27, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In two of the nation's largest states, capital punishments by lethal injection are on hold for now." The CBS Evening News (12/15, story 5, 0:30, Cobiella, 7.66M) reported Florida Gov. Jeb Bush" has put all executions on hold after a medical examiner said it took too long for a convicted killer to die earlier this week. The execution of Angel Diaz lasted 34 minutes, twice as long as usual. An autopsy showed the needles used for lethal injection missed his veins and went into the flesh in his arms instead. In what may be a death blow to this kind of execution, a federal judge in California has ruled its current method of lethal injection may be cruel and unusual punishment and unconstitutional." NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 2, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "These latest developments come as several states are taking a closer look at whether lethal injection is cruel and unusual."

The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Weinstein, 850K) reports that the decisions by Judge Fogel in California And Florida Gov. Bush "were the latest development in what is now the central legal issue in the long-running battle over capital punishment in the United States: whether lethal injections are being administered in a humane, constitutional manner." The AP (12/15) reports Judge Fogel ruled that "California's 'implementation of lethal injection is broken.' But he said: 'It can be fixed.'" Gov. Bush "created a commission to examine" Florida's "lethal injection process…and he halted the signing of any more death warrants until the panel completes its final report by March 1."

The New York Times (12/16, A11, Liptak, Aguayo, 1.16M) reports, "The California decision, which followed a four-day evidentiary hearing and a session at the San Quentin prison, was eagerly awaited and probably represents the fullest and most careful consideration yet of whether the way inmates are executed violates the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment." Meanwhile, "the new commission in Florida, which will include doctors, lawyers, scientists and law enforcement officials, will consider many of the same issues, including whether the state protocol satisfies 'humanity, constitutional imperative and common sense,' Mr. Bush said in his order."

The Washington Times (12/16, A1, 88K) reports in a front-page story Florida Gov.-elect Charlie Crist (R) "planned to continue the moratorium when he takes office in January." Judge Fogel "ordered anesthesiologists to be on hand, or demanded that a licensed medical professional inject a large, fatal dose of a sedative instead of the additional paralyzing agent and heart-stopping drugs that are normally used. But no medical professional was willing to participate."

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/16, A1, Egelko, 384K) reports Judge Fogel "gave state officials 30 days to decide whether they will revise lethal-injection procedures and to say how long they would need. Officials said they would take steps to comply." Fogel "stressed that he was condemning neither capital punishment nor lethal injection itself." The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Williams, 850K) described Gov. Bush's decision as "suspension of one of the country's most active execution chambers." BBC.com (12/16, San Pedro) reports, "it is too soon to interpret the decisions as a sign that support for the death penalty is waning in the US."

California To Review Sentencing Guidelines. The New York Times/AP (12/16, A15) reports the California "corrections secretary said the state would create a commission to review sentencing guidelines, a potential crucial step in Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's efforts to relieve prison crowding." The announcement "comes five days after a federal judge gave Mr. Schwarzenegger a June deadline to ease crowding in the state prison system."

Gonzales Calls For United Anti-Gang Efforts By Law-Enforcement And Community Groups. The Washington Times (12/16, Seper, 88K) reports Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, at the Project Safe Neighborhoods conference in Boston said that "the Justice Department is determined to help prevent America's youth from joining gangs." He described department efforts to bring "together law-enforcement and community leaders to discuss effective programs, identify gaps in services, and develop working partnerships to prevent gangs from claiming new members." He called for "an integrated, comprehensive approach that includes both law-enforcement and the prevention efforts uniquely offered by community-service groups." The Bush administration "has committed more than $1.5 billion to" Project Safe Neighborhoods to "hire new federal and state prosecutors, support investigators, provide training, distribute gun-lock safety kits, deter juvenile gun crime, and develop and promote community outreach efforts as well as to support other gun-violence-reduction strategies."

War On Terrorism Took Stretches Law-Enforcement Resources, Gonzales Says. The Lowell (MA) Sun (12/16, Savard) reports, "Law enforcement has had to keep a sharp eye turned toward terrorist activity in a post 9/11 world, Gonzales said. Because police are stretching resources farther than ever, more people must join in the effort to deter youth from choosing a life of crime. Crime-fighting partnerships involving the whole community are key, Gonzales said."

Boston Crime Craws Gonzales' Attention. The Boston Herald (12/16, O', Johnson) reports, "The blood spilled on Boston's streets this year drew the attention of the nation's top prosecutor yesterday as he attended a conference on gang violence at a time when the city hopes a fractured gang truce can stop a street war from erupting. … Gonzales, who was in town to speak at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood Conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center, said the feds have put street violence under a microscope, not just in Boston, but across the country."

Federal Prosecutors Win First Economic Espionage Case. The Fresno Bee (12/15, Robertson) reported, "Federal prosecutors scored their first-ever convictions for economic espionage to benefit a foreign nation when two Silicon Valley engineers pleaded guilty to stealing trade secrets and trying to smuggle them to China. Fei Ye, 40, a U.S. citizen from China, and Ming Zhong, 39, a permanent resident of the U.S. from China entered their pleas Thursday in San Jose federal court to two counts each as part of a deal with prosecutors. Both would have faced 10 counts each if they went to trial in January. Ye and Zhong were accused of stealing confidential microchip blueprints and other trade secrets from four technology companies - NEC Electronics Corp., Sun Microsystems Inc., Transmeta Corp. and Trident Microsystems Inc. - and planning to start a microprocessor company with the financial backing of various Chinese government agencies."

Domenici's Grandchildren Safe After "Burglary Gone Awry." The Washington Post (12/16, B1, Londono, 690K) reports, "Masked intruders forced their way into the Silver Spring home of" New Mexico Sen. Pete V. Domenici's (R) "daughter yesterday morning, startling a nanny who ran outside with the lawmaker's 2-year-old granddaughter and left his youngest grandson behind. A Montgomery County police SWAT team later found the baby safe in his crib. Police think the incident was a burglary gone awry because the intruders apparently didn't realize the house was occupied."

WPost Critical Of Sex Offender E-Mail Registry Idea. The Washington Post (12/16, A18, 690K) writes in an editorial on "a proposal by Virginia's attorney general, Robert F. McDonnell (R), to require convicted sex offenders to register their e-mail addresses, instant-messaging handles and other online identities so they can be blocked from preying on youth online" and a related "federal bill dealing with the same theme offered this month by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.)" that "Once a sexual predator decides that he is willing to risk prosecution and imprisonment for his crime, he is unlikely to balk over failing to register an e-mail address."

Hit List Led to Orange County Arrests. The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Reza) reports, "This week's arrests of 57 people allegedly tied to a white supremacist gang were sparked when authorities learned of a hit list with the names of an Orange County prosecutor and five police officers, an investigator said Friday. Anaheim Police Lt. K. Switzer said authorities learned of the list last month. He said the probe began when another Orange County police department learned that one of its officers had been targeted by Public Enemy Number 1, a street gang involved in identity theft, credit card fraud and methamphetamine sales. The group has ties to the racist Aryan Brotherhood and Nazi Low Riders prison gangs. Switzer said investigators were trying to determine why those six people were targeted and if it was a gang edict or the work of a single gang member."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bush "Happy" For Mary Cheney, But Has Not Altered Gay Marriage Stance. The New York Times (12/16, A15, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "Mary Cheney's baby will have two mommies, and that is just fine with President Bush." According to an interview with People magazine, Bush said, "I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her." That statement "prompted a new round of questions about the president's past statements against same-sex marriage and, more particularly, child rearing by gay couples." So "during his regular press briefing, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said Mr. Bush still believed that children should ideally be raised by a man and a woman as parents. But, Mr. Snow said, 'he believes that Mary Cheney's child will, in fact, have loving parents.'" The full People (12/15) interview with the President and First Lady is available online.

The AP (12/15) reports, "Bush was asked about Mary Cheney's pregnancy in light of his previous statements that a child ideally should be raised by in a family headed by a married father and mother. White House press secretary Tony Snow said on Friday that Bush has not changed his mind." The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports that President Bush, "pressed on whether his remark contradicted views he previously expressed that being raised by same-sex couples was not ideal for a child, he avoided a direct response." Snow said that "Bush had not addressed whether he thought children raised by gays were at a disadvantage."

AFP (12/15) reports Bush, "a staunch defender of traditional values, believes vice-president Dick Cheney's lesbian daughter will be a 'loving mother.'" Bush told People Magazine that "he was delighted to hear Mary Cheney was expecting a child with long-time partner Heather Poe."

New Jersey Same-Sex Couples Plan To Take Advantage Of Civil Unions Law. The New York Times (12/16, B1, Fahim, 1.16M) reports, "Away from the loud political arguments over the New Jersey Legislature's vote to establish civil unions for same-sex couples, gays and lesbians across the state have begun to grapple with the practicalities." The article reports on the reactions of people planning to take advantage of the law and "the 2000 Census found about 16,000 same-sex couples living together in New Jersey…; nearly one-third of them are raising children."

DOJ Alleges Town Violated Hispanics' Voting Rights In Suit. The New York Times (12/16, Whitaker, 1.16M) reported that DOJ "filed a lawsuit on Friday against" Port Chester, NY, alleging "that its at-large voting system illegally diminishes Hispanic influence." In the suit, the department "seeks an injunction that could scuttle Board of Trustees elections in March." The Times added, "The Justice Department notified officials in April that it intended to file a lawsuit if they did not take steps to set up a district-based voting system. The department provided three separate plans to break the village into voting districts. On Dec. 4, the village board voted to notify the department that it did not believe the current system violated the act, setting the stage for a court battle."

The AP (12/16, Fitzgerald) added, "Mayor Gerald Logan blasted the lawsuit, calling it 'unfortunate and heavy-handed' and noting that Port Chester has used at-large elections since 1868. … The village is about 25 miles from New York City and is governed by a mayor and six trustees. Port Chester, with a population of about 28,000, is 43 percent Hispanic, according to the 2000 Census. The citizen voting-age population was 22 percent Hispanic, but no Hispanic has ever been elected as a trustee."

Justice Department Files Complaint Against Oklahoma Over Juvenile Detention Center. The Oklahoman (12/16, Rabe) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department on Friday filed a complaint against the state, challenging the conditions at a Sand Springs juvenile detention center Federal prosecutors believe the state hasn't corrected serious violations found in a two-year investigation at the L.E. Rader Center, said Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department. She said violations included inappropriate sexual relationships, violence and abuse of psychotropic medications."

ANTITRUST:

WSJournal Argues For Airline Consolidation. The Wall Street Journal (12/16, A10, 2.04M) writes in an editorial about proposed airline mergers, that "Democrats are already sounding the political alarm about airline consolidation" with New Jersey Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D) saying that he "wants to be sure that any deals are 'good for the flying public'" while MN8 Rep. James Oberstar (D) says that "the Justice Department should block all airline mergers." The Journal argues that "a competitive and healthy airline industry is in everyone's interest" and "the alternative to merger becomes bankruptcy." So "capacity reduction and the elimination of marginal routes has to be part of any story that leads to a less self-destructive industry in the future."

Airlines Assay Mergers, Reducing Costs, Possibly Increasing Expenses For Travelers. The New York Times (12/16, Stein) reports, "HOW well have the commercial airlines rebounded from their near-death brushes with bankruptcy in the first half of the decade? Consider this: flights are packed, fares are rising and profits have reappeared despite stubbornly high fuel costs. The best may be to come, as some of the biggest airlines flirt with mergers that could permit them to cut costs and raise fares even further. Federal regulators, meanwhile, eased up on some of the rules and prosecutorial tools after the collapses of Enron and WorldCom touched off a series of corporate scandals involving accounting fraud, insider trading, backdated stock option grants and other malfeasance. … Earlier in the week, Continental Airlines confirmed it was being courted by United, its much larger rival. Both deals follow US Airways' offer last month to buy Delta Air Lines for $8 billion. Delta's board is considering that offer as it tries to emerge from bankruptcy court protection. If one big domestic merger goes through, other airlines will feel pressure to pair off, too, or risk winding up at a competitive disadvantage because they have higher costs or smaller route networks. While such consolidation may bolster airlines' bottom lines, reduced competition would probably also result in more-crowded flights and higher fares, at least in the short term."

Democratic Senator Sounds Warning On Mergers. Dow Jones Newswires (12/16, Boles) reports, " "Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg (D-NJ) said he is concerned that renewed speculation the industry is about to embark upon another round of takeover activity could leave consumers shortchanged."

Merck Says Antitrust Waiting Period Has Expired, Can Buy Sirna. The Milwaukee Business Journal (12/16) reports, "Merck & Co. said Thursday that the federal regulatory antitrust waiting period for its $1.1 billion deal to buy Sirna Therapeutics Inc. expired. The two companies broke news of the deal on Oct. 30, when Merck (NYSE: MRK) said it would pay $13 a share in cash for San Francisco-based Sirna (NASDAQ: RNAI). The end of the required waiting period satisfies one condition for the deal to be completed. Sirna's stockholders have yet to vote on the deal -- that's set for Dec. 28 in San Francisco's Grand Hyatt Hotel."

Hearst Buys Newspapers, Will Sell Them To MediaNews. The AP (12/16) reports, "Copley Press Inc. said Friday it sold the Daily Breeze and three weekly newspapers to Hearst Corp. in a deal that will eventually transfer ownership of the Los Angeles-area paper to Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc. MediaNews, which also owns the Daily News of Los Angeles and other area papers, will run the Breeze while a sale of the papers from Hearst is pending, MediaNews said Friday."

Justice Moves To Streamline Merger Reviews. The New York Times (12/16) reports, "Hoping to reduce the time and expense involved in the merger review process, the Justice Department's antitrust division on Friday announced changes to its five-year-old guidelines for vetting corporate transactions. Many of the changes focus on the 'second request,' in which regulators, after launching a preliminary investigation into a deal's competitive effects, extend the waiting period and ask the parties for more information. Among the new provisions is an option that allows companies to limit the scope of the documents they must produce in a second request, the Justice Department said."

The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones (12/16, Boles) reports, "The voluntary amendments come as part of wider series of measures aimed at reducing the burden on companies going through the merger approval process. The new option would place limits on the extensiveness of DOJ requests for further information from merging companies. Only certain central files and a targeted list of 30 employees, deemed central to the business, would be searched by the DOJ during a takeover investigation."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Agents Shot While Serving Warrant. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/16, Gentry, Morris) reports, "Two agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives were shot early Friday while serving a warrant at a DeKalb County apartment complex, police said. One agent was struck in the knee and the other in the lower abdomen. Both men were treated at a local hospital and released. … ATF spokesman Marc Jackson said the agents, whose names have not been released, were serving a federal search warrant for 'firearms-related offenses.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Agents Arrest 1,282 In Raids On Swift Meat-Packing Plants. The New York Times (12/16, A13, Preston, 1.16M) reports on "raids this week by immigration authorities at meat-packing plants in six states" that left "immigrant families" trying to "find detained relatives, arrange care for children of deported parents and recover from the loss of work." The raids "had stunning effects on the surrounding towns" and "1,282 legal and illegal immigrants were arrested" at plants "operated by Swift & Company of Greeley, Colo." The raids "netted dozens of immigrants who were legal residents but did not have their papers with them at work. Others arrested were illegal who have to leave the country or face deportation." Swift CEO Sam Rovit, said that "the losses in replacing the workers could be in the millions." Swift had "sought an injunction against the raids in Federal court in Amarillo, Tex. Judge Mary Lou Robinson denied the request."

New York Town May Be Divided As Part Of Reaction To Illegal Immigration. The New York Times (12/16, B1, Vitello, 1.16M) reports on efforts by part of Farmingville, New York to secede and form "the village of Oak Hills" in response to the town's "reputation as a place where illegal immigrant day laborers crowd into rooming houses." Farmingville "has been the scene of frequent demonstrations by residents, and by groups that come periodically to taunt the day laborers." The move is seen as part of "frustration with perceived federal inaction against illegal newcomers."

TAX:

Reid, Hastert Reportedly Made Last-Minute Deal On Tax, Trade Amendments. The Washington Post (12/16, A4, Birnbaum, 690K) reports on a "last minute deal" between House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and incoming Senate Majority Leader Nevada Sen. Harry M. Reid (D) that "paired" Reid's "plan for a major Nevada land swap" with Hastert's proposal to "give certain Medicare beneficiaries additional time to change their health-care coverage" as part of "a massive tax and trade measure approved by Congress shortly before its final adjournment early last Saturday morning." In reaction, Montana Sen. Max Baucus (D.), the incoming chairman of the Finance Committee, outgoing chairman Iowa Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R), and incoming Senate Minority Leader Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell (R) "said they will probably attempt to strike the Medicare provision when the new Congress convenes next year." Reid's proposal was co-sponsored by Nevada Sen. John Ensign (R).

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats To Probe Iraq, Defense Contractors. The Washington Post (12/16, A5, Babington, 690K) reports, "Incoming Democratic committee chairmen say they will hold a series of hearings and investigations early next year to build the case for their call for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq and for possible action against defense contractors found to have wasted billions in federal funds." Michigan Sen. Carl M. Levin (D) is described as "eager" to conduct hearings and "his party's point man" on pushing for withdrawal and investigations of defense contractors and the use of prewar intelligence. PA12 Rep. John P. Murtha (D), Vermont Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D) and West Virginia Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D) all plan "more aggressive hearings."

Johnson's Progress "Encouraging," Neurosurgeon Says. The Sioux Falls Argus Leader (12/16, Bremner) reports Sen. Tim Johnson "continued to make progress" as he recovers from Wednesday night brain surgery. Johnson "was in critical but stable condition in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital, according to his staff and doctors late Friday." Neurosurgeon Anthony Caputy said in a statement, "Considering his initial presentation, his progress is encouraging. He is now stabilized and continues to show signs of responsiveness to the medical staff and the family."

ABC World News (12/15, story 7, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Johnson's office "said the surgery was a success. And his progress is encouraging. We are told he's opened his eyes and responded to his wife's voice." The CBS Evening News (12/15, story 6, 0:30, Borger, 7.66M) reported Johnson "also reached out to hold her hand. A stream of colleagues visited Johnson today who remains sedated." NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 7, 0:50, Williams, 9.87M) also said Johnson's doctors "called his progress today 'encouraging.'"

The Washington Post (12/16, A2, Brown, 690K) says Johnson's office said the operation "was 'considered a success'…although the few details released about his condition suggested he was not fully conscious two days after the procedure." Headlines in two major newspapers highlight this mixed message. The New York Times (12/16, A11, Zernike, Altman, 1.16M) headlines its report "Senator Showing Weakness After Surgery," while the Los Angeles Times (12/16, Levey, 850K) piece is headlined "Senator Is Showing Signs Of Recovery." The New York Times story says Johnson "was showing weakness on his right side," and that the senator "will remain in the hospital until the swelling in his brain goes down."

Democrats Said To Face Problems From Lack Of Revenue, Divisions Over Trade. Thomas Edsall writes in a column for the New York Times (12/16, A17, 1.16M), "The Democrats are positioned to make a down payment to the voters" with policies like "a minimum-wage hike, ethics reform, reduced student loan interest rates and changes in labor law, which will make union organizing less difficult." But, "they will encounter two roadblocks: Republican chokeholds on federal spending, meant to 'starve the beast' by radically depleting coffers, and intense internal Democratic policy conflicts." The cost of Iraq and tax cuts are seen as the chief limits on spending and "the intraparty conflict pits its business and labor wings against each other on policies dealing with the international marketplace." Edsall concludes, "the Democrats have a two-year window in which to confront their internal schisms and to present a stronger face to the electorate in 2008."

OTHER NEWS:

Rising Hamas-Fatah Violence Could Splinter Palestine. The CBS Evening News (12/15, story 4, 1:00, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "It sounded like war last night as the Palestinian prime minister was returning from meetings in Egypt, unidentified gunmen opened fire on his motorcade. Twenty-seven people were wounded and a bodyguard was killed. Supporters say this was an assassination attempt by another Palestinian faction. Hours later in the west bank, new violence as the Palestinian territories continue a slide toward civil war. Fatah gunmen, supporters of the Palestinian President, opened fire on Hamas militiamen loyal to the Prime Minister as civilians ran for cover."

The Washington Post (12/16, A14, Wilson, 690K) reports Fatah and Hamas "factions exchanged gunfire Friday in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, leaving more than 30 people wounded, as leaders from both parties warned of an escalation that could push the territories toward a deeper conflict." The "movements" have "been engaged in a political struggle for much of the year, but the latest unrest has been more brazen and regular than previous confrontations." Noting several violent encounters, the Post describes "a week of partisan reprisals in Gaza" and elsewhere.

The New York Times (12/16, A8, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "The Palestinians seemed to edge toward open civil conflict on Friday as Hamas…accused its rival, Fatah, of trying to assassinate the prime minister. Gunmen from the two factions clashed in the streets, wounding at least 30 men." Yesterday's events "raised the stakes in the bitter confrontation between" the groups, and the Times says "the violence and the heated oratory in recent days have increased talk about [an outright] confrontation, or even the possibility of a Palestinian civil war." The "Hamas-Fatah tensions, and other internal Palestinian disputes, have been growing worse for months, and this week appeared to mark a new low, with several deadly shootings." President Mahmoud Abbas "faces the difficult task of trying to resolve the political standoff at a time of almost daily internal violence."

The Washington Times (12/16, A1, Mitnick, 88K) adds, "Armed clashes intensified between rival Palestinian factions yesterday… The latest violence threatened to undermine months of talks on a unity government between [Hamas and Fatah] to end a deadly power struggle within the Palestinian territories." The Times says "the spike in tensions" is "just the latest developments in a week of Hamas-Fatah turmoil."

The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Ellingwood, 850K) adds, "The clashes and the accusations of an assassination attempt aimed at Haniyeh raised tensions as Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is scheduled to make a speech today about the worsening political deadlock." The Times says "it remains unclear" how Abbas can "resolve the impasse," noting that Hamas' "allegations against Fatah marked a new level in the bitter war of words between the two groups, which have been locked in a struggle for power since Hamas won parliamentary elections in January."

The Financial Times (12/16, Devi) titles its report, "Hamas Says Abbas Seeks War," while the AP (12/16, Barzak) notes that "violence spread to areas of the Palestinian territories normally untouched by factional strife," including Ramallah.

Rice Says US Considering Aid Package For Lebanese Military. Reporting on Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's interview yesterday with the Washington Post, AFP (12/16) notes she "said Washington was considering a financial package to beef up the military of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, who has expressed fears of an attempted Syrian-backed coup." She is quoted saying, "We are still working out the details of what we can do to support the army. But we have wanted very much to support the reform of the Lebanese armed forces, the reequipping of the Lebanese armed forces." Rice "said she could not give details of the aid package," but added that "the Bush administration needed to have consultations with Congress over the package."

TERRORISM NEWS:

CIA's Alleged Involvement In European Disappearances Fuels "Deep Public Anger." The Washington Post (12/16, A1, Whitlock, 690K) reports in a front-page story on reactions in Europe to alleged CIA efforts to identify and remove "dangerous people" from Europe in the wake of the September 11, 2001, attacks on the U.S. It mentions one case where "the CIA station chief in Rome paid a visit to the head of Italy's military intelligence agency, Adm. Gianfranco Battelli" to ask whether "the Italian secret services" would "help the CIA kidnap terrorism suspects and fly them out of the country?" The CIA is supposed to have provided "a list of more than 10 'dangerous people' the agency was tracking in Italy, Belgium, Austria and the Netherlands." And, "according to documents unearthed in criminal investigations, lawsuits and parliamentary inquiries," the CIA "took part in the seizure of at least 10 European citizens or legal immigrants." Those captured were "secretly handed over to intelligence services in the Middle East or Africa with histories of human rights abuses." Such reports "have fueled deep public anger in Europe, where many people regard renditions as a blatant violation of national sovereignty and international law."

Military Takes Tougher Line With Guantanamo Detainees. The New York Times (12/16, A1, Golden, 1.16M) reports, "After two years in which the military sought to manage terrorism suspects at Guantánamo with incentives for good behavior, steady improvements in their living conditions and even dialogue with prison leaders, the authorities here have clamped down decisively in recent months. Security procedures have been tightened. Group activities have been scaled back. ... Officials said the shift reflected the military's analysis — after a series of hunger strikes, a riot last May and three suicides by detainees in June — that earlier efforts to ease restrictions on the detainees had gone too far." The Times quotes the Gitmo commandant and a lawyer for one detainee.

Questions Emerge About Previous Detainees. NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 3, 0:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are new questions tonight about one of the symbols of the Bush Administration's war on terrorism. The maximum security prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba ... where the Pentagon says it has imprisoned some of the most dangerous people on the planet. But the Associated Press found that hundreds of men transferred from Guantanamo Bay to other countries were then later freed or cleared of all charges, raising questions, the Associated Press says, about whether they were really as dangerous as the US had claimed, or whether some of our allies have set terrorists and militants free."

Arar Still On US Watch List. The Washington Post (12/16, A16, Struck, 690K) reports, "Maher Arar, the Canadian Muslim who was whisked by U.S. agents from a New York airport to imprisonment and torture in Syria, remains on the U.S. 'watch list' despite an exhaustive Canadian inquiry that found he is an innocent man, the U.S. ambassador to Canada said Friday." The Post adds, "The Canadian Parliament has apologized to Arar, now 36, ... But the United States has never acknowledged any mistake in the matter, and [US ambassador] Wilkins's disclosure Friday indicates Arar might again be detained by the United States if he were to enter the country."

Chertoff Announces Rules For Rail Shipments Of Hazardous Materials. The Washington Post (12/16, A8, Wilber, 690K) reports, "Federal officials unveiled a plan yesterday to tighten security for railroad shipments of hazardous materials, saying the rules would reduce the risk of terrorists using dangerous chemicals to kill thousands of people. The proposals -- which drew criticism from Democrats, who said they did not go far enough -- would require freight and passenger systems to keep closer tabs on rail cars containing dangerous chemicals." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the rules would "reduce the risk that chemicals can be turned into deadly weapons when they are in transit." New Jersey Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D) said that "the plans would not do enough to secure rail stations, bridges and tunnels, which are also vulnerable to attack."

DHS To Abandon Exit Tracking System. The Washington Post (12/16, A9, Hsu, 690K) reports, "Supporters of the troubled US-VISIT program warned yesterday that the decision to suspend a crucial part of the national security program launched after the 2001 attacks will leave the nation vulnerable to terrorism." California Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D) said that "the government will be left with no way of knowing whether all visitors leave the country after the administration decided to drop a plan to track departures at land borders because of technical and cost problems." DHS officials said that "an exit tracking system" would cost "tens of billions" and "an additional five to 10 years developing the technology." Feinstein said the program "is central to protecting our national security." But, "others expressed relief that the department was acknowledging what critics have insisted for years: that billions of dollars might be wasted on contracts that could not deliver results."

Israel Warns Of Planned Al Qaeda Attacks On Israelis In India's Goa Over New Year. The New York Times (12/16, A8, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports, "The tourist haven of Goa got a rude reminder of reality this week" when "the Israeli government issued a rare terrorism alert on Thursday warning of a planned attack by Al Qaeda on tourists during the New Year's holiday season." The Israeli embassy in New Delhi "estimated that around 35,000 Israelis come to Goa each year."

WAR NEWS:

Women Lose Ground In New Iraq. The Washington Post (12/16, A12, Trejos, 690K) reports in a pessimistic 1,876-word article, "Life has become more difficult for most Iraqis since the February bombing of a Shiite Muslim mosque in Samarra sparked a rise in sectarian killings and overall lawlessness. For many women, though, it has become unbearable. As Islamic fundamentalism seeps into society and sectarian warfare escalates, more and more women live in fear of being kidnapped or raped. They receive death threats because of their religious sects and careers. ... For much of the 20th century, and under various leaders, Iraq was one of the most progressive Middle Eastern countries in its treatment of women ... But years of war changed that." Several women are quoted.

New Military Counterinsurgency Manual Differs With Current Practice. The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Barnes, 850K) reports, "The U.S. military's new counterinsurgency doctrine takes issue with some key strategies that American commanders in Iraq continue to use, most notably the practice of concentrating combat forces in massive bases rather than dispersing them among the population." It "also lists tactics that have tripped up American forces, such as trying to make local security forces act like the U.S. military and overemphasizing killing or capturing enemies rather than providing for the safety of the population. Although the military has moved away from some of these tactics, others are widely used in Iraq," such as special forces "trying to kill or capture" Al Qaeda and insurgents. The Times adds, "Perhaps the most controversial section may be the manual's warning about large, sprawling bases, the very kind the Army has erected in Baghdad. The manual warns that such military bases could suggest 'a long-term foreign occupation.'" In addition, "at some points the introduction and first chapter of the new manual read like a plea for more time for the military to succeed in Iraq." For example, it "cautions that campaigns against insurgents are 'often long and difficult' and that progress is hard to measure."

US Weighs Options For GI Surge In Iraq. The New York Times (12/16, A1, Sanger, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "Military planners and White House budget analysts have been asked to provide President Bush with options for increasing American forces in Iraq by 20,000 or more. The request indicates that the option of a major "surge" in troop strength is gaining ground as part of a White House strategy review, senior administration officials said Friday. ... the decision to ask the Joint Chiefs of Staff to specify where the additional forces could be found among overstretched Army, Marine and National Guard units, and to seek a cost estimate from the White House Office of Management and Budget, signifies a turn in the debate." Officials said an increase in troops exceeding 20,000 to 30,000 would have "prohibitive" obstacles. AFP (12/16) summarizes the New York Times story.

BBC.com (12/16) reports, "Up to 25,000 more troops could be deployed to try to help end the violence, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. ... Military commanders, however, ... say that stability in Iraq can now only be had by political means."

Pentagon Will Move Troops To Kuwait. The AP (12/16, Baldor) reports, "The U.S. military is planning to move a brigade of troops into Kuwait in what could be the first step of a short-term surge of American forces into Iraq to stabilize the violence. The 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division is expected in Kuwait shortly after the new year, a senior Defense Department official told The Associated Press on Friday. The official requested anonymity because the plans had not yet been announced."

Three More GIs Killed This Week. The AP (12/15, Gamel) reports, "Three more U.S. troops died in fighting this week, the military said Friday, raising to 54 the number of Americans killed in Iraq in December — nearly half of them in Anbar." December "is shaping up to be one of the deadliest for Americans since the war started ... At least 25 of the U.S. troops killed this month — most Marines — died in the vast stretch of desert that extends from the capital to the borders with Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia." The casualties reflect "the strength of Sunni insurgents, including al-Qaida in Iraq, in the region, even as violence in Baghdad shifts to a fight between Sunni and Shiite extremists."

Sadr City Raid Nets Six. The AP (12/15) reports, "Iraqi and U.S. forces detained six suspects in a raid and an airstrike Saturday on the Shiite slum of Sadr City that left one fighter dead and another wounded, the U.S. military said." The attack "was aimed at capturing the leader of an illegally armed group of more than 100 people suspected in kidnappings, killings, illegal checkpoints, rocket attacks and bombings against security forces and civilians in northeastern Baghdad," but the military did not name the suspect or state whether he had been caught. Special Iraqi forces "with coalition advisors" carried out the raid.

Rumsfeld Departs DOD With Sendoff From Bush, Cheney. There was considerable coverage of Donald Rumsfeld's final day at the Pentagon, and his sendoff from President Bush, Vice President Cheney, and others. Reporting emphasized the controversial nature of his tenure and the uncompromising nature of his farewell remarks. ABC World News (12/15, story 4, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There has been controversy, of course, over the course of the war in Iraq. And much of the criticism has been directed" at Rumsfeld. "But today, for Rumsfeld, there was a ceremony fit for a hero."

The CBS Evening News (12/15, story 3, 2:00, Martin, 7.66M) reported, "Rumsfeld's final regret is that the wars in both Iraq and Afghanistan have dragged on much longer and more ferociously than he expected. Today, he stopped well short of predicting eventual victory."

NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 4, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A regal farewell today at the Pentagon for Donald Rumsfeld. The Secretary of Defense who has made the same departure before but this time it was against the backdrop of an increasingly unpopular war." NBC (Gregory): "The Rumsfeld tenure was rocky. Lauded after 9/11 for his wit, toughness and charm before the cameras, he came to be vilified by his critics over Abu Ghraib, interrogation techniques of prisoners and his handling of Iraq." Frederick Kagan, military historian: "History is going to judge Don Rumsfeld in the end based on the outcome of the Iraq war. If we lose the war, then I think it's very likely that he will be identified as the man who lost the war."

Fox News Special Report (12/15, lead story, 3:40, Angle) reported, "It was a bittersweet day for Donald Rumsfeld. The secretary was lauded for a long and distinguished career of public service, just three days after he leaves the Pentagon." But "the grand going-away celebration marks Rumsfeld's departure without the victory in Iraq he so fervently sought."

The Washington Post (12/16, A8, Tyson, 690K) reports Rumsfeld drew "effusive praise" but that Pentagon officials "were preparing for what some called a new era of opportunity -- even glasnost -- created by his departure," which "opens the door for a more candid assessment of the Pentagon's mistakes in Iraq and for alternative military strategies."

The New York Times (12/16, A6, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports that Rumsfeld gave a "combative" valedictory. The Times adds, "The ceremony brought to a close perhaps the most controversial tenure for a secretary of defense since that of Robert McNamara, whose record tenure in the job bested Mr. Rumsfeld's by a mere 10 days. Like Mr. McNamara, Mr. Rumsfeld leaves a war he helped conceive in the hands of others. And like Mr. McNamara, his record is likely to be dissected and debated for years after his resignation."

Slain Officer's Presentation On Winning In Iraq Is Noted. ABC World News (12/15, story 5, 5:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush brought in his new Defense Secretary, Robert Gates, to help craft a new way forward in Iraq. Tonight, we have the story of one idea, remarkable in its simplicity, that has gotten the attention of many military officers." ABC (Raddatz): "Al Anbar province is the toughest area in Iraq. The enemy so varied, the hatred so deep. But Army Captain Travis Patriquin had a very simple solution he called 'How to win in al Anbar,' a slide show now circulating unofficially through the military. ... the slide show is filled with practical ways to reach out to the local population." ABC producer Auzzie Dean: "Travis spoke fluent Arabic, one of the many languages he did speak. And he absolutely won people over." Raddatz: "What Auzzie didn't know when he sent [an] e-mail [to Patriquin] is that Travis Patriquin had been in the same Humvee with Major Megan McClung and that he died beside her."

Chief Saddam Judge Steps Down. The AP (12/16) reports, "The chief investigator on the 10-judge panel that sentenced Saddam Hussein to death said Saturday that he has relinquished that role, allowing another judge to take over the post for the Iraqi High Tribunal. Raid Juhi said he will remain as a judge and spokesman on the tribunal." He "has been a high-profile figure in the trials against Saddam ... Juhi said he was replaced during annual elections held by tribunal members because he did not run for re-election to his post as main investigator."

Amid Taliban Resurgence, Civilian Killings By NATO Criticized. In an analysis of recent events, the Financial Times (12/16, Morarjee) reports, "Rising anger at the growing number of civilians being caught in the crossfire between Nato troops and Taliban insurgents is creating concern that support for Nato in southern Afghanistan is being severely undermined." The Times says the "issue of civilian casualties topped the agenda at a" high-level meeting of US, NATO and Afghan leaders this week "convened" by President Hamid Karzai. The Times adds, "Stoking public anger further has been a recent surge of suicide bombings in southern Afghanistan, which has led Nato troops to react more quickly to defend themselves." A NATO spokesman "said the organisation was looking at ways to curb civilian casualties as a matter of urgency."

Two More Suicide Attacks Hit Afghanistan. The New York Times (12/16, A9, Wafa, 1.16M) reports in a three-sentence article, "A suicide attacker's car exploded close to a joint NATO-Afghan convoy in eastern Paktia Province, killing an Afghan soldier and a civilian and wounding a NATO soldier. In neighboring Paktika Province an hour later, a man dressed in a burqa blew himself up and wounded two Afghan soldiers and a civilian."

GWOT Veterans Cope With Disabilities. NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 5, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "And then there are the individual stories of our American vets who have served in Iraq and Afghanistan and what happens after they come home. Especially if they're among the more than 23,000 who have been wounded. Readjusting can often be tough, which is why a gathering tonight in Orlando is doing a lot to lift spirits for many of those coming home." NBC (Potter): "Wounded in war, thousands of Americans now face the rest of their lives with difficulties they could never imagine. ... But in a place where everyone is accepted, more than 100 injured war veterans are helping each other at a convention sponsored by the Coalition to Salute America's Heroes. ... the most important benefit here is inspirational."

DOJ:

DOJ Arrests 26 Bosnian Serbs For War Crimes. The Washington Post (12/16, A3, Smith, 690K) reports, "A Justice Department dragnet based on war crimes probes in Europe led to 26 arrests in the past week of Bosnian Serbs who had obtained refugee status in the United States by allegedly concealing their service in the Bosnian Serb military during the bitter Yugoslav conflict of the mid-1990s. The arrests occurred in at least eight cities, including Denver and Orlando" and "reflect an intensified effort by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) to root out unacknowledged members of the Bosnian Serb military using data supplied by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, located in The Hague." Some "have been criminally charged and face prison terms, while others have been put into administrative proceedings that could lead to deportation."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Gives Small Firms More Time On Sarbanes-Oxley Compliance. The Washington Post (12/16, D2, 690K) reported the SEC has given "the smallest public companies five more months to comply with financial-control rules under the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act. It was the fourth such delay granted by the SEC to companies with market value of less than $75 million."

SEC, DOJ Actions Ease Rules On Corporations. The AP (12/15, Gordon) reported, "At the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, separate actions this week both had the effect of easing landmark rules laid down in response to the 2002 crisis of corporate malfeasance. Culminating an intense monthslong lobbying campaign by an array of companies, the five SEC commissioners voted at a public meeting Wednesday to propose a plan giving corporate managers more flexibility in assessing the strength of internal financial controls. It would especially benefit smaller companies. … The Justice Department, meanwhile, restricted its prosecutors' ability to crack down on companies that withhold confidential information during criminal fraud investigations, in new guidelines issued Tuesday that clipped back the aggressive legal tactics authorized after the scandals. They bar the government from seeking harsher penalties for companies that won't cooperate with prosecutors -- either by denying the prosecutors corporate attorney-client communications or by helping their employees under investigation by covering their legal fees."

Starr Says Sarbanes-Oxley Costly, Unconstitutional. In a Wall Street Journal (12/16, A11, 2.04M) op-ed, Kenneth Starr wrote that Sarbanes-Oxley "powerfully illustrates the law of unintended consequences. Due to hasty drafting by Congress in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom scandals, Sarbox has cost the U.S. economy over $1 trillion, according to one study published by the AEI-Brookings Center. To add insult to grievous injury, it is unconstitutional. … Despite legitimate public outrage over corporate scandals, good intentions provide no immunity from an unconstitutional scheme. … Even the statute's co-author, Rep. Mike Oxley, has conceded that Sarbanes-Oxley was hastily written and enacted. In its rush to 'do something' about corporate scandals, Congress overstepped the bounds of its authority. It is time to call Congress back, both to help our economy and reaffirm that our constitutional system imposes clear limits on the government's urgent desire to 'do something.' Congress must be reminded that the 'solution' is at times worse than the problem."

New Rules Require Companies To Disclose Top Execs' Pay Packages. The AP (12/16, Gordon) reported, "Investors are getting access to clearer and more detailed information from public companies on their top executives' pay packages and perks under federal rules that took effect on Friday. Companies' 2006 annual reports issued early next year will reflect the changes, which were ordered by the Securities and Exchange Commission in July in a major overhaul of disclosure rules for executive compensation. The new requirements include disclosure of the dating of stock option grants to executives. Companies must provide detailed information on how they determine when executives receive option grants and, if they do so, how and why they backdate options."

Judge's Criticism Led To McNulty Rules. The New York Times (12/16, Browning) reports, "Judge Lewis A. Kaplan of the Federal District Court in Manhattan in June issued a scathing criticism of the prosecution's tactics in a criminal case against former tax professionals of the accounting firm KPMG. The government, the judge said, 'let its zeal get in the way of its judgment.' … Months later, those private discussions have now produced new guidelines, known as the McNulty memorandum. Under them, a company's decision to pay legal fees will not be held against it, except in extreme circumstances, when prosecutors are weighing whether to indict the company. The new guidelines also raise new hurdles for prosecutors seeking access to confidential legal communications."

Democrats Not Expected To Pursue Dramatic Change In Consumer Protections. The Wall Street Journal (12/16, A4, Conkey, 2.04M) reports, "Incoming Democratic leaders say they intend to bolster privacy rights and a spate of consumer protections in the next Congress. But early signs suggest activists in this arena may want to temper their enthusiasm." While Democratic support for efforts to "raise the minimum wage and make health care and college more affordable" as well as "strengthen privacy protections, combat identity theft and curb abusive practices in mortgage lending and other financial services" may be "a big shift for consumer groups," yet "actually passing legislation…could be difficult." And "federal action wouldn't guarantee a big win for consumer groups…if a new nationwide law undercuts stronger protections at the state level." MA4 Rep. Barney Frank (D) "predicts there will be little difference between Democratic and Republican rule when it comes to regulation of the financial-services industry."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Florida, California Suspend Executions By Lethal Injection. The Washington Post (12/16, A1, Whoriskey, Geis, 690K) reports in a front-page story, "Executions by lethal injection were suspended in Florida and ordered revamped in California on Friday, as the chemical method once billed as a more humane way of killing the condemned came under mounting scrutiny over the pain it may cause." Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) "ordered the suspension…after a botched execution." Judge Jeremy D. Fogel of the U.S. District Court for Northern California, "ruled that the state must overhaul its lethal-injection procedures, calling its current protocol unconstitutional because it may inflict unacceptable levels of pain." Yet, "more than 30 states, including Virginia and Maryland, use the same three-drug sequence for lethal injections." The decisions are presented as part of a "rising debate" over lethal injection.

ABC World News (12/15, story 3, 0:27, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In two of the nation's largest states, capital punishments by lethal injection are on hold for now." The CBS Evening News (12/15, story 5, 0:30, Cobiella, 7.66M) reported Florida Gov. Jeb Bush" has put all executions on hold after a medical examiner said it took too long for a convicted killer to die earlier this week. The execution of Angel Diaz lasted 34 minutes, twice as long as usual. An autopsy showed the needles used for lethal injection missed his veins and went into the flesh in his arms instead. In what may be a death blow to this kind of execution, a federal judge in California has ruled its current method of lethal injection may be cruel and unusual punishment and unconstitutional." NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 2, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "These latest developments come as several states are taking a closer look at whether lethal injection is cruel and unusual."

The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Weinstein, 850K) reports that the decisions by Judge Fogel in California And Florida Gov. Bush "were the latest development in what is now the central legal issue in the long-running battle over capital punishment in the United States: whether lethal injections are being administered in a humane, constitutional manner." The AP (12/15) reports Judge Fogel ruled that "California's 'implementation of lethal injection is broken.' But he said: 'It can be fixed.'" Gov. Bush "created a commission to examine" Florida's "lethal injection process…and he halted the signing of any more death warrants until the panel completes its final report by March 1."

The New York Times (12/16, A11, Liptak, Aguayo, 1.16M) reports, "The California decision, which followed a four-day evidentiary hearing and a session at the San Quentin prison, was eagerly awaited and probably represents the fullest and most careful consideration yet of whether the way inmates are executed violates the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment." Meanwhile, "the new commission in Florida, which will include doctors, lawyers, scientists and law enforcement officials, will consider many of the same issues, including whether the state protocol satisfies 'humanity, constitutional imperative and common sense,' Mr. Bush said in his order."

The Washington Times (12/16, A1, 88K) reports in a front-page story Florida Gov.-elect Charlie Crist (R) "planned to continue the moratorium when he takes office in January." Judge Fogel "ordered anesthesiologists to be on hand, or demanded that a licensed medical professional inject a large, fatal dose of a sedative instead of the additional paralyzing agent and heart-stopping drugs that are normally used. But no medical professional was willing to participate."

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/16, A1, Egelko, 384K) reports Judge Fogel "gave state officials 30 days to decide whether they will revise lethal-injection procedures and to say how long they would need. Officials said they would take steps to comply." Fogel "stressed that he was condemning neither capital punishment nor lethal injection itself." The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Williams, 850K) described Gov. Bush's decision as "suspension of one of the country's most active execution chambers." BBC.com (12/16, San Pedro) reports, "it is too soon to interpret the decisions as a sign that support for the death penalty is waning in the US."

California To Review Sentencing Guidelines. The New York Times/AP (12/16, A15) reports the California "corrections secretary said the state would create a commission to review sentencing guidelines, a potential crucial step in Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's efforts to relieve prison crowding." The announcement "comes five days after a federal judge gave Mr. Schwarzenegger a June deadline to ease crowding in the state prison system."

Gonzales Calls For United Anti-Gang Efforts By Law-Enforcement And Community Groups. The Washington Times (12/16, Seper, 88K) reports Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, at the Project Safe Neighborhoods conference in Boston said that "the Justice Department is determined to help prevent America's youth from joining gangs." He described department efforts to bring "together law-enforcement and community leaders to discuss effective programs, identify gaps in services, and develop working partnerships to prevent gangs from claiming new members." He called for "an integrated, comprehensive approach that includes both law-enforcement and the prevention efforts uniquely offered by community-service groups." The Bush administration "has committed more than $1.5 billion to" Project Safe Neighborhoods to "hire new federal and state prosecutors, support investigators, provide training, distribute gun-lock safety kits, deter juvenile gun crime, and develop and promote community outreach efforts as well as to support other gun-violence-reduction strategies."

War On Terrorism Took Stretches Law-Enforcement Resources, Gonzales Says. The Lowell (MA) Sun (12/16, Savard) reports, "Law enforcement has had to keep a sharp eye turned toward terrorist activity in a post 9/11 world, Gonzales said. Because police are stretching resources farther than ever, more people must join in the effort to deter youth from choosing a life of crime. Crime-fighting partnerships involving the whole community are key, Gonzales said."

Boston Crime Craws Gonzales' Attention. The Boston Herald (12/16, O', Johnson) reports, "The blood spilled on Boston's streets this year drew the attention of the nation's top prosecutor yesterday as he attended a conference on gang violence at a time when the city hopes a fractured gang truce can stop a street war from erupting. … Gonzales, who was in town to speak at the annual Project Safe Neighborhood Conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center, said the feds have put street violence under a microscope, not just in Boston, but across the country."

Federal Prosecutors Win First Economic Espionage Case. The Fresno Bee (12/15, Robertson) reported, "Federal prosecutors scored their first-ever convictions for economic espionage to benefit a foreign nation when two Silicon Valley engineers pleaded guilty to stealing trade secrets and trying to smuggle them to China. Fei Ye, 40, a U.S. citizen from China, and Ming Zhong, 39, a permanent resident of the U.S. from China entered their pleas Thursday in San Jose federal court to two counts each as part of a deal with prosecutors. Both would have faced 10 counts each if they went to trial in January. Ye and Zhong were accused of stealing confidential microchip blueprints and other trade secrets from four technology companies - NEC Electronics Corp., Sun Microsystems Inc., Transmeta Corp. and Trident Microsystems Inc. - and planning to start a microprocessor company with the financial backing of various Chinese government agencies."

Domenici's Grandchildren Safe After "Burglary Gone Awry." The Washington Post (12/16, B1, Londono, 690K) reports, "Masked intruders forced their way into the Silver Spring home of" New Mexico Sen. Pete V. Domenici's (R) "daughter yesterday morning, startling a nanny who ran outside with the lawmaker's 2-year-old granddaughter and left his youngest grandson behind. A Montgomery County police SWAT team later found the baby safe in his crib. Police think the incident was a burglary gone awry because the intruders apparently didn't realize the house was occupied."

WPost Critical Of Sex Offender E-Mail Registry Idea. The Washington Post (12/16, A18, 690K) writes in an editorial on "a proposal by Virginia's attorney general, Robert F. McDonnell (R), to require convicted sex offenders to register their e-mail addresses, instant-messaging handles and other online identities so they can be blocked from preying on youth online" and a related "federal bill dealing with the same theme offered this month by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.)" that "Once a sexual predator decides that he is willing to risk prosecution and imprisonment for his crime, he is unlikely to balk over failing to register an e-mail address."

Hit List Led to Orange County Arrests. The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Reza) reports, "This week's arrests of 57 people allegedly tied to a white supremacist gang were sparked when authorities learned of a hit list with the names of an Orange County prosecutor and five police officers, an investigator said Friday. Anaheim Police Lt. K. Switzer said authorities learned of the list last month. He said the probe began when another Orange County police department learned that one of its officers had been targeted by Public Enemy Number 1, a street gang involved in identity theft, credit card fraud and methamphetamine sales. The group has ties to the racist Aryan Brotherhood and Nazi Low Riders prison gangs. Switzer said investigators were trying to determine why those six people were targeted and if it was a gang edict or the work of a single gang member."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bush "Happy" For Mary Cheney, But Has Not Altered Gay Marriage Stance. The New York Times (12/16, A15, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports, "Mary Cheney's baby will have two mommies, and that is just fine with President Bush." According to an interview with People magazine, Bush said, "I think Mary is going to be a loving soul to her child. And I'm happy for her." That statement "prompted a new round of questions about the president's past statements against same-sex marriage and, more particularly, child rearing by gay couples." So "during his regular press briefing, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said Mr. Bush still believed that children should ideally be raised by a man and a woman as parents. But, Mr. Snow said, 'he believes that Mary Cheney's child will, in fact, have loving parents.'" The full People (12/15) interview with the President and First Lady is available online.

The AP (12/15) reports, "Bush was asked about Mary Cheney's pregnancy in light of his previous statements that a child ideally should be raised by in a family headed by a married father and mother. White House press secretary Tony Snow said on Friday that Bush has not changed his mind." The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports that President Bush, "pressed on whether his remark contradicted views he previously expressed that being raised by same-sex couples was not ideal for a child, he avoided a direct response." Snow said that "Bush had not addressed whether he thought children raised by gays were at a disadvantage."

AFP (12/15) reports Bush, "a staunch defender of traditional values, believes vice-president Dick Cheney's lesbian daughter will be a 'loving mother.'" Bush told People Magazine that "he was delighted to hear Mary Cheney was expecting a child with long-time partner Heather Poe."

The New York Times (12/16, B1, Fahim, 1.16M) reports, "Away from the loud political arguments over the New Jersey Legislature's vote to establish civil unions for same-sex couples, gays and lesbians across the state have begun to grapple with the practicalities." The article reports on the reactions of people planning to take advantage of the law and "the 2000 Census found about 16,000 same-sex couples living together in New Jersey…; nearly one-third of them are raising children."

DOJ Alleges Town Violated Hispanics' Voting Rights In Suit. The New York Times (12/16, Whitaker, 1.16M) reported that DOJ "filed a lawsuit on Friday against" Port Chester, NY, alleging "that its at-large voting system illegally diminishes Hispanic influence." In the suit, the department "seeks an injunction that could scuttle Board of Trustees elections in March." The Times added, "The Justice Department notified officials in April that it intended to file a lawsuit if they did not take steps to set up a district-based voting system. The department provided three separate plans to break the village into voting districts. On Dec. 4, the village board voted to notify the department that it did not believe the current system violated the act, setting the stage for a court battle."

The AP (12/16, Fitzgerald) added, "Mayor Gerald Logan blasted the lawsuit, calling it 'unfortunate and heavy-handed' and noting that Port Chester has used at-large elections since 1868. … The village is about 25 miles from New York City and is governed by a mayor and six trustees. Port Chester, with a population of about 28,000, is 43 percent Hispanic, according to the 2000 Census. The citizen voting-age population was 22 percent Hispanic, but no Hispanic has ever been elected as a trustee."

ANTITRUST:

WSJournal Argues For Airline Consolidation. The Wall Street Journal (12/16, A10, 2.04M) writes in an editorial about proposed airline mergers, that "Democrats are already sounding the political alarm about airline consolidation" with New Jersey Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D) saying that he "wants to be sure that any deals are 'good for the flying public'" while MN8 Rep. James Oberstar (D) says that "the Justice Department should block all airline mergers." The Journal argues that "a competitive and healthy airline industry is in everyone's interest" and "the alternative to merger becomes bankruptcy." So "capacity reduction and the elimination of marginal routes has to be part of any story that leads to a less self-destructive industry in the future."

Airlines Assay Mergers, Reducing Costs, Possibly Increasing Expenses For Travelers. The New York Times (12/16, Stein) reports, "HOW well have the commercial airlines rebounded from their near-death brushes with bankruptcy in the first half of the decade? Consider this: flights are packed, fares are rising and profits have reappeared despite stubbornly high fuel costs. The best may be to come, as some of the biggest airlines flirt with mergers that could permit them to cut costs and raise fares even further. Federal regulators, meanwhile, eased up on some of the rules and prosecutorial tools after the collapses of Enron and WorldCom touched off a series of corporate scandals involving accounting fraud, insider trading, backdated stock option grants and other malfeasance. … Earlier in the week, Continental Airlines confirmed it was being courted by United, its much larger rival. Both deals follow US Airways' offer last month to buy Delta Air Lines for $8 billion. Delta's board is considering that offer as it tries to emerge from bankruptcy court protection. If one big domestic merger goes through, other airlines will feel pressure to pair off, too, or risk winding up at a competitive disadvantage because they have higher costs or smaller route networks. While such consolidation may bolster airlines' bottom lines, reduced competition would probably also result in more-crowded flights and higher fares, at least in the short term."

Democratic Senator Sounds Warning On Mergers. Dow Jones Newswires (12/16, Boles) reports, " "Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg (D-NJ) said he is concerned that renewed speculation the industry is about to embark upon another round of takeover activity could leave consumers shortchanged."

Merck Says Antitrust Waiting Period Has Expired, Can Buy Sirna. The Milwaukee Business Journal (12/16) reports, "Merck & Co. said Thursday that the federal regulatory antitrust waiting period for its $1.1 billion deal to buy Sirna Therapeutics Inc. expired. The two companies broke news of the deal on Oct. 30, when Merck (NYSE: MRK) said it would pay $13 a share in cash for San Francisco-based Sirna (NASDAQ: RNAI). The end of the required waiting period satisfies one condition for the deal to be completed. Sirna's stockholders have yet to vote on the deal -- that's set for Dec. 28 in San Francisco's Grand Hyatt Hotel."

Hearst Buys Newspapers, Will Sell Them To MediaNews. The AP (12/16) reports, "Copley Press Inc. said Friday it sold the Daily Breeze and three weekly newspapers to Hearst Corp. in a deal that will eventually transfer ownership of the Los Angeles-area paper to Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc. MediaNews, which also owns the Daily News of Los Angeles and other area papers, will run the Breeze while a sale of the papers from Hearst is pending, MediaNews said Friday."

Justice Moves To Streamline Merger Reviews. The New York Times (12/16) reports, "Hoping to reduce the time and expense involved in the merger review process, the Justice Department's antitrust division on Friday announced changes to its five-year-old guidelines for vetting corporate transactions. Many of the changes focus on the 'second request,' in which regulators, after launching a preliminary investigation into a deal's competitive effects, extend the waiting period and ask the parties for more information. Among the new provisions is an option that allows companies to limit the scope of the documents they must produce in a second request, the Justice Department said."

The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones (12/16, Boles) reports, "The voluntary amendments come as part of wider series of measures aimed at reducing the burden on companies going through the merger approval process. The new option would place limits on the extensiveness of DOJ requests for further information from merging companies. Only certain central files and a targeted list of 30 employees, deemed central to the business, would be searched by the DOJ during a takeover investigation."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Agents Shot While Serving Warrant. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/16, Gentry, Morris) reports, "Two agents with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives were shot early Friday while serving a warrant at a DeKalb County apartment complex, police said. One agent was struck in the knee and the other in the lower abdomen. Both men were treated at a local hospital and released. … ATF spokesman Marc Jackson said the agents, whose names have not been released, were serving a federal search warrant for 'firearms-related offenses.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Agents Arrest 1,282 In Raids On Swift Meat-Packing Plants. The New York Times (12/16, A13, Preston, 1.16M) reports on "raids this week by immigration authorities at meat-packing plants in six states" that left "immigrant families" trying to "find detained relatives, arrange care for children of deported parents and recover from the loss of work." The raids "had stunning effects on the surrounding towns" and "1,282 legal and illegal immigrants were arrested" at plants "operated by Swift & Company of Greeley, Colo." The raids "netted dozens of immigrants who were legal residents but did not have their papers with them at work. Others arrested were illegal who have to leave the country or face deportation." Swift CEO Sam Rovit, said that "the losses in replacing the workers could be in the millions." Swift had "sought an injunction against the raids in Federal court in Amarillo, Tex. Judge Mary Lou Robinson denied the request."

New York Town May Be Divided As Part Of Reaction To Illegal Immigration. The New York Times (12/16, B1, Vitello, 1.16M) reports on efforts by part of Farmingville, New York to secede and form "the village of Oak Hills" in response to the town's "reputation as a place where illegal immigrant day laborers crowd into rooming houses." Farmingville "has been the scene of frequent demonstrations by residents, and by groups that come periodically to taunt the day laborers." The move is seen as part of "frustration with perceived federal inaction against illegal newcomers."

TAX:

Reid, Hastert Reportedly Made Last-Minute Deal On Tax, Trade Amendments. The Washington Post (12/16, A4, Birnbaum, 690K) reports on a "last minute deal" between House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and incoming Senate Majority Leader Nevada Sen. Harry M. Reid (D) that "paired" Reid's "plan for a major Nevada land swap" with Hastert's proposal to "give certain Medicare beneficiaries additional time to change their health-care coverage" as part of "a massive tax and trade measure approved by Congress shortly before its final adjournment early last Saturday morning." In reaction, Montana Sen. Max Baucus (D.), the incoming chairman of the Finance Committee, outgoing chairman Iowa Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R), and incoming Senate Minority Leader Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell (R) "said they will probably attempt to strike the Medicare provision when the new Congress convenes next year." Reid's proposal was co-sponsored by Nevada Sen. John Ensign (R).

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats To Probe Iraq, Defense Contractors. The Washington Post (12/16, A5, Babington, 690K) reports, "Incoming Democratic committee chairmen say they will hold a series of hearings and investigations early next year to build the case for their call for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq and for possible action against defense contractors found to have wasted billions in federal funds." Michigan Sen. Carl M. Levin (D) is described as "eager" to conduct hearings and "his party's point man" on pushing for withdrawal and investigations of defense contractors and the use of prewar intelligence. PA12 Rep. John P. Murtha (D), Vermont Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D) and West Virginia Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D) all plan "more aggressive hearings."

Johnson's Progress "Encouraging," Neurosurgeon Says. The Sioux Falls Argus Leader (12/16, Bremner) reports Sen. Tim Johnson "continued to make progress" as he recovers from Wednesday night brain surgery. Johnson "was in critical but stable condition in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital, according to his staff and doctors late Friday." Neurosurgeon Anthony Caputy said in a statement, "Considering his initial presentation, his progress is encouraging. He is now stabilized and continues to show signs of responsiveness to the medical staff and the family."

ABC World News (12/15, story 7, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported Johnson's office "said the surgery was a success. And his progress is encouraging. We are told he's opened his eyes and responded to his wife's voice." The CBS Evening News (12/15, story 6, 0:30, Borger, 7.66M) reported Johnson "also reached out to hold her hand. A stream of colleagues visited Johnson today who remains sedated." NBC Nightly News (12/15, story 7, 0:50, Williams, 9.87M) also said Johnson's doctors "called his progress today 'encouraging.'"

The Washington Post (12/16, A2, Brown, 690K) says Johnson's office said the operation "was 'considered a success'…although the few details released about his condition suggested he was not fully conscious two days after the procedure." Headlines in two major newspapers highlight this mixed message. The New York Times (12/16, A11, Zernike, Altman, 1.16M) headlines its report "Senator Showing Weakness After Surgery," while the Los Angeles Times (12/16, Levey, 850K) piece is headlined "Senator Is Showing Signs Of Recovery." The New York Times story says Johnson "was showing weakness on his right side," and that the senator "will remain in the hospital until the swelling in his brain goes down."

Democrats Said To Face Problems From Lack Of Revenue, Divisions Over Trade. Thomas Edsall writes in a column for the New York Times (12/16, A17, 1.16M), "The Democrats are positioned to make a down payment to the voters" with policies like "a minimum-wage hike, ethics reform, reduced student loan interest rates and changes in labor law, which will make union organizing less difficult." But, "they will encounter two roadblocks: Republican chokeholds on federal spending, meant to 'starve the beast' by radically depleting coffers, and intense internal Democratic policy conflicts." The cost of Iraq and tax cuts are seen as the chief limits on spending and "the intraparty conflict pits its business and labor wings against each other on policies dealing with the international marketplace." Edsall concludes, "the Democrats have a two-year window in which to confront their internal schisms and to present a stronger face to the electorate in 2008."

OTHER NEWS:

Rising Hamas-Fatah Violence Could Splinter Palestine. The CBS Evening News (12/15, story 4, 1:00, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "It sounded like war last night as the Palestinian prime minister was returning from meetings in Egypt, unidentified gunmen opened fire on his motorcade. Twenty-seven people were wounded and a bodyguard was killed. Supporters say this was an assassination attempt by another Palestinian faction. Hours later in the west bank, new violence as the Palestinian territories continue a slide toward civil war. Fatah gunmen, supporters of the Palestinian President, opened fire on Hamas militiamen loyal to the Prime Minister as civilians ran for cover."

The Washington Post (12/16, A14, Wilson, 690K) reports Fatah and Hamas "factions exchanged gunfire Friday in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, leaving more than 30 people wounded, as leaders from both parties warned of an escalation that could push the territories toward a deeper conflict." The "movements" have "been engaged in a political struggle for much of the year, but the latest unrest has been more brazen and regular than previous confrontations." Noting several violent encounters, the Post describes "a week of partisan reprisals in Gaza" and elsewhere.

The New York Times (12/16, A8, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "The Palestinians seemed to edge toward open civil conflict on Friday as Hamas…accused its rival, Fatah, of trying to assassinate the prime minister. Gunmen from the two factions clashed in the streets, wounding at least 30 men." Yesterday's events "raised the stakes in the bitter confrontation between" the groups, and the Times says "the violence and the heated oratory in recent days have increased talk about [an outright] confrontation, or even the possibility of a Palestinian civil war." The "Hamas-Fatah tensions, and other internal Palestinian disputes, have been growing worse for months, and this week appeared to mark a new low, with several deadly shootings." President Mahmoud Abbas "faces the difficult task of trying to resolve the political standoff at a time of almost daily internal violence."

The Washington Times (12/16, A1, Mitnick, 88K) adds, "Armed clashes intensified between rival Palestinian factions yesterday… The latest violence threatened to undermine months of talks on a unity government between [Hamas and Fatah] to end a deadly power struggle within the Palestinian territories." The Times says "the spike in tensions" is "just the latest developments in a week of Hamas-Fatah turmoil."

The Los Angeles Times (12/16, Ellingwood, 850K) adds, "The clashes and the accusations of an assassination attempt aimed at Haniyeh raised tensions as Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is scheduled to make a speech today about the worsening political deadlock." The Times says "it remains unclear" how Abbas can "resolve the impasse," noting that Hamas' "allegations against Fatah marked a new level in the bitter war of words between the two groups, which have been locked in a struggle for power since Hamas won parliamentary elections in January."

The Financial Times (12/16, Devi) titles its report, "Hamas Says Abbas Seeks War," while the AP (12/16, Barzak) notes that "violence spread to areas of the Palestinian territories normally untouched by factional strife," including Ramallah.

Rice Says US Considering Aid Package For Lebanese Military. Reporting on Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's interview yesterday with the Washington Post, AFP (12/16) notes she "said Washington was considering a financial package to beef up the military of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, who has expressed fears of an attempted Syrian-backed coup." She is quoted saying, "We are still working out the details of what we can do to support the army. But we have wanted very much to support the reform of the Lebanese armed forces, the reequipping of the Lebanese armed forces." Rice "said she could not give details of the aid package," but added that "the Bush administration needed to have consultations with Congress over the package."
